To repeat, within the framework of the basic conditions outlined, the school system is performing well and to the satisfaction of the people being served, and we suspect that few school systems working within familiar conditions do much better. Let us look more closely, however, at what this means. Taking the white schools first, although they serve a clientele well above the average of the county socially, economically, and intellectually, their students do not typically fall into an above-average group on a national basis. Only about 40% graduate from high school, and of these only two-thirds go to college; even this relatively privileged minority in the county, i.e., the white citizens, do not contribute their share of developed talent to the nation. Only so long as Burke County can maintain its relative isolation will this white system prove satisfactory even to the county itself.

Clearly, however, the white schools are not where the serious problems in the county's educational system lie, in any immediate sense. They are to be found instead in the Negro schools and in the Negro community. Problems here are very serious indeed. These schools, like most in Georgia, do far better than they did a few short years ago but, still, fewer than 40% of the students reach grade ten, and only about one in seven graduate from high school (see Table 6). When it is recognized that for these Negro children in Burke, as almost anywhere else in similar areas, a high school diploma represents, on the average, a level of academic and intellectual development far short of the typical tenth grade student in the United States (see Table 5) the seriousness of this problem can be seen. It appears probable that among the 400-450 Negro children of a given age in the county, fewer than 20 will ever develop intellectually and academically to a point where they might be called average in this nation. Of about 4,500 school children, 4,200 must be classified as academically retarded or slow by the end of their school careers. This appalling fact is evidently characteristic of the rural South.

Although there are some differences, the similarities between Burke's schools and those of Edgefield are more marked than the differences. Those differences that exist are not large. The white schools in Edgefield County seem a little more open to the world, and somewhat more intellectually diverse and stimulating. Strom Thurmond High School in Edgefield is not only well equipped, but reflects an attempt to incorporate new ideas in school planning into its structure. The new Waynesboro High School in Burke County is much less well equipped, and does not show signs of such an attempt. Perhaps another symptom, or perhaps a cause, of this difference is the fact that the white high schools in Edgefield were recently consolidated in spite of an ancient football rivalry. The Negro schools are fully consolidated, a little less well equipped than the Negro schools in Burke County, and more than in Burke Negro schoolmen seemed committed to working within the current framework and to not attempting any serious alteration of the prospects of their students. To repeat, these differences are not large, and are, of course, mainly impressions. The accomplishments of both school systems are similar, whether one is talking about Negro children or white, and we believe that both of these school systems are at least as good as most similar rural systems. We must also emphasize that whatever criticism we might make of these schools—and obviously many are possible—the thing that sets them apart from others in this country is not their physical arrangements, their curricula, their books, or even the professional characteristics of their teachers. What is different is the product.

We suspect many people will find this assertion hard to accept, since it is part of the widely believed American educational mythology that all educational deficiencies can be attributed to poor teaching. This is false.* We are not claiming, of course, that these schools are staffed by the cream of the crop, and we do not deny that better teachers, better books, libraries, and other facilities might, here as everywhere else, improve matters—a little at least, and maybe even a lot. But we do not believe that achievement scores of the sort shown in Table 5 can be explained this way, if for no other reason than that these schools and these teachers are not very different from those to be found elsewhere. Many cities which pay high salaries and which have adequate equipment have whole schools of students who perform no better than these children, probably for many of the same reasons, most of which depend on who the children are. The reason is plain. As we noted earlier, education takes place in a cultural context. All over this country in communities in which children are "disadvantaged"—in city slums, on Indian reservations, among migrant workers—similar achievement scores are found. The currently popular term used to describe this phenomenon in educational circles is "cultural deprivation."

Giving it a name does not solve the problem or even explain its nature. The phenomenon has drawn a great deal of attention in recent years, focusing largely on the slums of large cities. But it is not just a problem of the cities. It is not just a problem of segregation or of poverty, and it can involve a majority of the children in a community. The serious and widespread deficiencies in the educational systems of the rural South cannot be readily solved within a standard framework. The schools of a county like Burke or Edgefield could be rather easily made to be like those of one of our "good" suburban systems in all respects but one, because they are not very different now. But they cannot be made "just like" because the students are different, they belong to a different culture, and the "standard" American school is ill-suited to their needs.

This matter has been the subject of some research, but much remains to be learned in spite of the recent attention it has been getting. Although current knowledge is largely derived from research among children in city slums, it provides some clues as to what kinds of educational procedure might be effective in a rural setting.

CHAPTER III

Cultural Deprivation*

Many children in the rural Black Belt, particularly Negro children, can be classified as "culturally deprived." We assert that it is for this reason that school is so relatively unsuccessful among these children.

What do we mean (and what do we not mean) when we say that some individual is "culturally deprived"? Broadly speaking, we mean that there have been omissions and deficiencies in the background of the individual so that in comparison with the "typical" individual in the culture under consideration he has had little opportunity to acquire the knowledge, skills, and abilities needed for successful functioning in society. In particular, then, we are asserting that the skills and abilities, the knowledge and information, and, to some extent, the values that the children of the very poor rural Southerner learn in their childhood at home, especially if they are Negro, do not provide an adequate foundation for their schooling.

Note that we are not saying that such children do not acquire any knowledge, ability, or values at home. However, there is no doubt that regardless of what these children do learn at home, they do not learn—or do not learn well—those things that the standard school procedures and patterns of organization make it necessary that children know in order to progress successfully in school.

In all groups to which the label "culturally deprived" has been applied, the children start school with marked language deficits. These deficiencies usually create difficulties in school work immediately, because language skills are needed for learning to read and most schools make reading the first and foremost order of business. The child who cannot succeed reasonably promptly in learning to read almost always faces continuous failure from that point on and may quite realistically lose hope of ever having any real school success even if he does gradually learn to read a bit.

The seriousness of the consequences of this language deficiency is much clearer than its exact nature. It has traditionally been assumed that lower class children—and, in fact, all those children rating low in language proficiency—have learning problems because they do not know enough words and thus lack the concepts needed. Such views have shaped the programs offered in most schools.

Educators have known for a long time that language facility is an important factor in academic success and programs to increase the vocabularies and language skills of children are part of the curricula of all schools. For example, direct vocabulary instruction, in which children compile lists of new words and look up their meanings, has been a technique used widely for many years. These traditional approaches are not, however, a hopeful line of attack, because, in spite of the effort and ingenuity that has been put into them, they have not done the job.

It now appears that vocabulary deficiencies may not be the root of the problem. In fact, culturally deprived children often use a rather large number of words accurately. To be sure, in comparison with the middle class children, those of the lower class are not nearly so familiar with the words normally used in the school, and it is true also that these children do not know much about many of the objects and paraphernalia of middle class life in America. Television is helping to change this. Because of this they have special problems in understanding many of the things talked about in their textbooks and in relating these things to their own lives. But it should be understood that this particular sort of problem is not so much a deficit as it is a difference. It is to be sure a difference that calls for action. A child can and should read about life in other places and other cultures; but he ought to read and learn about his own as well, since that is his base of reality and the beginning of all thought. In short, this so-called deficit is in the school material and not in the child's mind.

In any case, the importance of sheer knowledge of words is not entirely clear since recent work in this area suggests that the difficulty is more subtle. It lies in the flexibility and skill children develop in their language usage. Culturally deprived children (or adults for that matter) use a language that at first blush is not very different from that of anybody else. But on closer examination it appears that they use relatively large numbers of standard expressions and cliches that fit the situation generally, but that lack precision and clarity. The symbolism used is descriptive, concrete, visual, and of a low order of generality. Nuances of feeling are expressed by non-verbal means. The language used in a given situation lacks both the variety and specificity to the situation one finds in the language of middle class children and it deals with abstract ideas relatively rarely. Although he often knows the words needed, the culturally deprived child will seldom use alternative ways of saying something even though such variations can be used to make meanings clear, to draw distinction, and to add emphasis. Instead the same standard phrasing is used over and over. In addition, hypotheses and conditional statements are infrequent, as are all indications of tentativeness and uncertainty.

It seems probable that these and related deficits carry over to listening as well as reading skills, thereby creating extra problems for these children everywhere they turn. Perhaps more than any other single thing, they need to learn to play with language meanings, to learn to get variety and nuance of meaning into their speech, to increase their appreciation and awareness of the value in the distinctions and refinements of meaning that shifts in word order and the addition of subordinate and qualifying expressions can bring. We are talking about communication and the expression of ideas, and, therefore, this training must involve speech in use, and it must be functional in the children's lives from the start;* for this it follows that practice in communicating and elaborating their own ideas, not those of others, comes first. Furthermore, this practice must be extensive in each of as many kinds and varieties of situations as possible if it is seriously to affect the thinking of children.

*We hope very much that this notion will not be read as necessarily asking for more of the pedestrian "real life" material which seems to plague our school texts. Children find poetry, fantasy, and sheer word play (e.g., nonsense rhymes) intelligible and functional in their lives.

Conversations with adults aware of the possibilities of the language and concerned with helping the child learn to use it is, it seems, the most effective way for children to learn these language skills, at least until reading becomes a prominent part of the child's life (if it ever does), and perhaps still even then. Probably this training is most effective in the early pre-school years when basic language patterns are being established.

But use of language is not the only problem. Among others, all of which are very closely related to language, there is the apparently slower perceptual development of the disadvantaged child, i.e., his more restricted awareness of the perceptual discriminations possible among many sensory dimensions, such as size and volume. These children are not likely to be taught, or rewarded, at home for learning the appropriate quantitative discriminations among objects or to attach the proper descriptive labels to objects (e.g., "tall" rather than "big," and so on). Consequently, orderly development of abstract quantitative concepts is hindered.

Relative to middle class children, lower class children tend to be concrete minded; they are oriented toward objects and direct physical action, rather than toward abstractions and conceptual manipulation. They often continue more or less indefinitely to learn through motor or physical actions; that is, they tend to persist in a mode of thinking that depends on the manipulation of objects, whereas middle class children usually begin to shift to symbolic and verbal substitutes for action sometime between the ages of ten and fourteen.

Perhaps related to this is another intellectual difference which through its effect on motivation has far reaching educational consequences. Lower class children seem to have shorter attention spans, memory, and (therefore?) what may be called anticipation span; that is, they function more with reference to immediate than distant goals. For the middle class person, long range goals are usually fairly specific in character. In contrast, in the lower class the future is regarded in more general and vague notions and for the most part is not considered as something one controls through present action. Hence, present behavior has a kind of rational relation to future goals for the middle class person which it does not have for those in the lower class. The middle class person anticipates within a broader time perspective.

That culturally deprived children do not see as clearly specific long range goals to which present behavior appears to be rationally connected helps cause what has been called the "deferred gratification pattern." They are not inclined to delay or renounce impulse gratification in favor of future gain. Future goals have a degree of reality for middle class children which they do not have for lower class children. Middle class children are exposed to more consistent patterns of rewards and punishments for impulse control and achievement. The adult models to which they are exposed day after day manifest a degree of self-discipline not generally seen in the adults with whom the lower class has close emotional ties.

Anxiety reduction is probably also a factor in the disadvantaged person's failure to manifest the deferred gratification pattern. Grinding poverty and the intense threat under which he, especially if Negro, lives is almost certain to evoke a high level of anxiety, the reduction of which is to some extent effected through impulse gratification.

Passivity in the lower class child, especially the Negro, is another facet of the motivational pattern related to achievement. One important manifestation of this passivity in the school is the child's failure to ask questions and seek clarification where it is needed. That these children should tend to be passive is not surprising. Their first hand experience most certainly does not teach them that the environment can be manipulated, controlled, and changed by anything they do. The Negro boy is likely to come to school having had no direct experience with a successful male model.

This whole pattern—the tendency to be passive, impulse-directed, and to lack motivation for achievement—is related to and perhaps rooted in the child's concepts of self. The most pernicious psychological consequence of a caste system must surely be the tendency for individuals to accept as accurate for themselves the social definitions of inferiority inherent in the system.

For example, there are a number of studies which indicate (a) that Negroes from young childhood on tend toward low self-acceptance; (b) that Negro children of pre-school age express greater preference for white than Negro children; (c) that they are later than white children in acknowledging their racial identity; and (d) the result is that at an older age level Negro students tend to judge themselves inferior to white students even in the face of objective evidence tending to contradict such judgments.

Finally, we should add that the homes of these children do not help them do well in school for other reasons. The parents don't know how to teach their children how to learn. They tend to be particularly inept as teachers of their own children (again partly a language problem). Also the homes usually lack books and there are rarely places for students to read and study in peace and quiet.

In the face of all these severe problems, an ordinary school as typically constituted at present is fighting a losing battle. These schools are organized and run on the assumption that the child had been growing in the ordinary middle class home, and that he has had the years of direct individual training that this implies. Whenever this assumption is not justified the school tends to fail.

To succeed the school needs to provide substitutes for the experiences these children lack.

1. The children need extended contact with educated adults as early as possible in their lives; the school must provide many additional opportunities for these children to converse with each other, with older children, and with adults about all kinds of things. This experience should have a degree of direction and order and lead the child in the direction of the abstract.

2. The school must also provide the deprived children with more assistance in the important pre-adolescent years. First, they need help in learning to deal with problems using abstractions, both with words and with other symbol systems; thus the school must do more than it now does to help the children shift to adult patterns of thinking. Second, the school must help the child develop long range goals. This means that he must see visible and believable steps along the way to these goals. If he is to remain in contact with his family without conflict, the older members of his family, older brothers and sisters as well as parents, must also come to believe in both the goodness and the real possibility of these goals. Third, the school must provide the child with solid evidence that effort, persistence, and seif-discipline in school tasks are expected and rewarded.

3. To inculcate these attitudes and to avoid misunderstanding and conflict means that the adolescents and adults in the community must also be drawn into these efforts sufficiently both to support and at least to some degree understand the school's objectives.

CHAPTER IV

Specific Suggestions For Education

We have tried to make clear that education takes place in a social context. What schools can accomplish is tightly limited by the environment within which those schools operate. Schools of a rural slum are not likely to produce persons able to be constructive members of a community unless the school gets into the children's home and neighborhood life. It follows that an educational program which offers full opportunities for intellectual growth to all children is not possible where economic and other forms of social advancement are racially segregated. This is categorically true, we believe, for the Negro children. It is true as well for the white children, though present arrangements are much less unsatisfactory for their intellectual growth.

Education can be more successful when schools are desegregated. But only partially so, because, again, education occurs in a context, and when life and opportunities outside the school are segregated, the best efforts of schoolmen to develop the talents of students will be handicapped severely.

Even were all segregation removed in Black Belt counties, their educational problems would still be immense, because of the economic and cultural lags burdening them. We have said, therefore, that improvement of the schools along standard lines is not the answer. If the states of Georgia and South Carolina (or the United States) were to pour unstinted resources into Burke and Edgefield schools, the educational results would not be greatly different, if the added resources only helped the counties do what they are now doing better.

We have said that basic transformations of the Black Belt schools are needed, by which we mean new practices aimed at compensating for the cultural handicaps brought by the children to the school-door. Given the economics of the Black Belt, even such basic transformations cannot be expected to overcome the handicaps imposed by the environment on the children —schools cannot do everything—but in time, perhaps, they could reverse the environmental conditions, and they can, in any event, truly educate a larger proportion of the children than they now manage.

What we are going to describe here, then, will be some specific possible ways of proceeding. We do not claim that our suggestions are the prescription, but rather that they are examples of the sorts of things that are needed. In some cases, other alternatives are both possible and practical. As indicative of the kind of changes which we believe could result in more successful education in the rural South, we would suggest:

1. Nursery-kindergarten units for children ages three through five;
2. The use of boarding units for children in the middle grades (four, five, and six);
3. The employment of senior high school students in the system, so that all students from the tenth grade up who want or are interested in work will have an opportunity to earn at least $50 a month as a part of their school program;
4. An intercounty and college (or university) cooperative program involving a coordinated plan of consolidation, joint purchasing, and joint inservice and preservice teacher training programs in cooperation with the college.

Beyond these steps and out of them we would expect such things as expanded remedial reading and library services (e.g., a set of mobile reading clinics and mobile library-bookstores, selling paperback books at nominal cost, serving the associated counties), expanded guidance services, and various special education services using, in many cases, college personnel and facilities. One simple but essential step would be to insure that no child is inadequately fed (breakfast as well as free lunches should be offered) or clothed. We would also expect that Job Corps, Work Study, and Community Action Programs financed through the "poverty program" (Economic Opportunity Act of 1964) would be inaugurated. Furthermore, the school buildings should be open twelve or more hours a day; libraries and supervised study halls should be available afternoons and evenings; evening adult education programs should be offered; extensive summer programs should be developed; and so on indefinitely. We shall not describe all of these steps. Instead, we shall elaborate only the four steps suggested above.

A. The Nursery and Kindergarten Program

There is a tendency in some quarters to hold out nursery schools as a panacea for cultural deprivation; they are not that. Nevertheless, where, as in the Black Belt, the problem is the lack of educational growth in the home, there is a pressing need to get the children as early as possible into organized learning opportunities and to establish school-parent relationships. We think there should be a pre-school program for these five year olds.

This program would be aimed specifically at those coming from the poorest homes. Day-care centers and nursery schools do not necessarily prove very beneficial to children, so the nature of the program is all-important. The kind we are envisaging might be like that described by Gray and Klaus.*

Their program centered first on attitudes toward achievement; trying to increase the child's achievement motivation, his ability to persist toward a goal and to delay gratification, and to arouse interest in school-type activities such as listening to stories and looking at books. Secondly, they attempted to improve aptitudes for achievement by developing the more simple and basic concepts needed in school work, increasing perceptual discrimination, and improving language usage.

Gray and Klaus worked on number and color concepts and concepts concerning objects of the world in which they live. In addition they stressed position words and action categories, such as walk, run, jump, and hop. They tried to increase the children's abilities to recognize forms, shapes, and patterns and to discriminate among sounds, tastes, odors, and textures. In language development their major efforts consisted of encouraging the children to talk and in placing them in situations where language was necessary. The central operating feature of the program was the procedure of reinforcement. They used both concrete reinforcement, such as candy, and social reinforcement in the form of physical contact with adults: petting, hugging, and so forth. Throughout their work, particularly at the beginning, they made efforts to make sure that reinforcement of the behavior they desired was as immediate and consistent as possible. Gradually they moved away from concrete reinforcement and made efforts to develop verbal rewards as reinforcers.

A program of this sort, to be effective, calls for trained teachers and for careful planning. But if the teachers running each class thoroughly understand what it is they are trying to do they can quite readily and easily make use of assistants who are much less well-trained; high school students—both male and female—provided they receive some training related to the program, could work successfully and helpfully, to both themselves and the pupils, in such a nursery school situation. We would propose that high school students be offered a course in child care, and training as part of this course work, and that for pay—say $10 per week—they spend two three-hour periods a week acting as assistants to the teachers.* These teachers should be part of the staff of the high school course.

*Untrained adults might well be employed as aides also, and it should be evident that there are opportunities for tie-ins with adult education programs too.

A course of this sort is part of the curriculum of many high schools, but some preliminary training of all teachers would be desirable and probably easily arranged through the associated college.

Contact with parents is also essential, and one of the activities of the teachers should be to maintain it. Trained social workers should also be involved in this part of the program. Attendance of at least the three and four year olds should be a matter of parental choice. The regular teaching staff and the social workers should be the ones who reach the parents and persuade them to send their children to these schools. Having a pre-school program creates transportation problems both because of added numbers of children to carry and because these very young children should spend only three or four hours a day at school. These problems will be minimized, however, if the school system, instead of having large school buses, has a number of station wagons or smaller buses which carry maybe nine or ten children, and if carefully selected high school students be employed to drive them. For the system as a whole we would propose a large increase in the number of vehicles and a reduction in the size of their load so that the length of trips to and from school for most of the children in the system could be reduced. This would cost more money, but a fair portion of that money would go into the pockets of students in the system, and we believe that tangible economic rewards for staying in school are important for the same reasons that concrete reinforcement should be used initially in the pre-school classes.

We may finally note in passing that Gray and Klaus report gains in the I.Q.'s of the children with whom they dealt. Similar results have been obtained by a number of other researchers. But it is the nature of the program that counts, not the sheer existence of such schools. Nursery schools which are largely custodial institutions, in which the children play without a planned program of learning, do not serve any educational function and merely cost money.

B. Boarding Units

Our second suggestion is the establishment of boarding units connected with each of the elementary schools in the county. Like the preceding suggestion, this is directed primarily to the poorest children, and again its use would be voluntary and it would be necessary to gain agreement from the parents. We are proposing that children in grades four, five, and six spend three months each year in one of these boarding units, whenever the parents will agree to this.

As in the previous suggestion the important element is what is done, not the mere existence of these boarding units. Most important would be the quality of the teachers. The chance of extensive, warm, personal contact with adults who represent middle class patterns of living, thinking, and values represents one of the principal reasons for these units, since realistic models of this sort, for many of the children of the rural South, are not handy. In addition there would be the opportunity to live in an organized, stable environment in which books, music, art, and conversation are standard and valued activities.* They also would have a chance to get some intensive tutoring during this time, and could be helped with their study habits. It would be expected that each group would take a number of trips, especially to cities, since that is where many of them will in due course live.

In fact, it might be well to plan a fourth quarter in grade seven, spent at a residential unit in a city. Perhaps some cities would be willing to develop exchange programs with counties, sending children to the boarding units in the county and accepting an equal number in a unit in the city for a quarter. Three months in a city school accompanied by a careful orientation to the city might add much to the perspective of these children about the need for education. The city children could probably profit at least as much from a period of time in a rural community.

We envisage these units as having about 21 children, seven to eight from each grade, with approximately equal numbers of boys and girls. A unit would be staffed by two regular teachers who carry a partial load in that school (e.g., share classes with an intern), one male and one female, plus two intern teachers in training (one might have had some previous experience, while the other might be a beginner). In addition, from three to five high school students would be allotted to each unit each quarter to act as assistants before and after school. These students would not only be given room and board but also paid something — say $40 a month. The interns would also receive some pay, perhaps half-rate for the half-year that they would be expected to be in residence. In addition to the direct service that student assistants (drawn from the same cultural background) and interns would give, they would also provide the children with a sort of graduated series of models so that being like the — hopefully — admired and loved teacher might not seem so impossible; i.e., the children could see steps along the road and the possibility of variation. The regular school cafeteria could supply food but a dining room in the residence unit to be used for all three meals should be included in the plans. Mealtime is one of the periods of day when the kind of personal contact envisaged could be built.

The children would follow the regular school program by and large, would go home on weekends, and the teachers and interns would be expected to carry regular duties in the school. The teachers should receive a regular salary plus their room and board for these duties.* They should be required to go through a special training program offered by the associated college or university in order to hold these positions. This could lead to a hierarchy of teacher ranks justifying substantial salary differences, related to competence and responsibility rather than pure seniority and course credits. There is reason to believe that the position of teachers in these units would have substantial attraction to good young teachers and interns. Some of these interns could be in preservice training but it should also be possible to include an internship in these schools as a part of the advanced training of teachers with one or two years of experience. Further, it could result in drawing to such rural systems a quality of teacher that they have been having difficulty in finding at the present time.

There is substantial reason to believe that schools of this sort can have marked effects on students; but it is open to question whether or not the period of time suggested — three months for each of three or four years — would be adequate to accomplish these goals. However, it is believed that at the very least these schools would have positive effects on motivation of the youngsters and that they would go into junior high grades sufficiently interested in doing good work so that the school could hold them.

C. Employment of Senior High School Students in the School

The third proposal is that all interested students who are doing adequate work in the tenth grade and up have an opportunity to earn at least $10 a week as a part of their school program. By employing these students as assistants in the nursery school program, in the residential units, and as drivers, several hundred could be so employed. Other employment that would be both educational for them and a service to the school system surely could be found. It should be noted that by keeping these young people in school, competition with adults for jobs should be reduced. These activities can be of substantial educational value; in fact, the assistants in both the two programs suggested above could well turn out to be the chief beneficiaries of these programs if the school system and especially the teachers involved devote proper attention to helping these students understand what they are doing. The reason for paying the students, of course, is to provide an incentive for these adolescents to stay in school and to give them concrete representation of the fact that the community and society at large value their attendance in school. It should be noted that the school system should also have a fund to provide direct scholarship assistance to students who need it and, in special cases, without the associated duties. A school board should always remember that it costs parents money to send children to school, even though the schools do not charge tuition.

D. Intercounty Cooperation

Some problems of rural systems are simply a function of size: the system cannot justify the variety of specialized personnel and facilities that are practical in a large system where the cost can be spread over thousands of pupils. Segregation and the continued use of small, unconsolidated units obviously accentuate these problems but they will exist even if the schools are consolidated and integrated.

There should be, therefore, intercounty associations for the better coordination of school attendance areas. Once these associations are started, other cooperative ventures could develop, such as consolidated purchasing, intercounty technical service, and materials centers (audio-visual services, programmed materials, curriculum materials, professional publications, etc.). We are not talking about the consolidation of counties, but rather cooperative ventures.

Cogent reasons for intercounty consolidation and a statewide plan for it are embodied for Georgia in the recent "Peabody" report. It should be recalled, however, that children already spend more time in travel than is sound practice. Cooperation can solve this and will be needed for some children regardless of district size. School districts should not get so large and far away that the people in the district are not interested in them. The notion of local responsibility has merit because it is, potentially at least, a powerful educational force which can function to create a sense of belonging and identity in the students. This asset should not be discarded lightly.

An additional and possibly necessary feature of this intercounty cooperative association is the inclusion of a nearby teacher training institution, which probably would be necessary if the boarding units are to function in the manner we have described. What we are proposing here does not seem to us to exceed the institutional resources already available: in Georgia, for example, there are 10 public supported and 14 private colleges and universities now offering approved teacher training programs; in South Carolina, there are 4 and 13.

These colleges should establish teacher training programs analogous to the so-called internship master of arts in teaching programs now to be found at various universities around the country (e.g., Chicago, Emory, Harvard, Stanford, etc.), and some of their students should do their internship in the residential units of these counties. The colleges should also provide consultant services for the expanded remedial reading programs, guidance programs, and many other facets of both the regular and new programs. This arrangement would supply the interns and provide the school systems with a first chance at young beginning teachers as well as provide a way of obtaining special services to students and inservice training for teachers otherwise awkward to arrange. Large colleges might well become members of several such associations.

E. Is It Practical?

One immediate response to these recommendations will be assertions such as "Dreamwork," "Impractical," "It won't work," "You haven't considered. . . ," "Don't you realize that. . . ," and above all, "Too expensive." We believe these ideas can be made to work, and that the many difficulties we haven't discussed here (an endless number) can be solved, and that the product would justify the cost. This country could and should spend much more on the education of its children than is now the case. Furthermore, the cost of these proposals is high only relative to what a rural southern county now spends. It is probable that to do these things might cost twice what is now spent. Let us look at what it might cost in a county the size of Burke.

The nursery-kindergarten would add around $300 per pupil per year (early education is cheap, later on it is not) or about $250,000 a year. This figure is based on the assumption of roughly 800 pupils in a class of 20-25 students staffed by a senior teacher, a junior teacher (or a nonprofessional assistant), and two (or three) high school assistants. Each teacher would have two classes, one in the morning and one in the afternoon. This figure also is based on the assumption that present structures could be used with relatively small alterations and additions.

The boarding units might seem expensive at first glance but most of the salaries could be charged to the regular instructional budget. The staff would be carrying teaching loads in the school at about ¾ rate (two teachers and two interns carrying three classes). Consequently, the eight or nine boarding units a county the size of Burke might require would probably cost no more than $300,000 a year.

The student assistance program (beyond that accounted for in the two preceding items) would add another $300,000, assuming that about 800 students in senior high school would be earning about $10 a week. This totals $850,000. The consolidation and intercounty cooperation should at least break even since substantial efficiency would be gained.

To be cautious, and to allow for the additional steps we mentioned but have not detailed, add $250,000 more for a total of $1,100,000, a figure that is a bit under the 1964 school budget in Burke County. Since Burke spent about $265 per child in average daily attendance in 1963-64, and since we are hopefully adding about 25-30% to the average daily attendance count, the per pupil figure comes to around $400, an outrageously modest figure which is under the national median (because we are not proposing here to change the salary scale of the teachers, though probably we should).

"Where does this million plus come from?" First of all, through proper tax equalization measures and by raising assessments to a proper level (e.g., 50% of fair value), the county itself could raise much more. Furthermore, many features could be financed by state and federal funds now available; e.g., Title IV of the Civil Rights Act, the Economic Opportunity Act, the National Defense Education Act, and above all, the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965. The colleges' costs would partly be included in their regular budget since they now train teachers; furthermore, summer and in-service institutes (summer schools for children running on shortened days offer very good teacher training possibilities) can often be financed through federal programs. Additional state funds for cooperative undertakings should be forthcoming. It does not seem fanciful to us, therefore, to expect that federal funds would (and should) play a large role in meeting this budget and that the state would add to the additional local effort. In short, we believe that suggestions as basic as ours could be adapted to most rural counties and could be financed if the community were really interested in its children's education. All of our recommendations are directed toward doing something about the problems of learning that children with certain kinds of backgrounds are likely to have. In the Black Belt South, most of these children are Negro, but that they are has nothing to do with the reasons for our recommendations.

The communities in the rural South must become genuine communities in which every person is a member with a stake in community growth and development. The educational problems of these communities ramify into the problems of the whole social and economic context. We have tried to suggest that the transformation of education in some sense calls for the transformation of a community. We think such a transformation can be brought about in the South only with the help of genuine local effort and concern. Our recommendations are based upon the belief that sound educational decisions must be directed toward bringing about the maximum development of all the children in a community and upon the belief that the maximum growth and enrichment of a community cannot be achieved unless every member of the community has, and can be led to see that he has, a real stake in the outcome of community affairs.

[1] Data are for 1963-64 for Burke County, and for 1962-63 for Edgefield County.

[2] Elementary schools in Burke vary in the number of grades in the school, but all figures are for grades 1-7 inclusive for Burke County, and grades 1-8 in Edgefield.

[3] Includes non-teaching principals.

[4] Almost all of the remainder is from the state; federal funds are not important in the budgets of these systems, especially in Burke County.

[5] The difference between the counties largely represents two factors: teacher-pupil ratios and its teacher scales, for the periods considered. It may be noted that Georgia has one scale whereas S. C. has scales that depend on scores on the National Teacher Exam, a test emphasizing verbal facility. Negro teachers tend to score low on this test.

[1] The figures in the body of the table indicate the number of children of a given age (column heading) in a given grade (row heading). Thus, for example, of 155 white children age 14, 83 and 26 were in grades 9 and 10 respectively. The remaining 44 were over age for grade being in grades 5, 6, 7, and 8.

REPORT OF PROGRAM ACTIVITIES

It can be said -- with only slight exaggeration -- that 1965 was a year of maturing for the South.

With the possible exception of Alabama, those in the region who made the important traditional decisions generally showed awareness of the desirability of at least a semblance of stability and progress in race relations.

The tragedy of Watts was treated with smugness in some quarters. After all, it occurred in the "North." Generally, though, it was treated with concern. Frequently there arose the question, "Can it happen here?" Here in Atlanta, in Charlotte, in Richmond, in Memphis? More often than not there was the enlightened answer, "It can."

During the past year, the people of the region attempted to digest the results of two important new developments: the implementation of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the execution of the War on Poverty. Neither was a very satisfying experience. Both have created new promise and new disillusionment, new participants and new critics. They were, however, uniquely important for they have dominated the human relations movement as well as a number of other fields of interest and will continue to do so during 1966.

A year earlier, during the summer of 1964, the Civil Rights Act was ushered in optimistically with widespread, though far from complete, voluntary compliance with Title VI on public accommodations. Nothing else was to go as well.

The region has been little touched with the employment provisions of the Act and the new role of the federal government in the non-discriminatory expenditure of federal funds has been disappointing at best. This is especially true in the field of education.

To an unprecedented degree, Negro parents in rural and small town areas attempted to enroll their children in formerly white schools. The results were dismal. There were, and continue to be, considerable violence and reprisal. The statistics reflect the lack of progress. The least state, Alabama, now has approximately 800 or 0.25% of the Negro pupils attending formerly white schools. The highest, Texas, has an estimated 75,340 or 20% of Negro pupils in desegregated situations. The region-wide total is 5.23% of Negro pupils in desegregated schools. This is the result after eleven years of implementation of the Supreme Court's decision of May 17, 1954.

Given these facts it is understandable that Negro parents are bitterly disillusioned with the contrast between the unprecedented national promise and the execution of the law by the U. S. Office of Education and other federal agencies. In varying degrees this disappointment and a growing cynicism are a reaction to all of the role of the federal government in race related matters in the region. This includes, among others, economics and jobs, urban renewal, law enforcement and voter registration. The lack of faith in the established institutions of the society and the growing lack of respect for the federal establishment have serious consequences and the trend must be reversed by legitimate changes in policy and program.

Somewhat the same conclusions can be reached about the War on Poverty. There were many inexcusable mistakes which need no further documentation here. There is one, the most significant, which deserves mention. It is the mistake of overpromising. Even given the wisest leadership and the soundest of plans, there was an obvious limit to what could be accomplished quickly. Yet from the highest offices in the land have come ringing promises about jobs, training, housing, health care and all the rest. Through the media, especially television, these promises have been heard by the most disadvantaged people in the region. To a surprising degree these promises were believed and embraced. It has been a cruel process. Some, relatively few, have not had this experience. They have been helped. Many of those untouched by the programs have surrendered further to apathy and hopelessness. Others have transferred their disillusionment to an anger destructive to the individual and dangerous for the society.

Yet, while the grounds for legitimate criticism are staggering, no one expects pure progress on an ideal schedule. It must, therefore, be noted positively that these programs and involvements of the federal government, and innumerable other events and forces, have contributed substantially to the region and are largely responsible for the region's somewhat changed self. We have benefitted considerably and at the close of the year the South was a healthier place than it had been twelve months before.

Were it not for the ever present tragedy of the remaining injustice, it could be argued that the criticisms were so valid and the indignation was so strong only because the times hold such promise and the region's new awareness was so improved. In 1965 the region's standards for itself were higher.

The year ended with an important question still unanswered. Given the commendable new awareness and the higher standards, were these conditions yet of sufficient quality and depth to meet the old need and the new promise? We will know much of the answer in 1966.

THE SOUTHERN REGIONAL COUNCIL

Council Affairs

This report cannot be given without first noting the most significant event to affect the Council during 1965. That was, of course, the resignation of Leslie W. Dunbar, who left the agency on September 30 to become the Executive Director of the Field Foundation. To say the least, this man's contributions to the Council were great. He directed, and in some instances produced, the most important research of the organization. Perhaps even more importantly, he set the tone and the direction of the Council during the difficult period of what has been at least the gradual, and revolutionary, shift from the old South to the new.

At the Annual Meeting of the Southern Regional Council, held in Atlanta on November 15 and 16, 1965, the Members of the Council passed the following resolution which we think appropriate to include here:

> "The Southern Regional Council at its 22nd Annual Meeting expresses its respect and appreciation for the work and character of Leslie W. Dunbar as its executive director from 1961 to 1965, and as a member of its staff from 1959.
> "By his qualities of intellect, of eloquence, of practical skills in the guidance of human affairs, and of humane appreciation for people, Dr. Dunbar has made a lasting impression for the good on the present reality of the South, and has strengthened our hope for the attainment of the goals of equality and excellence.

"We remember (and will keep trying to justify) the strength of his belief in all the people of the South, and his confidence in the ability of all of us to achieve a people's highest potential.

"Leslie Dunbar is a man in a time of 'image making' who creates immediately the impression that here is an honest and honorable man, with a great depth of integrity, an integrity tempered by a gentleness of manner and spirit. Much of the success of his work with us is attributable to the mark of his personality, the impact of this 'image' of his on the South and the nation.

"But more important is the fact known to us who know him that the impression he makes is not merely 'an image,' but is the very substance of this most remarkable man with whom we worked and with whom we are still associated in mutual concerns and beliefs, and whom we hold in affection and respect.

"We have been honored by our association with him."

At the Annual Meeting the Members of the Council heard the recommendation of the Nominating Committee that Mr. John H. Wheeler be re-elected President. This recommendation was unanimously -- and enthusiastically -- adopted. At the first meeting in January, Dr. Raymond M. Wheeler was re-elected Chairman of the Executive Committee. Thus, the two senior policy posts continue to be occupied by men both named Wheeler and both from the state of North Carolina. We are extremely fortunate to have Mr. John H. Wheeler, President of the Mechanics and Farmers Bank, Durham, and Dr. Raymond M. Wheeler, physician of Charlotte, in these positions.

Elected as Vice-Presidents for the coming year were Miss Josephine Wilkins and Dr. Rufus Clement of Atlanta, Dr. Stephen J. Wright of Nashville and Mr. Paul Christopher of Knoxville. Mr. Joseph F. Haas of Atlanta was re-elected Counsel. We are fortunate, too, to have the guidance of these people who have served the Council long and well.

There were two changes in the membership of the Executive Committee. Mr. Marion A. Wright of Linville Falls, North Carolina, a former President of SRC and for some years a Vice-President, was elected to the Committee. Mrs. J. N. Rayzor of Houston, Texas, informed us she could no longer serve on the Executive Committee. Mrs. Martin Harvey of Jackson, Mississippi, was elected to fill that vacancy. Re-elected to the Executive Committee were: James McBride Dabbs, Mayesville, South Carolina; Albert W. Dent, New Orleans, Louisiana; C. G. Gomillion, Tuskegee Institute, Alabama; McNeill Smith, Greensboro, North Carolina; H. Franklin Williams, Coral Gables, Florida; and, Thomas W. Young, Norfolk, Virginia.

The officers of the Council also serve on the Executive Committee.

During the year the Council lost the leadership of three members because they moved from the region. They were: Mr. Patrick J. Owens, formerly of Little Rock, who moved to Detroit to become Editor of the Detroit Free Press; Professor James Silver, formerly of Oxford, Mississippi, who has become Professor of History at Notre Dame University; and The Rt. Rev. John E. Hines, formerly of Houston, who became Presiding Bishop of the Episcopal Church with headquarters in New York City.

To fill these vacancies Mr. Henry Lehmann, a businessman of Ormond Beach, Florida, was elected to the Class of 1966 and Dr. A. D. Beittel, whose term expired in 1965, was re-elected to the Class of 1968.

New members elected to the Class of 1969 were: J. William Becker, Little Rock, Arkansas; Donald Hollowell, Atlanta, Georgia; Mrs. Barbara Jordan, Houston, Texas; William H. Maness, Jacksonville, Florida; Hollis F. Price, Memphis, Tennessee; Claude Ramsey, Jackson, Mississippi; and Mrs. Martha Ragland, Nashville, Tennessee.

On the recommendation of the Executive Committee the Council elected two Life Fellows: Miss Lillian Smith of Clayton, Georgia, and Mr. Paul E. Green of Chapel Hill, North Carolina. Perhaps no two persons have contributed more to the Council's areas of concern and we welcome these two distinguished people and warmly anticipate their fellowship and guidance.

Council Members are being involved in the affairs of the organization to an unprecedented degree. The Executive Committee continues the primary responsibility for all Council affairs and is dependent on the work of the Personnel and Finance Committees. In 1964 the Development Committee was organized primarily for the purpose of seeking financial support from within the region. This is a new area for the Council and it will be extremely difficult for this Committee to meet its goals. However, under the chairmanship of Miss Josephine Wilkins, a commendable job has been done during 1965. With our substantial growth in that area, a Special Projects

Advisory Committee has been formed under the Chairmanship of Dr. Charles G. Gomillion of Tuskegee Institute. This Committee has had two meetings and is making a considerable contribution to the development of these programs. The new Voter Education Project has a special advisory committee and a special committee has been formed to consider the future relationships among the state councils on human relations and between them and the Council. We hope during 1966 to involve a number of other Members in specific subject areas. The membership of the Council represents one of the strongest collections of talent, as well as concern, in the region and we would like to take maximum advantage of that talent.

The Department of Field Activities

The programs and growth of the state councils on human relations were again during 1965 the major concern of this department. This effort to establish a genuine community-by-community interracial movement throughout the region has gone through lean, hard years and -- for all the progress and growth -- is still in its infancy in most states.

We have not been fully aware, I think, of the significance of the tremendous difficulties in developing this program. It is so much easier to identify a single issue, study it, take action on it, and clarify it in the mind of the public than it is to establish in a community a council of local people to be concerned day-by-day with the problems which affect them and the programs which will join them.

Part of the problem of these councils has been that the idea was too right too soon. These groups advocated the simple but vital idea that people must join together to understand each other and to seek a resolution to their problems. In time it became responsible and respectable for many people to say this. But, in some instances, by that time those who had said these things first had "lost their effectiveness."

Another serious problem has been that membership and staff were interested in "doing something," not in building organizations. To a point this is commendable as well as understandable. You don't find and enlist dedicated people and then expect their primary interest to be the seemingly bureaucratic one of raising funds and recruiting members. Yet, the council movement will not succeed unless it has a base of strength in local funds and membership. During the past several years SRC has emphasized this point and it is generally being accepted by the state councils.

Perhaps the most serious problem of all, and related to the above, is the one of southern philanthrophy. We do not have in the region a tradition of adequately supporting financially the causes we endorse or even of understanding that we must support them first if we expect anyone else to do so. This, too, is changing, but it is a painful and slow process.

For all the serious problems, it was a good year for the state councils. Eight of these groups have been staffed regularly since 1954-1955; they are Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Tennessee and Arkansas. One, Mississippi, began a staffed operation last January after having been driven out of existence in 1957. Louisiana remains unstaffed, though we hope to see this corrected in 1966. Texas has no state-wide organization, but has a vigorous and highly effective Houston Council. At the height of their strength during 1965, these groups employed 22 professional workers, achieved by the end of the year a membership of approximately 12,000 and raised within their states more than $100,000. A total of approximately $300,000 was spent by them during the year.

Among the significant program highlights were the nine Head Start programs with 26 centers sponsored by four state councils and one local council in communities that otherwise would not have had this resource for pre-school children; these were in Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, North Carolina and Houston, Texas.

In many areas Head Starts, as well as a number of other federally funded programs, were supported and assisted by councils though not sponsored by them.

All of the councils were active early in the year and through the summer in the area of school integration. This activity concerned itself especially with reaching Negro parents and informing them of pertinent rules and regulations and thereafter, where they wished, in assisting children who sought transfer to formerly white schools. Several of the councils held statewide or area conferences for this purpose. In late summer and thereafter this interest all too often had to shift to helping victims of intimidation and violence who had taken advantage of the opportunities theoretically available to them. This was especially true of the Georgia and Alabama Councils.

As indicated by the introduction to this report, major programs for all the councils related to the new national legislation and the organization of the war on poverty. We saw clear indications during the year past that none of these laws or programs can be effective unless private agencies form at least an informal partnership with public agencies and publicly funded programs. Assisting, supporting, interpreting, recruiting for, and monitoring the federal programs and agencies were a major contribution of the councils during 1965.

For some years SRC has contributed, through its grants-in-aid program, slightly more than $50,000 per year in support of the state council programs. While valuable, this assistance has been inadequate and was being annually reduced for each council as other needs had to be considered. For instance, in 1965 the Mississippi Council was reorganized and had to be supported along with the rest. In December we received word from the Ford Foundation of a grant of $100,000 per year for three years in support of the SRC grants-in-aid program for the state councils. These funds are for the purpose of upgrading and increasing the number of staff persons in the state councils and will be a tremendous help.

In cooperation with the National Sharecroppers Fund we began in 1965 the Rural Advancement Program. This was an effort to place with several of the state councils an additional staff person to concentrate on programs with persons in rural and small town areas. We were, by the end of the year, able to provide the complete costs of such programs in four states: South Carolina, Georgia, Florida and Alabama.

In memory of that outstanding man, the Council in 1964 initiated the George S. Mitchell Award. This was designated to be given annually to the state council which had the highest percentage increase in membership. In 1965 the Alabama Council won this award and the accompanying gift of $1,000. To win the award this council had grown from a membership of 400 at the beginning of 1965 to more than 1,200 by November of the year. (They also raised more than $20,000 from within the state of Alabama during the year.) It was a remarkable record, but no more than indicative of the soundness of the program of that group.

On November 15 Mrs. Alice Mitchell came to Atlanta to present the award named for her husband. Mrs. Mitchell's presentation was perhaps the finest moment of the 1965 Annual Meeting.

Partially because of the record cited above, J. Edwin Stanfield, director of the Alabama Council, has been appointed the new director of field activities for SRC and came to that post in January 1966.

In 1965 the Council was again asked to serve as secretariat of the Southern Interagency Conference, the informal gathering quarterly of more than forty agencies and groups concerned with race relations in the region. We are anxious to continue this service for we feel that an exchange of information and cooperation among the various agencies is now more important than ever.

The Council's director of women's work, Mrs. M. E. Tilly, continued in her own inimitable way. The SRC-sponsored region-wide meeting of the Fellowship of the Concerned was held in Atlanta on November 3 and 4. From that meeting came special concern with southern justice and the operation of the courts. Recalling a highly successful effort of almost twenty years ago, the ladies of this meeting again requested that teams of women regularly visit every courthouse in the region as quiet observers to remind the court officials of citizens' interest in justice. Shortly we shall attempt to call a meeting of the leadership of a number of national women's organizations to seek their cooperation in this program.

For the second year we have cooperated with the program of Books for Equal Education. This is co-sponsored by the National Student Association and the U. S. Youth Council. During the summer we offered office space and secretarial help to this sound project which collected and distributed approximately 300,000 books mostly for Negro college libraries, community centers, freedom schools, and the like.

During the spring and summer, in cooperation with the American Friends Service Committee we developed a program to reach a maximum number of parents, especially in rural and small town areas, to inform them of the situation related to school desegregation in September. The core of this program was a packet of factual materials and guides to community organization, pupil recruitment, transfer procedures and proper complaint channels. Approximately 1,400 of these packets were mailed to persons in more than 280 communities. These mailings were followed by other materials and staff assistance was provided where requested and when possible. The response to this effort was far greater than we had anticipated and proved what we had long suspected: Negro parents in rural and small town areas, including those who are poorly educated and in vulnerable economic situations, are anxious that their children have the best possible education and will go to great lengths to get their children into the best schools available if allowed to do so.

We have cooperated with, offered some office services to, and co-sponsored two publications with the new southern office of the American Civil Liberties Union. Late in the year we agreed to work closely with a new program being developed by the Women's Division of Christian Service of the Methodist Church. By the end of the year we had under serious consideration joint programs with the Anti-Defamation League and the American Jewish Committee. We continue our cooperation and interest in the southern program of the National Student Association, the student councils on human relations and other student groups. Reluctantly, because of the demands of other program commitments which we have made, we declined an invitation of the Peace Corps to conduct one or more training programs for overseas volunteers.

Research and Information

These two "departments" are reported on under one title because we hope to make a single unit of them. The Council began with an information section. When resources permitted, a research division was added. Both have grown considerably. Since these two interests overlap, and in large measure complement each other, we hope to bring them under one heading operationally as well as in title. In fact, there is need for an identifiable Center for Research and Information of the Council. We will pursue this during 1966 but it will require thoughtful planning as well as additional resources.

The Southern Regional Council is many things. It is, above all else, a recorder of facts and an interpreter of events. Repeatedly we have seen the importance and the influence of these functions. We must do whatever is necessary to continue these functions, and to preserve the integrity of this part of our operation.

In terms of staff, research and information are now our largest operation. Including the immediately related project service personnel there are now ten persons working in this section. This is almost one-third of our total staff. The senior person in this group with responsibility for the overall operation is Pat Watters, director of information.

Another senior person in the division, editor Margaret Long, is about to embark on one of the more exciting efforts yet envisioned by the Council. She will be, in effect, a "writer in residence" with time and an opportunity to make maximum use of her unique skills. Equally important, she will have the responsibility of working with and encouraging new talent in the fields of fiction and non-fiction, poetry and music.

In mid-year, Samuel L. Adams came with us as director of research. Mr. Adams, formerly a reporter on the St. Petersburg Times, was a 1965 nominee for the Pulitzer Prize and a runner-up for the Lane Bryant Award for excellence in journalism.

In January the Council published Federal Anti-Poverty Programs, a brief description of the specifics of the new programs, designed for wide distribution. This was followed in March by a second publication on this subject, New Federal Programs in the South.

In April the Council published, in cooperation with the southern office of the American Civil Liberties Union, Racial Desegregation in the Southern Federal Courts. This special report documented the overwhelming whiteness of the personnel of these courts.

In May the Council issued one of its most significant publications. This was Encounter with the Future, by Pat Watters. This study, based on some months of preparation, attempted to delve into one of the most complex areas of concern: the role of the young civil rights workers, their motives, their accomplishments and the effects on them of their experiences. Pat Watters wrote, we believe, objectively and compassionately. The reactions were astounding. SNCC concurred in the accuracy of the report's conclusions; Lillian Smith called it "beautiful." Charles Silberman referred to it as "a tremendous contribution." Seldom have we grappled with such a difficult subject -- or a more essential one -- and seldom have we made such an impact.

At the fall meeting of the Southern Interagency Conference the Council was asked to do research in and publish a report on what had happened in school desegregation in September. The result was the special report, September, 1965 School Desegregation: Old Problems Under a New Law, released in October. Although the U. S. Office of Education and the Southern Education Reporting Service shared information with us, we found it extremely difficult to determine statistically what had taken place. The report, when released, did, however, contain the most reliable information available. This information was substantially more correct than that issued earlier by the Office of Education and helped to dispel the then widespread opinion that school desegregation was proceeding with marked new success.

By October there was concern over the acquittal of several persons accused of murdering civil rights workers and a growing demand that something be done to correct this. Much of this demand was being voiced in terms of a special law to protect these workers. We felt that whatever corrective measures were called for, there was a need to understand that all Negroes and most of the South's poor were frequently discriminated against in the courts. The issue was, we felt, not protection for a special group, but for all persons discriminated against. In cooperation with the southern office of ACLU, the Council issued the report, Southern Justice: An Indictment, a documentation of the problem with a special emphasis on jury reform. We believe the report was effective. This report and the earlier one on discrimination in federal courts were perhaps the most complete and definitive reporting on one of the year's most crucial problems. It was only after the second SRC publication and a good six months after the first that the national press became aware that justice was a new and pressing concern of the civil rights movement.

October was a productive month. The third publication issued during that month was The Migrant Farmer: A Psychiatric Study, by M. Robert Coles, M.D. For two years this brilliant psychiatrist worked with us, largely conducting research on the effects of school desegregation on the children involved. We are pleased that Dr. Coles has continued to serve as a consultant since going to Harvard and feel that in this publication he added a new dimension to the concerns with migrant workers.

In December, a study two years in preparation was issued. This was Black Belt Schools: Beyond Desegregation. This study, prepared by Dr. Ross Green and three of his colleagues at the Emory University School of Education, was our first major effort to probe the problems involved in providing quality education for the region's children. A major foundation has invited us to explore with them how the recommendations of this report can be implemented.

We are pleased with our continuing opportunities for close cooperation and consultation with the representatives of the press and other media and with the growing opportunities to deal with persons in these professions within the region. For example, the St. Petersburg (Fla.) Times reprinted in full our report on Southern Justice..., as did several newspapers outside the region. We are complimented when some of the southern press report objectively our fact-finding in news columns and then take occasion on the editorial page to differ with our conclusions. (The Columbia /S.C./ Record referred to us editorially as "sedate and witless," but devoted considerable space to our report on school desegregation -- and did not dispute the facts in that report.) We think these relationships are of the utmost importance and that any disagreements lead to honest and healthy dialogue.

Throughout this report there are many references to our interest in the appropriate programs of the federal government. Much of this interest falls, of course, on our information and research departments. One unique problem arising from this interest bears mention here. To an unfortunate degree commentary on a particular federal program, or the intricacies of that program, is all too often seen as a partisan endorsement of or criticism of an individual or an administration. We would like to believe that the objective of achieving a just and abundant society is not a partisan matter. Certainly our continuing cooperation with these efforts and our comments on them will be conducted in that belief.

At its October meeting, the Executive Committee approved a major policy change in our publications programs. Since its beginning, SRC has published the monthly magazine New South. This publication will now be on a quarterly basis with the winter issue to appear in mid-February. We feel this magazine, of approximately 100 pages per issue, will give us an opportunity for greater diversity and cover more fully some of the subject areas undertaken. During the first issue we will publish articles by Robert Coles, Vincent Harding, Margaret Long, Robert Sherrill. We will have included excerpts from the new edition of James Silver's Mississippi, The Closed Society, and a reprint of one of the lectures in the William Cook Lecture Series of Leslie W. Dunbar at the University of Michigan. Articles will be included that will be reprinted for considerably wider distribution than that of the magazine's distribution. With the new format there will be experimentation in theme issues dealing with urban planning, regional economics, school desegregation, voting, and other pertinent subject areas. We are excited about the potentials of the New South.

As the year ended, certain conclusions were reached about our research and information functions. In general, policy emphasis will continue on serving efficiently and fully the information needs of individuals, from college professors to newspaper reporters to students doing term papers. Sizeable increases in number and varieties of publications published by the Council are anticipated. This reflects in part expansion of program, in part the growing demand for materials that people can work with -- how-to-do-it pamphlets, descriptions of governmental processes, and the like. At the same time, there will be no let-up in the effort to provide information and opinion about events and issues as the need arises.

The need is clear for continued emphasis in research and publications on the areas of past concern: education, justice, housing, government, poverty, jobs, voting. New resources will allow us to address ourselves to these needs. What will likely be more innovative this year will be an intensification of treatment, a seeing of the problems in new dimensions. Community action, for example, seems to be an approach that will be applicable to nearly all of these areas of concern. The role of planning is another new part of the program. Beyond these things which can be anticipated, a first principle will continue to be alertness for the unexpected, and flexibility to be able to handle it adequately, including awareness of opportunity to treat problems before they become critical.

In an exploratory vein, there will be attention to the possibility of developing material in media not previously used by SRC, including movies and recordings. This may be a necessity as more and more local groups come into being with a need for these resources. There will be attention also to the possibilities of constructive service to the South in encouraging and collecting creative work in the area and folklore of the area.

Efforts will be made to compile information and recollections of the founders and movers of SRC and others for SRC archives and otherwise to improve condition, cataloguing and availability of the archives. The Atlanta University Library staff will cooperate in this undertaking.

New and Expanded Programs

In October, the Ford Foundation made a substantial grant to the Council. This support and that of other foundations will enable us to considerably expand several of our programs and to institute others.

These programs fall under three general headings: Governmental Programs, Special Studies, and Technical Assistance. The interests of the several projects overlap considerably and we hope to achieve a high degree of cooperation among them. In brief description they are:

(1) Governmental Programs:

A. Urban Planning Project. This project will attempt, with both short term and long term programs and goals, to slow the trend toward establishing ghettos and to develop positive programs to reverse that trend. Major emphasis will be on offering technical assistance to urban planners and other public officials. (This is already being done in one city in Florida.) We shall attempt also to offer assistance to the appropriate departments of the federal government and to study, analyze, and interpret the role of these departments. Special attention will be given to the regional and state offices of these departments. Consultative services will be available to local groups who wish to develop an interest in this area and to those who wish to stabilize a changing neighborhood or those who want to begin the process of neighborhood integration. Programs concerned with neighborhood improvement will also be assisted. An incidental but important part of this project will be to work with schools of architecture and urban planning in curriculum development to see that planners now being trained will have a better understanding of the necessary technical and social aspects of adequate urban planning.

To direct this project we have been fortunate to secure Mr. Moreland Smith, the distinguished architect formerly of Montgomery, Alabama. Mr. Smith has been at work since November and the progress to date is most encouraging.

B. Fair Employment and Anti-Poverty Programs. Emphasis here will be on offering assistance to and analyzing the effectiveness of all appropriate federal programs, especially those concerned with employment and poverty. An effort will be made to develop greater community interest in these programs. In cooperation with several of the other projects considerable materials will be prepared to reach those for whom the federal programs are intended. We hope to encourage the federal agencies to prepare much more of this material themselves and to allow SRC and other private agencies to concentrate on the distribution of it. Consultants will be available to assist local groups in organizing and seeking federal assistance. Some attention too will be given to the role of state and local governments. A project director has not been secured for this program.

C. School Integration. We shall continue our interest in public school integration with emphasis on research in developing more adequate programs to bring about this essential change. Consultants will be available to assist parents and local groups who wish to contribute to this process. At this point it is generally premature for an agency like the Council, but we do anticipate a gradual shift in interest from the mechanics of school desegregation to the broad area of achieving quality education for the region's children. Responsibility for this program rests with several departments, primarily field and research. There is no program director.

2. Special Studies:

A. Welfare Programs. It is generally agreed by everyone, including those who administer them, that our welfare programs do not work. We shall attempt to conduct research for the purpose of developing sound ideas for more effective welfare programs. Consultants will be available to work with public officials and to work with local groups who wish to assist in this program in their communities.

B. Rehabilitation of Criminals and Penal Administration. In the fall we had a tentative agreement with Mr. George Randall, then Director of Prisons for North Carolina, to direct this project. Mr. Randall, whose accomplishments in this area are outstanding, was to serve as a full-time consultant to officials in other states. Subsequently, the state of Oregon lured

Mr. Randall and it was a real loss to SRC and to the region. (As we told Mr. Randall, any state enlightened enough to employ him did not need his services.) We continue to look for a director of this project, but the results to date are not encouraging. It may, therefore, be necessary to redesign the project. Whether or not this is done, the project will provide consultants to persons in public and private life concerned with these subjects and research will be conducted.

C. Technological Unemployment. This is a research program designed to go beyond further documentation of the fact that automation is creating unemployment. As a first step we hope to determine more accurately than heretofore has been done the true number of unemployed and the location and characteristics of these persons. If we are able to do this we believe it will provide us and others with information essential for sound programs.

3. Technical Assistance:

A. Project in Community Organization.

There are now springing up in the region innumerable self-help programs. These range from city slum improvement efforts to agricultural co-operatives. We hope to learn as much as we can of these programs and to make this information available to others. Technical consultants will be available. (We have just been asked to provide a specialist in vegetable marketing, and could use immediately a candle maker, a home construction specialist and innumerable others.) We hope, too, to experiment with the idea of using persons from slums or tenant farms who have participated in sound programs as consultants to others in like circumstances. How-to-do-it materials will be prepared, efforts will be made to put private groups in touch with appropriate federal programs, and in some instances we shall attempt to assist groups in developing their programs to the point where they qualify for federal assistance.

In this project, as with the Voter Education Project, considerable experimentation will be done in the use of college students during the school year as well as in the summer.

Thus far we have learned enough to become concerned about the development of many of these programs without sufficient knowledge or resources. The idea of the all-embracing magic of co-operatives has spread to an alarming degree and raises the possibility of serious disillusionment. As a result of this, one of our first publications will suggest some of the limitations of co-operatives, point out some of the essential requirements for successful efforts and identify situations to be avoided.

Many of these interests will be developed in cooperation with the Rural Advancement Project staff of the four state councils, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida and Alabama.

Al Ulmer, formerly of the field department, is director of this project. We find that his Peace Corps experience in Nigeria, his work on a Kibbutz in Israel, and his year-long private work in one of Atlanta's slums have provided him with a uniquely valuable background for this assignment.

B. Labor Education Program. This program is conducted in cooperation with the National Institute of Labor Education of American University. The primary focus of the labor program is on work with intermediate union leadership in the South on problems of racial relations and the contemporary South. "Intermediate leadership" will be broadly defined to embrace at least top local union leadership up to and including full-time union staff.
The methods of the labor program will be largely educational. In the first instance this will mean developing two-to-five-day programs devoted to regional problems with a primary emphasis on matters pertaining to civil rights and race relations. In other instances, SRC staff will be involved in programs concerned with other issues sponsored by unions or other groups in which it was thought wise to include some human relations material.

On occasion, the labor program will experiment with other ways for reaching unionists. For example, it is frequently more effective to deal with race relations problems within the normal framework of the union's operation. So, if the consideration of such matters can be included in stewards' training or union administration classes, so much the better.

The program will continue to perform a liaison function between human relations agencies and unions. It will serve in a consultant capacity to individuals and organizations where this is seen to be mutually desirable. The program will seek to develop and distribute materials pertaining to the Council's areas of interest which will be useable within the labor movement.

The program works cooperatively with the state AFL-CIO bodies in the South and with the national AFL-CIO departments of Civil Rights and Education. Similarly, the program will cooperate with the national unions represented in the region which have education or civil rights programs.

To direct this program we have been fortunate to secure Dr. Emory F. Via, on leave from the University of Wisconsin. It is very good to have back this valuable man who worked with us in the late '50's.

C. The Voter Education Project. This project is essentially a continuation of the Council's earlier program of voter education. However, a number of changes have been made, reflecting the new situations and the new needs of the voters and potential voters of the region. For instance, a much greater emphasis will be placed on citizenship education. We have no illusions of the difficulty of providing programs of sound non-partisan, civic education. But we believe such programs are necessary and we shall attempt to develop them. Many of these programs will be conducted in the larger cities where voter registration is relatively high. Frequently they will be conducted along with programs of voter registration and community organization.

In the rural and small town areas emphasis will probably continue to be on voter registration, though here too we find a substantial need for organization and citizenship training. To the extent that violence and reprisals continue to be used as means to prevent the participation of Negroes in the political process this is especially true.

We plan to offer a number of "work scholarships" to students during the summer and during the school year for work with local groups. We hope in this way to tap the energy and resources of these young people and to offer encouragement and training for their continued participation in these vital areas of citizenship.

There are plans to utilize southern campuses for workshops and to prepare voter education materials on private and federal betterment efforts where feasible. Our research effort will document techniques, develop needed materials, encourage effective reporting by participants, and interpret events through frequent publications.

We have assurances of cooperation in implementing these programs, from the five major civil rights agencies and expressions of serious interest from many local organizations. Since grants of funds and personnel assignments will be arranged directly with these groups, we require only a core of staff -- project director, secretary, fiscal officer, research aide, and for the foreseeable future, a field director. Resources which cut across special interest boundaries are provided the project by an Advisory Committee, which held its first meeting December 30, 1965.

Only a portion of the funds needed for this project are currently available. However, we hope to secure and invest more than $300,000 in this program during the year.

Vernon E. Jordan, formerly assistant to the director, is director of this project. In July Mr. Jordan took a leave of absence to serve as a special consultant in the regional Office of Economic Opportunity. It is good to have him back and to have his considerable talents available for this important work.

This opportunity to expand the Council's programs and to develop new ones is, to us, both exciting and significant. It has long been a dream of our founders and Members that the Council be a repository of skills needed for the region's development. We are now approaching the realization of that dream and the timing is appropriate.

For a number of years this was not possible because the resources were not available. Such resources as there were had to be used to meet the most immediate situations. This has not been unfortunate. The Council has made a considerable contribution. It has grown painfully and slowly but in the process we have grown in influence and gained invaluable experience.

During the past months I have given considerable thought to these matters, what the Council is and what this position of director is.

In the case of the Council, I recently attempted to describe the organization to one of our supporters. In that description was the following:

"We must hasten to add, as we always must in accounts of this nature, that the Southern Regional Council has no illusions of its power or ability to change the region. At best we can look for opportunities that are promising, needs that are pressing, new developments that require interpretation, or situations which hang in delicate balance. We can only hope that such resources as we can bring to bear will make a difference. These skills and this realistic appraisal of limitations may be the reason the Council is unique, as we think it is. The Council is a strange agency, neither completely academic research-oriented in nature, nor action-oriented in the usual sense of that term. It is an agency, born out of the particular southern mind, which is designed in the best judgment of those who direct it to meet the particular southern need. This, in the sense of building a society as well as in the sense of correcting old evils, leads to the merging of specialized skills, interests, and resources..."

So I see the Southern Regional Council.

My understanding of the position of the executive director is considerably less clear. Certainly it is, more than ever before, an administrative one. During the past months, in staff, programs and budget, we have literally exploded. It is not easy, in this field, to spend a great deal of money with wisdom and maximum efficiency. It is extremely difficult to find a large number of new staff persons, to incorporate them into the organization and to make the best use of their talents. We have had a great deal of this to accomplish in a very short time. I can report to you in all honesty that the beginnings of this undertaking have not been disappointing. But, I have no illusions that it is only a beginning.

There is yet much to be done before we can be comfortable with these magnificent new resources and opportunities.

We must be careful too, no matter what resources we find, to keep our lean look and to depend on the Council's traditional ingenuity. It may be heresy to make this observation, but I firmly believe we are blessed by having no endowment. It is good that the Council and staff are regularly submitted to scrutiny and evaluation not only by the Members of the Council but by outside observers as well. We are an institution, but we became a valuable one because of this leanness and this ingenuity and a good measure of brilliance on the part of those who have led the organization. It would be fatal to get to the point where these characteristics were not essential to survival.

In the concluding paragraph of my report to you at the Annual Meeting I attempted to say this to you in the following way: "We have come too far now -- late as it is -- and too many have done too much -- to fail at this point. We have many opportunities -- some of them as a direct result of having succeeded in doing what we tried to do. We have gone through lean, hard years. Now, neither we the Council nor we the South can let progress and opportunity defeat us when adversity could not."

Finally, this position of Executive Director of the Southern Regional Council -- whatever else -- is a magnificent one for any person who loves this region and has a concern for its development. This is true for many of our positions at SRC and I, and we all, pledge to you the most productive year we are capable of providing.

INTRODUCTION

To the average family, buying a house is the most important business transaction it will ever undertake. Yet few of us have a clear understanding of all that is involved in the process. For how large a loan should one obligate oneself? What neighborhood considerations should one take into account in looking for a house; what structural considerations in the house itself? What is the meaning of such terms as equity, title deed, mortgage? This pamphlet, prepared by Mrs. Jerry Dell Gimarc of the Southern Regional Council's Urban Planning Project, attempts to answer fully, and yet in language comprehensible to the lay reader, these and many other questions related to the buying of a house.

In presenting this information we have chosen a fictionalized account of the "adventures" of a Negro family considering home ownership for the first time. The course the Walters take is the same that any buyer must pursue. The definitions of terms and the check list for deciding on a good house are the same for anyone looking for a house in any neighborhood or city. There is special emphasis on the problems and complications which may face a Negro family who find their house outside traditionally Negro neighborhoods. At the end of the pamphlet is a list of other booklets and materials which may be helpful and of interest to the prospective house buyer.

This pamphlet is a work book. The reader will notice that various check lists are provided throughout the text. The boxes in the left hand margins should be checked as each step is completed. The pamphlet is designed to be used, marked on, and made valuable as your own house-buying guide.

1 WHY NOT BUY?

One evening after the dinner dishes were put away and the three children tucked into bed, Sue turned to Joe and asked, "Why can't we buy a house of our own?" Joe hesitated, for he had heard this question before, then replied, "Perhaps we could." And so began a long search as the Walters looked carefully at their desires, financial capability, future plans and willingness to undertake the responsibilities and costs of home ownership.

First, they wrote down the reasons why they wanted to buy.

☐ 1. MORE LIVING SPACE FOR THE MONEY THEY WERE SPENDING ON RENT. They had three growing children, and the family was probably not complete. The Walters lived in a small six-apartment unit in a two bedroom apartment; they were already feeling crowded, but apartments with enough space cost more than they could pay.

☐ 2. They wanted more PRIVACY. Their landlord, who lived nearby, dropped by too often to "look around," and the people in the other part of the apartment building were too near.

☐ 3. Sue wanted a GARDEN of her own. She could have used some ground where they were, but it didn't seem worthwhile to invest in plantings for someone else's property.

☐ 4. The Walters liked their town and intended to remain there. A house of their own would give the children a sense of STABILITY or PERMANENCY. Sue and Joe wanted to be part of a community where they felt they belonged!

☐ 5. Two of the children were already in school, but the neighborhood school was overcrowded and did not offer as much individual attention to the pupils as the Walters had hoped. In another neighborhood they believed they would find BETTER SCHOOLS.

☐ 6. Although the thought of the house as a "home" was uppermost in their minds, the Walters also considered the purchase as a sort of enforced savings, for they would be slowly building up EQUITY, or redeemable value, in the property as they paid for it over the years.

☐ 7. In the not too distant future Joe hoped to own his own small business, a garage, where he would be his own boss. He realized that the purchase of a house, with prompt and regular payments, would give him a good CREDIT RATING. When he was ready to establish his garage, he would have less trouble borrowing the money for his business.

Then the Walters made a list of the reasons why they should not buy.

☐ 1. They wanted to remain in their town, but it was quite possible that they might move out of the state in the next five years. If so, could they SELL the house quickly? If not, then they might own a house in one city and be living in another state!

☐ 2. They would have to take CARE OF THE HOUSE themselves if they owned it; would have to see about repairs, repainting, pay real estate and other taxes.

☐ 3. They would have to BUDGET carefully, making sure part of their weekly income was put aside to pay for monthly house notes. This might be difficult for a while until they got used to planning for bills and expenses on a monthly and sometimes a yearly basis.

Sue and Joe considered and reviewed the lists carefully. The list for buying was much longer and weightier than the one against, but they were concerned that they really might not be able to afford buying. They did not want to go beyond their means and fail to meet their payments. They decided they would take a careful look at their present income and expenditures to see how much they could spend on shelter. They had heard several simple formulas about how much a family could or should spend for (1) monthly house notes: 25 or 30% of the effective monthly income (the income for a month less deducted federal and state taxes, social security and retirement fund) or (2) total price: two and a half times the family yearly income. But the Walters wanted more than these simple formulas; they wanted to look closer at their own spending. To do this they made a list of their income, living expenses and obligations and gave as true a picture as they could from the records they had of the real expenditures they made for each item and of the income they could count on.

INCOME (Monthly)

Joe's Take Home Pay	$ _____
Any other steady income*	$ _____
TOTAL INCOME	$ _____

*Sue worked occasionally in a department store, but since her job wasn't steady and since she had small children at home and was still of childbearing age they did not count any income from her.

LIVING EXPENSES (Besides Housing)

Food (per month)	$ _____
Clothing (per month)	$ _____
Education (money required by children for school fees)	$ _____
Medical and dental (budgeted)	$ _____
Automobile (or other transportation) - operating expenses, repairs	$ _____
Recreation & entertainment (books, hobby supplies, newspapers, magazines, sports events, movies, etc.)	$ _____
Miscellaneous (dues to organizations, charitable contributions, church)	$ _____
Savings (as a regular item)	$ _____
Taxes (besides those deducted, such as ad valorem or property tax on autos)	$ _____
TOTAL	$ _____

FIXED OBLIGATIONS (Monthly)

Installment payments (on car, furniture, appliances, etc.)	$ _____
Other debts, payments (personal loans, debts, etc.)	$ _____
Insurance premiums (auto, theft or life - any premium not already deducted from check)	$ _____
State income tax (if not deducted)	$ _____
Retirement fund or health insurance (if not deducted)	$ _____
Miscellaneous (support of parents, alimony, child support, etc.)	$ _____
TOTAL	$ _____

To figure monthly expenses from weekly figures, Sue and Joe multiplied the weekly figure by fifty-two (for the number of weeks in a year) and divided by twelve (for the number of months).

$$\text{Monthly} = \frac{\text{weekly x 52}}{12}$$

Sue and Joe added their fixed obligations to their living expenses and got a total which was their total monthly expenditures besides housing expenses. They subtracted this total from their total income. The difference was what they had per month for housing expenses.

TOTAL MONTHLY EXPENSES (besides housing)		$————
FIXED MONTHLY OBLIGATIONS	+	$————
TOTAL MONTHLY EXPENDITURES		$————
TOTAL MONTHLY INCOME		$————
TOTAL MONTHLY EXPENDITURES	—	$————
HOUSING MONEY PER MONTH		$————

The housing money had to include:
MORTGAGE LOAN — Principal and interest
Plus Mortgage Insurance Premium (if FHA loan)
Hazard Insurance Premium
Taxes and any special assessments
Estimated maintenance and repairs
Estimated utilities — heat, light, water, air conditioning

Sue and Joe decided that in the next week they would learn what all the words meant — mortgage, interest, principal, equity, and so on.

They learned these definitions:

☐ 1. LOAN — the money they would have to borrow to buy a house; the money lent them either by a lending institution alone or lent by a lending institution and secured (underwritten) by the Veterans Administration or Federal Housing Administration for buying a house.

☐ 2. INTEREST — the fee they would have to pay the lending institution for the loan; the amount of money they would be charged for using the money borrowed. The interest was usually given as a per cent, like 5½% or 6%, and meant they must pay that per cent each year for the amount of money borrowed for the number of years borrowed.

borrowed. (Some payments also include small amounts for taxes and insurance.) At first, most of the monthly payment is taken up by the interest on the loan and only a small amount goes to pay back the money borrowed. The amount each month which must go to interest declines over the years of the loan as the principal is repaid. Each month a little more of the monthly payment is applied to pay the principal, and the owner's equity thus increases.

☐ 4. DOWN PAYMENT — the money given as partial payment for the house at the time of purchase.

☐ 5. MORTGAGE — agreement for a long-term loan where the lender has a claim on the property as security for the money he has lent and may foreclose, or take back the property, if the borrower does not pay the amount borrowed according to a time schedule.

☐ 6. EQUITY — the actual dollars and cents value that an owner has in his home — in effect, his investment — once all fees and charges against his property have been paid.

☐ 7. TITLE DEED — legal document stating that a piece of property belongs to the owner and was transferred to him from the previous owner with no legitimate claim remaining unsatisfied. When real estate is sold an investigation of the records must be made to show that the seller really owns the property, that it is without debts or ownership claims on the property.

☐ 8. TITLE INSURANCE — insurance to make sure that the lender does not lose money if the title to a property is defective. This insurance provides funds to defend the insured title against any claims (such as a forged deed or an undisclosed heir) and to pay the insured party (the lender, and at a small additional cost the buyer, can also be covered) against loss. This insurance cost is paid only once, at the time of sale, and is a per cent of the sales price.

☐ 10. TAXES AND SPECIAL ASSESSMENTS — property owners must pay real estate taxes which are based on the appraised value of the property. These taxes pay for schools, civic improvements, parks, etc. Usually, they, too, are part of the monthly payment to the lender. He charges the borrower part of the tax month by month, accumulates it, then pays the tax on the property for the borrower when it falls due.

☐ 11. CLOSING COSTS — these are a number of items which are charged to the buyer at the time of purchase. Often they are unexpected, and they must be paid for in cash. They include the cost of title insurance and the amount of hazard insurance premium due for the remainder of the year, the amount of real estate tax due for the remainder of the year, recording fees which are charged by state and and sometimes city offices to record the change of ownership, recording tax fees for states which require revenue stamps (tax stamps) to be placed on the documents filed. Besides these charges are the fees the lending institution may demand for the services of experts used to check items for borrower before he is lent money — title search or the check to see that the title to the property is in good order, property survey or the check on the dimensions of the property the lender may lend his money on, appraisal of the value of the property to guide the lender in deciding how much to lend, personal credit report on the borrower to see if he is a good credit risk, has a steady job and pays his debts. A fee for the outside lawyer who is attending to the seller's interest may be charged to the buyer. The buyer's own lawyer's bill is in addition and does not usually appear at closing.

The Walters were staggered by all the complicated terms, but gradually, after studying them for a while, they began to feel more comfortable with the definitions. One thing they were terribly curious about was how much the closing costs would be since they had to be paid for in CASH at the time the mortgage agreement was signed, and this was in addition to the CASH required for the down payment. They found these costs depended on the property and its locality but that the CLOSING COSTS are a per cent of the cost of the house. They usually range between 3 to 5 per cent. This varies according to the location of the house and the custom of the neighborhood. Who pays the costs can be negotiated. The seller may agree to pay some of them. The terms of payment can be established prior to the closing of the sale. The buyer's lawyer should check these terms and costs to get the best possible terms for his client.

After considerable discussion Sue and Joe thought they would be able to buy if they could find a modestly priced house and get a good loan. They had saved $1,500.00 which they could use for down payment and closing costs. Now they began to find out the difference between the three types of loans — conventional, FHA, and VA.

CONVENTIONAL LOANS — two-party loans between the borrower and lender. The "security" the borrower offers is the house he is buying and his own value as a credit risk, as a person who can and will repay the money lent. Usually the terms of a conventional loan are more conservative than for FHA or VA. This means that these loans require a larger down payment, sometimes a higher interest rate, and often are for shorter terms than in the other two classes. Conventional loans have more flexible terms. For people who are able to make a down payment of several thousand dollars they are easier to get. These loans are obtainable through banks, savings and loan associations, insurance companies and mortgage bankers. FHA and VA loans may also be obtained at the same places.

FHA LOANS — a three-party agreement. Besides the borrower and lender (as with a conventional loan) the Federal Housing Administration, a government agency, is involved. The FHA tells the lender that in addition to the borrower's credit rating and house it will offer further security for the loan by insuring the lender against the loss he might incur if the borrower does not live up to the loan agreement.

The borrower, however, is charged ½ of 1% more for this insurance. This money goes into a common pool to pay the losses when borrowers default. This additional security often enables the borrower to get a larger loan than he could ordinarily. At present the borrower, if approved, could get a loan for all but three per cent of the total price of the house. This means that up to a $15,000 loan, a borrower might have to pay only 3% as down payment. And in some cases the time allowed for repayment may be up to 40 years. The rate of interest which can be charged for the loan is usually smaller than for a conventional loan. A family, then, with little ready cash could buy a house under this type of loan.

VA LOANS — also a three-party agreement. This time the Veterans Administration guarantees repayment of part (60%) of the loan up to a maximum of $7,500.00. This extra guarantee means as with FHA that the lender may be willing to lend more than he would for a conventional loan. Also, the VA requires no down payment, if this is satisfactory with the lender. But not everyone can qualify for a VA loan. One must have served in the U. S. Armed Forces during World War II, the Korean War, or since January, 1955.

The FHA-insured or VA-guaranteed loans must be applied for at the time of application for a loan from a lending institution. FHA and VA do not lend money directly (there are some exceptions for VA), but they do guarantee loans from lending institutions under the special conditions mentioned above. The borrower fills out an FHA or VA application form when he applies for a loan. These applications are usually available at the lending institutions. (For comparison of the different types of loans, see the chart at the back of the book.)

The Walters studied their finances and the possibilities of getting a satisfactory loan and decided they would be able to afford to buy without undue stress on their present budget. Although they were paying a good deal for shelter, they felt that with their small regular savings for emergencies they could accept the responsibility of home ownership and long-term debt with little likelihood of defaulting or being unable to make payments, and they knew they would keep their house in good condition, well-maintained at all times. They had talked to enough FHA people and loan people to know that if they couldn't make payments and their house was repossessed they would find it very difficult to get a loan ever again. This then was a serious step for them, but one they felt was reasonable and justified.

But now that they had decided they would buy if they could find a house which suited them they began to wonder how to locate "their" house and how to tell if it were a good buy when they found a place which appealed to them.

2 | THE SEARCH

Early the next Sunday morning Sue and Joe grabbed the paper, got out a map of town, found pencil and paper and began looking through the classified section for "Houses for Sale." They decided they would become acquainted with what was available in all sections of the city for several weeks, go through some of the houses, drive by others, so they would get used to "looking." They read the ads and prices, checked the locations on the map, bundled the children into the car and set off.

They first wanted to look at the location of the houses. Joe had made up a check list of things the location of "their" house must have and Sue had added a few items of her own. They drove and looked and checked— "a" for excellent, "b" for good, "c" for fair and "d" for bad — each location according to these needs:

What did the other houses look like, were they nicely kept, was the house they were interested in the best of the group or one of the less impressive in the area? (They had read that it was better to buy a less expensive house in a good neighborhood than the best house in a poorer neighborhood, at least as far as resale value was concerned.)

☐ 2. NEARNESS TO WORK AND GOOD TRANSPORTATION FACILITIES

Sue sometimes needed the Walters' car to run errands; Joe didn't want to live on the other side of town from the large repair shop where he was depended on as foreman mechanic. He wanted to be able to reach his job by public transportation without spending several hours going back and forth.

- Was there a bus running near-by?
- What was its schedule?
- Would it take Sue to town quickly and conveniently at non-rush hours?

☐ 3. GOOD SCHOOLS

To both the Walters it was very important to know where the nearest grade school was and what sort of program it had.

- Was it overcrowded?

- Were its teachers well-qualified and interested in their teaching and their pupils (according to other parents in the neighborhood)?
- How far away was the high school and what sort of place was it? (After all, the children grew so fast.)
- Could the children walk to school without crossing streets with heavy traffic?

☐ 4. CHURCH
Sue wanted to make sure a church of their denomination was near so that the family could be involved in weekday activities as well as Sunday services.

☐ 5. CONVENIENTLY LOCATED SHOPPING AREAS
Sue would prefer being able to walk to local stores. Until they could afford a washing machine she would have to take the clothes to the laundromat. Was there one nearby?

☐ 6. RECREATION AREAS
The children would soon need a park or playground for games and activities.
- Were there any in the area?
- Could they be reached by the children without danger from heavily trafficked streets?
- Were these areas well lighted in the evenings and properly cared for by the city?

☐ 7. AWAY FROM HEAVILY TRAVELED STREETS
- Was the house protected from the noise and dust created by heavy traffic?
- Could the children walk to their activities without undue danger?

Sue and Joe found houses in several neighborhoods which got many more "a's" than "b's" and no "d's" at all. The following weeks were devoted to intensified examination of the houses offered for sale in the classified section of the paper. The Walters also contacted a real estate agent, told him their problems, price range and approximate neighborhood. They looked at many houses and from their experiences drew up yet another checklist to mark "a," "b," "c," and "d" for houses.

☐ 1. FLOOR PLAN—The Walters were looking for a house with a quiet area for sleeping set off from the rest of the house and buffered from the noises of other activities (by closets or halls). They wanted an area for entertaining and family activities (the living room and perhaps a dining room or den) which would allow these activities to proceed undisturbed by constant traffic to other rooms. They wanted adequate work space—the kitchen and a place for Joe to work on cars and keep his tools screened and private from the street and neighbors. They could find how well a house took care of these needs by drawing a floor plan and marking off the different areas in different colors. This showed easily how one area related to another and which areas overlapped. Sue and Joe wanted to make sure that the bathroom (or rooms) and kitchen could be reached from other rooms without going through bedrooms (a continuing disturbance in their present apartment).

☐ 2. ADEQUATE PLUMBING—Certainly Joe was not an expert and could not check pipes and the whole plumbing system, but he could and did apply simple tests to check water pressure by turning on the water in the bathroom lavatory, then flushing the commode. If the pressure fell there was not adequate water pressure. Joe also inquired about the water heater; he knew with his family of five he needed a 50-gallon tank, especially since they hoped to be able to afford an automatic washer soon and would need extra hot water. Joe asked about the guarantee on the heater, too; he knew it was false economy to put in a cheap heater which would soon give out. Some of the houses the Walters looked at were in new suburbs which did not have connections with the city sewerage system and were equipped instead with their own septic tanks. Joe always asked about this point, knowing that a septic tank poorly placed or inadequately drained or too small for its load was a danger to the whole neighborhood and especially to the people it serves. He decided he would contact the local health officer if he was seriously interested in one of these suburban houses and have him check the water and the septic tank.

☐ 3. ELECTRIC SYSTEM—In their present apartment the Walters had had trouble with fuses blowing frequently. They knew they had used too many electrical appliances for the current, but they needed each item. Their OWN house must have enough wiring. Joe read that the minimum wiring standard currently being recommended by builders and electricians calls for 100-amp service that offers both 129- and 240-volt circuits and a basic capacity of 24,000 watts. This would be quite adequate for their small appliances and even a window air-conditioner in the bedroom window. When they inspected a house Joe went to the main service panel (where the wiring enters the house), opened it and counted the fuses or circuit breakers. If he found only six he knew the electrical capacity would be no better than in their apartment. Even eight fuses were only a little better. Sometimes the capacity rating was written on the panel. Joe decided he would call an electric utility representative or an electrician to check the capacity for him when they thought they had found THEIR house. While Joe was looking at the fuse box Sue was counting the electrical outlets in each room. One, she knew from experience, was not enough. It was dangerous as well as inconvenient to string extension cords all over the room from the one plug. In their dining room it was even worse because appliances had to be plugged into extension cords hanging from the light socket.

Two outlets would be an absolute minimum in each room and four should be the norm. Joe pointed out that increased outlets only was no relief from blown fuses without increased amperage (current). Joe hoped the house they chose would have an outdoor self-grounding electrical outlet for power tools, one that was covered to protect it from weather and children. He liked to work outside, doing odd jobs and working on cars; an outside plug would be a real convenience.

☐ 4. SOUND ROOF—Although Joe was not a roofing expert, he could and did look for ordinary signs of wear. Dry, cracked asphalt on the roof meant a new roof would be required soon. He also checked the flashing (metal strip around the chimney and at the place where different roof planes meet such as at the junction of roof and gable) to see whether it was visible and in good repair. Joe knew that most roof leaks occur at the flashing points when the flashing is not tight. Joe looked for rain gutters and down spouts and their condition. At the point where the down spout lets water out to the ground the best provision is a gutter which directs the water into the street, but the minimum is a splash block or concrete scoop which splashes the water off and away from the house. Letting the water run along the ground with no other provision for drainage meant erosion in the yard or standing puddles to breed mosquitoes and undermine the foundation of the house.

☐ 5. PROPER DRAINAGE OF LAND—Joe knew from experience that lowlying land, improperly drained, caused disagreeable consequences for the houses located on it. Besides the mosquitoes and probable termites there was constant mud (which the children played in and Sue scrubbed up). Grass and flowers wouldn't grow well. And the water against the house kept the wood damp; damp wood rotted. Joe was so concerned that the house they bought have proper drainage he made a point of checking the land around houses they were interested in after the rains. Joe did not accept the assurances of house owners or real estate agents.

☐ 6. DRY BASEMENT—In a few houses the Walters were shown basements. This was not common construction, but they could see some advantages for it. It could be used for storage, for a children's playroom, and it would be cool and comfortable in the summer. They checked the walls for tell-tale signs of moisture and checked the walls again after a rain. They asked neighbors if they had had trouble with their basements. And finally they looked carefully, inside and out, to see whether there were any high water marks. Sue remembered faintly that she had read of water backing up from a creek into one residential section of the town; was this the one?

☐ 7. SOUND FLOORS—In the rooms with wooden floors Sue and Joe walked carefully all around, looking for boards which seemed loose, looking for signs of moisture and heavy wear, trying to determine the slant (an indication of the settling of the house), trying to feel for soft spots in the floor which might indicate a bad brace. They attempted the same survey on the floors covered in vinyl tile, noting especially any places where the tile was loose or where the adhesive oozed through. Then they stepped back to see if the different flooring materials created a harmonious effect with each floor flowing into the next rather than every room having a different floor.

☐ 8. CONVENIENT ARRANGEMENT OF THE KITCHEN—While Joe looked over the roof and basement, Sue cast a critical eye over the kitchen since that was where she would be spending a great deal of her time. She wanted a place which would be large enough for the family to have room to eat in and one where she could look out the windows and keep an eye on the children playing. She looked to see if there were plenty of cabinets and if she could reach them without climbing on the kitchen stool each time she needed a muffin tin. Sue played cook in the kitchens of the houses they were interested in, trying out the "work triangle" or the path from sink to stove to refrigerator and back. She tried how the refrigerator door would fit, opened cabinets and drawers to see how much they interfered with one another. And she looked for adequate ventilation. She knew an open window simply didn't function well enough to take away cooking odors and heat. She had vowed that in her new house she would have an exhaust fan in her kitchen. Finally she made an especially careful check for electrical outlets. She liked to play the radio while she worked in the kitchen and it would be an inconvenience if she had to unplug it every time she used the toaster, or the electric iron.

☐ 9. ROOM FOR FUTURE GROWTH—Sue and Joe together stood back from the houses they were considering and thought where they might add another bedroom in five years or so, or possibly a large family room. They wanted their house to be able to grow with them as their family increased and as the children's demands for space increased with age. The Walters realized that what seemed enough land was not always the deciding factor for there were ordinances and zoning laws which restricted building which was too close to the street or too close to the property line. They decided they must find out about these laws for any house they thought they might buy.

After five weeks of looking at houses, Sue and Joe became very observant "lookers" and the children bored travelers. The family almost despaired of finding a suitable place already built. Sue and Joe began investigating building their house themselves. Their first question was where to find the sort of plans they might like. They discovered they had several courses.

1. ARCHITECT — His plans would be drawn up to fit their own unique needs as they explained them to him. This would take some time and a specific understanding of their needs and desires themselves plus the ability to express them specifically to the architect. The architect would continue submitting plans until all changes had been made and the plans accepted. This was time consuming for architect and client. They found that architects ordinarily would not take jobs for houses on budgets as limited as theirs. The architect must spend many hours drawing the plans, and he is paid a per cent, 8% to 15%, of the total cost of the house. Since they wanted to spend about $10,000 to $12,000 on the house it was uneconomical for an architect to take the job.

2. STOCK PLANS—These are plans drawn up by an architect and mass produced and distributed. They are available through government agencies, home and garden magazines, building material supply houses, lending institutions, builders' magazines, department stores, furniture stores and home plan services. The Walters looked through several plan books and found a plan they liked. They considered sending off for it. The cost of one set of drawings was $30 to $35. The drawings consisted of a set of blueprints, four to eight sheets showing the floor plan, foundation plan, all four elevations, the roof and wall framing schemes and various construction details. Generally included with the blueprints are a list of specifications (telling how deep to make the foundation piers, temperature when pouring concrete, etc.), a list of materials needed, and directions on doing the actual work. Sometimes there is also a blank contract which could be used for the agreement between builder and contractor. As Sue and Joe studied further the possibility of building they were a little hesitant because they felt they knew so little about it. They learned, for instance, that the lot they bought must be perfectly level if ready-made plans were used; if it were not there might be complications when altering the foundation plans. They were afraid to pick the plan and the contractor and then oversee the construction. They wanted to be able to look at the house as a finished product before buying.

3. READY-BUILT HOUSE — A friend suggested that one alternative might be to buy in a subdivision where the builder was showing model homes. Here the Walters could look at a house like the one which would be built for them. The friend cautioned them, however, that when looking at the model, they should look beyond the glamour, find out how much space they really had, how many of the fancy appliances and light fixtures came with the house and which were extras—and besides that, if they were truly interested, get all the specifications down in writing. He also advised them to inspect the building lot rather than picking it blindly off a subdivision map. They began to look at the builders' homes and seriously considered buying one of them.

While looking at these homes they found that this particular subdivision was financed by FHA and that both FHA and VA required builders to conform to certain standard specifications before they would insure the builder's loan. During construction of these houses FHA or VA officials make inspections to see that they are built according to plans filed with FHA or VA and according to the government specifications. This doesn't mean that the federal government is guaranteeing that the home will be satisfactory in every way, but only that it must conform to minimum building requirements. The owner's main reliance must be on the reputation and integrity of the builder chosen to build the house.

3 | CLOSING THE DEAL

Three more months of looking passed before the Walters found THEIR house. At least they thought it was the perfect house for their family; it seemed to pass all the tests they had created for judging houses. But they wondered if perhaps they were compromising or lowering their standards because they were tired of looking. Before making their final decision, before putting up "EARNEST MONEY" (the payment which said, "Hold the house for me till I see if I can get a loan"), they wisely decided to contract for a lawyer. They had never before needed any legal help, and they were wary of being tricked by an unscrupulous lawyer. They had heard stories about such people. In the neighborhood where they were living they knew there was a Legal Aid Office, so they went to it. Since their income was above the level which would allow them to be eligible for free service, the Legal Aid Office could not help them itself. It could and did, however, give them a list of names of reputable attorneys who would be willing to advise them for a reasonable fee. The Legal Aid Office told them that they were very wise in requesting this advice now. Their office had many clients who came in for help AFTER they had signed a contract —at a point when Legal Aid could be of no help since the agreement was already signed. Sue and Joe found a pleasant and patient attorney who told them that he would be happy to help them with the technicalities of home purchase. They arranged in advance what his fee would be, and the lawyer agreed to payments spread over three months.

Sue and Joe followed these precautions before deciding on their home:

☐ 1. LAWYER—They retained (or hired) an attorney to look after their interests. The lawyer made his own title search to double check the one made by the lending institution. He looked over the Walters' preliminary purchase agreement to buy the property, making sure that there was a clause which said their money would be returned in case they could not get the necessary loan. He drafted their loan note and mortgage since it was not done by the lender, but he would have examined the mortgage had it been drafted by the lender. And on the final day of the signing of the mortgage papers, he attended the meetings as the buyer's representative and read and approved all documents before the Walters signed. The cost of such services depends on the locality; sometimes it is 1% of the total sale price. Joe wisely inquired first so that he would be prepared for this bill which was separate from the bill presented at closing of the transaction.

☐ 2. TITLE SEARCH — The examination of records and documents concerning previous ownership to make certain that the title (or deed of ownership) to the property does not have any debts against it. This is ordinarily part of the fee presented by the lending institution at closing and a necessary prelude to obtaining the title insurance which is usually required by the lender. The cost ranges between $50.00 to $100.00 and may be listed as part of the cost of the title insurance.

☐ 3. TITLE INSURANCE — The Walters knew they would have to pay a certain amount for insurance to protect the lender from loss should the title to the property prove defective because of a prior claim even after the most careful search. As they inquired about this insurance they realized that their part of the equity (that portion of the property they paid for through down payment and later increased by paying on the loan) would not be insured in this insurance. If a claim were brought, and the court did not rule in their favor, they would lose all they had invested. The Walters also found that it did not cost much more to buy additional insurance with the same company to cover their own equity. The insurance, which is paid only once and is part of the closing costs or lender's fees, usually runs several hundred dollars.

☐ 4. PROPERTY SURVEY — Ordinarily this is a part of the requirements of the lender and is billed to the borrower as part of his costs at closing. The land surveyor checks the boundary lines of the property to make sure they coincide with the description on the deed. He also determines whether the buildings are set back from the street and property lines the distance required by community law. The lender will insist that this be done before agreeing to lend the money, and Joe wanted to be sure that the land and house he intended to buy was the property which belonged with the contract. Survey fees range from $30 to $75.

☐ 5. APPRAISER — If the loan is FHA or VA underwritten, then government appraisers will look at the property and decide what is a fair evaluation of the property's worth. By law these valuations must be made known to the purchaser. Conventional lenders also have the property appraised and its value as a long-term investment determined. The amount they lend will depend on this appraisal and their limitation by law of per-cent-of-value (such as 80% of evaluation for a $15,000 home). These appraisals are not made known to the borrower-buyer although the fee for the appraisal is generally part of the closing costs. The FHA appraisal fee is paid by the seller. For a conventional loan, the charge, if any, is usually part of a general "lending charge." It may be that a first-time buyer like the Walters—or even an often-time buyer—may want to hire his own appraiser from a private firm to look over the property, inside and out. The appraiser considers neighborhood stability, analyzes the present housing market by checking the price of houses sold in the area recently after inspecting them and comparing them with the house the buyer is interested in and the price he is being asked for it. Sue and Joe felt that it would be money well spent to hire an appraiser. They found that for a detailed analysis the price range would probably be $75 to $100 and for a less detailed study about $30. The man they hired was an experienced appraiser who belonged to the Society of Residential Appraisers; he was also a member of the Appraisal Institute. They made certain that he was a member of these organizations; the Walters had been told that such men were usually reasonable and well-trained professionals who knew their business. They found out about these organizations by asking questions of real estate agents and at a near-by consumer education facility.

☐ 6. EXPERT'S ADVICE — Joe was still concerned about aspects of the house which required an expert's eye to evaluate. How sound was it structurally? Was the roof in good condition? What was the state of the plumbing and electrical wiring? He learned that an architect might be able to answer these questions. Joe's attorney suggested he ask the local branch of the American Institute of Architects, the Chamber of Commerce or various lending institutions to recommend architects to make this survey. He was able to locate a willing and well-thought-of architect who agreed to the fee of $15.00 per hour for his inspection. The architect looked at the exterior and landscaping as well as basic construction (foundation, beams, roof supports, flooring, windows, doors, insulation, wiring, plumbing and floor plan). Joe could have engaged for a small fee separate roof, electrical and flooring experts to do the same sort of job the architect did. He decided on the architect for his own convenience. Although Joe's lawyer said that the payment of the fees was negotiable with the seller, Joe said and his lawyer agreed that it was better to have the experts on the buyer's payroll where their opinions would not be influenced by another's interest.

☐ 7. TERMITE INSPECTION — To make sure that the house was free from termites the Walters contacted an exterminating company which gave the house a free inspection. It was agreed that if termites were found the seller would pay the exterminating fee, which generally amounted to several hundred dollars, and contract for permanent bonding. The permanent bond meant the exterminating company would check for termites each year for a small continuing fee.

While the Walters were paying for advice from various people with specific training, they had set up for themselves a check list to make their own inquiries about their possible future home and its neighborhood.

☐ 1. ZONING — Sue was concerned about the zoning regulations for the neighborhood, whether they allowed for industrial sites, businesses and construction of multi-family dwellings. Besides that she wanted to know for herself how far back from the street property had to be set, whether it would be possible for Joe to have an office or small workshop at home when the time came for setting up his own business, and what, if any, other restrictions were on the use of the property. To find out about zoning, Sue first had to get the "legal description" of the property which means the lot number and addition. She finally found that she could get this "legal description" either from a copy of the tax receipt (which the seller had) or by calling the local auditor's office or city engineer and giving him the street address of the house they wanted to buy. Once she had the "legal description," Sue called the city zoning office (or planning commission) which gave her the regulations applicable to the property the Walters were considering buying. Sue also asked in the neighborhood whether these zoning regulations were strictly enforced or whether people with political influence could obtain special exceptions. She was glad to find that the property was protected by uniform application of the regulations.

☐ 2. FREEWAY CONSTRUCTION — With "legal description" in hand Sue went to the local planning commission and asked about future highway construction in that area. She inquired further about city plans for urban renewal areas, municipal facility construction, school construction and university expansion, anything which might affect the neighborhood where they wanted to buy. Although the planning commission couldn't guarantee that the neighborhood would be untouched for the next twenty-five years, Sue could see that they were working on plans which might take effect five or ten years from now. Their house seemed safe for the next ten years; none of the plans related to their neighborhood.

☐ 3. PROPERTY TAXES — The seller was willing when asked to show the Walters his tax statements which showed the amount of city and county property taxes he had paid in recent years, but to check once more Sue took the "legal description" with her and went to the tax offices (there turned out to be more than one). She asked about the tax rate, what use the taxes were put to in that area and what new facilities were being planned which would require new tax levies. From this trip she found that it would be likely that property taxes would rise in the next few years to pay for building a new school with an attached park.

☐ 4. CITY SERVICES — Sue asked the seller and neighbors about how efficient the garbage pick-up was and how it was paid for, about the sewage service and how it was supported; she checked street lights and inquired if broken or burnt-out lights were quickly repaired or replaced. She found where the nearest fire station was and how large the area was it had to serve. She located the nearest police precinct and asked neighbors if police protection were routine and satisfactory. After collecting answers from the seller and neighbors Sue called the various city services and inquired directly.

☐ 5. UTILITIES — From the seller Sue found what the approximate bills were per month for gas, electricity and water; then she checked with the utility companies to find what their rate per unit was for that neighborhood. The Walters wanted to know as definitely as possible what their monthly expenditures would be for utilities so they could budget accordingly.

☐ 6. INSURANCE — Joe knew that the lender required "hazard insurance," and he was curious about the rates for this insurance from various companies. The lender had suggested that the insurance be bought from a certain company, apparently an affiliated company, but Joe decided he would see if he could get the same coverage elsewhere for less. This was his privilege. Joe also wanted his own equity in the house covered and not just that part of the value of the house which was the lender's. Joe found that different locations meant different insurance rates—that the distance from the house to the nearest fire hydrant, the location and service area of the nearest fire station, and the construction of the house (frame, brick or stone) along with other factors all had a part in determining this rate. Joe also found that with just a little added to the monthly premiums for hazard insurance he could have a "homeowner's policy" which included not only fire and wind insurance but also insurance on personal belongings and insurance to cover liability for injuries others might suffer while on the Walters' property. Joe was still able to have the insurance premium prepaid as part of the monthly note on the house.

After checking off all these questions, Sue and Joe felt they had a pretty good idea of the true state of the house they wanted to buy, how much it would cost to live there and what might happen to the neighborhood over the next ten years or so. Finally they took a good hard look at the prospects of continued maintenance. They knew they would have to set aside a little each month for the maintenance jobs when they came. Fortunately, Joe was handy with tools and could do many repair jobs himself, but they knew the house would have to be repainted every few years for the house was frame, not brick. The yard needed some additional landscaping, and they would have to buy gardening tools. The roof would have to be replaced within the next ten years, and parts of the interior would soon need repainting.

All of this would not be cheap. And they had no intention of falling for the sales talk of the bogus repairmen who tricked people out of their money and sometimes their homes by pretending they would make repairs for little money and long terms but actually doing no work and taking the money. Joe said when they needed help on repairs for the house they would go to an old and established firm—after they had checked its reputation and called to see if there were any complaints filed against it with the Better Business Bureau.

With that last thought about the responsibilities for maintenance the Walters were ready to go ahead with the sale. They signed the preliminary sales papers and made their partial down payment (the "earnest money" which would be applied to the full down payment once the loan was approved) AFTER THEIR ATTORNEY HAD LOOKED OVER THE PAPERS. They applied for and secured an FHA-insured loan; they could not afford a very large down payment.

On the big day for the final settlement, the seller and his attorney met with the Walters and their attorney and the lender. The Walters' attorney read over the mortgage agreement and loan note and advised them to sign both. This done, the lender handed the seller a large check. Then a list of closing costs was presented to the Walters which included:

— fee for recording the deed
— fee for registering the title — fee for recording the mortgage — real estate transfer tax
— part of real estate tax remaining for the rest of the year (if prepaid by the seller)
— part of insurance payments for the remainder of the year (if prepaid by the seller)
— gas or water bills (that part, if any, prepaid by the seller)
— title insurance (includes charge for title search; the premium is paid only once)
— mortgage service charge (charge to pay for such expenses as inspections, preparing loan papers, lender's attorney's services, photographs, notary fees, processing fees, commission and such overhead as stationery and postage); usually 1% to 2½% of the sum borrowed — property survey (to determine lot lines and usually required by lender) — credit report (required by lender with charge passed on to borrower; cost about $10.00 for long-term residents of a town).

In total the closing costs for the Walters were about $500.00. They paid them along with the rest of the down payment from their savings and were told that the house would be theirs—in only 25 more years!

That evening the Walters celebrated with just the family. They had worked hard to select a house which would serve their needs, retain its value over the years of the loan and afterwards, grow with the family and be sound and comfortable and pretty. They had found such a house, they believed, and now it was theirs. Certainly, they knew they would have to be responsible, keep the house well painted and repaired, make their monthly payments on time. All this would mean careful budgeting. But they had considered the disadvantages and demands in advance and were willing to devote the time, thought and money required of home owners for the sake of a better home.

After the Walters were settled in their new home they were considered local experts on house buying among their old friends. When asked for advice, when friends wondered if they should expect any trouble if they bought or built in a neighborhood of another race, Sue and Joe gave them some suggestions. They understood the problems since they, too, were Negroes.

1. Although there is not a national fair housing law which requires that a seller not discriminate against a prospective buyer because of race or color, creed or national origin, there are some houses which must be sold on a non-discriminatory basis. These houses are those which have received FHA or VA assistance in construction (one-or two-family dwellings which have been occupied by the owner are not under this ruling) or those which have FHA or VA financing. The FHA or VA repossessed houses are often good buys. Anyone interested can obtain a list of properties acquired by FHA for resale in their state by contacting their state FHA office. For VA repossessed houses the buyer must contact a real estate agent to learn which properties are available.

2. Sometimes builders and sellers try to impose a "color tax" on non-white buyers. Checking to determine the truth of suspected discriminatory treatment could be organized through the state Council on Human Relations or the nearest Urban League office. After an interested Negro couple looked at a house, learned whether it was for sale, what price was asked, what financing terms were suggested by the seller, they would turn this information over to their white checking couple. This couple would give information very similar to that given by the Negro couple as to number in family, job, length of time working, financing needs, housing requirements, age, etc. The white couple, giving the seller this similar information, would then find out if the house were for sale, the price, financing, etc. If the answers varied considerably for the two couples, then their careful documentation of the questions, answers and treatment might constitute a strong case to prove that discrimination existed or that a "color tax" (higher price for the Negro prospective buyer) was being exacted. This information would only be useful directly for that property which is under the President's Executive Order 11063 forbidding discrimination in government aided or financed housing.

3. If the seller or builder or lender is seen to be discriminating where there is a legal basis to sustain a complaint, those being discriminated against should write the regional VA or FHA office, the national VA or FHA office, the regional U. S. Commission on Civil Rights and the state Advisory Committee to the U. S. Commission on Civil Rights. Any results follow long delays and continued prodding by the aggrieved party; even if no action is taken in time to assure that the minority group buyer is able to buy the property against which the complaint was filed, the complaint will probably make it easier for a Negro to buy similar property next time.

4. It may be that the neighborhood in which the Negro homeseeker is interested is hostile to minority groups. If so, some precautions Negroes might take are:

A. Do not appear too interested in the house you are looking at. Intense interest might cause panic in the neighborhood and give these people a chance to unite for disagreeable hostility. Instead, if a Negro homeseeker is interested, it might allay fears to have a white appraiser or white friend make the careful inspection of the house.

B. Engage a lawyer when serious looking and/or consideration of property begins. Forward all papers or information received to this lawyer. Have your lawyer make a careful title search; make sure the property survey is carried out and all checks possible on the property are made. The lawyer should examine carefully the preliminary sales agreement, the sales agreement and the agreement with the lender. These transactions must be as tightly drawn as possible.

C. If the house is not subject to the non-discriminatory directives of FHA and VA, then it may be necessary to use the services of a white friend to act as decoy buyer. In this case, he could buy the house himself for a price agreed on in advance with his Negro friend, who would become the owner by assuming the loan. The first buyer should first be released from liability for the loan; this places the full responsibility for repayment on the shoulders of the Negro buyer just as if he had contracted to buy the house from the initial owner.

D. Once the house is purchased and it appears that there is hostility in the neighborhood, notify the local law enforcement officials of any fears so that they may provide protection of property and person. In areas where the local police have not given equal protection to Negroes, then it would be wise to notify the nearest state and federal officials. It is unlikely that these officers will provide actual protection, but they would be alerted to the possibility of violence. Although violence is less likely now than in the past, even in the South, the new Negro resident in a predominantly white neighborhood should be prepared for its eventuality. Besides law enforcement authorities the new home-owner should contact the nearest Council on Human Relations or similar group and clergymen in the new neighborhood. The clergy especially could be of great help in reducing tension.

E. On moving day, use a moving van if at all possible. It costs more than the move-it-yourself method, but movers can move the new family much quicker, and the van out front gives a look of stability and ordinariness to the operation. The first job inside the house should be to put up some kind of curtain over the windows to cut out curious neighborhood watchfulness. Once this is done, continue the unpacking operations quietly and proceed with ordinary activities, staying indoors if possible.

F. In the following weeks, entertain a minimum of visitors. Give the neighbors time to get used to the new family. White friends, clergy or white members of the local Council on Human Relations (bringing their children along to play) should call and be seen going in and out of the house. This could do much to relieve neighbors' fears and establish a pattern of behavior for the neighborhood.

Sue and Joe were glad to make these suggestions. They were not meant to alarm their friends or discourage them from moving into a neighborhood of another race. The Walters felt that they had a right to live where they could find the best housing for the money they could spend, in a neighborhood which best fitted their needs. If the neighborhood happened to be white, they knew difficulties could arise, and they thought ahead about how to cope with them.

HERE'S HOW HOME LOANS COMPARE

	FHA LOANS	VA LOANS	CONVENTIONAL LOANS
What's the interest rate?	Currently 5¾%. With the ½% premium for FHA insurance, you pay an effective rate of 6¼%. On loans of $8,000 or less, there may be a service charge, too, up to ½%.	Currently 5¾%.	Varies with lenders, locality and time. Also may vary by type of property and size of your down payment. Rates are in the 6½% minimum range.
How long to repay?	10, 15, 20, 25, 30 or 35 years, but no longer than three-fourths of FHA's estimate of the remaining economic life of the structure.	Up to 30 years, but no longer than the estimated economic life of the structure.	Generally 20 to 30 years, but sometimes under 15 years.
What's the most you can borrow?	On a home you live in yourself, $30,000.	No limit as such. But you cannot pay more than VA estimate of "reasonable value."	No dollar limits. But there are percent-of-value limits. See below.
How much of house value can you borrow?	For a house okayed by FHA before construction or one completed longer than one year: 97% of $15,000 plus 90% of the next $5,000, plus 75% of value over $20,000. For other houses, use 90% of the first $20,000 plus 75% of value above $20,000.	VA allows 100% loans. Actually, how much you can get depends on how much a lender will risk on the strength of VA's maximum guarantee of $7,500.	Depends on the lender. Usual limits: Insurance companies 66⅔%-75% Savings & loan associations 80%-90% Most banks 75%
How big a down payment?	For homes valued $8,400 to $10,000, at least $300 down. For those valued $11,700 to $13,300, at least $400 down. Others more.	May be nothing but closing costs.	Difference between maximum loans as above and purchase price.
Prepay (paying the loan ahead of schedule) without penalty?	Yes, up to 15% in any one year.	Yes.	Some restrictions on prepayment likely.
Put a second mortgage with it?	No.	No.	Yes.

FHA AND VA REPOSSESSED HOUSES

Repossessed houses are those houses which have been foreclosed (or taken back) by the lender because the borrower has failed to repay the loan (or money borrowed). FHA and VA loans mean the federal government backs up the loan and assures the lender repayment. After the government's obligation to the lender is satisfied by paying off the loan, the government (the Federal Housing Administration or the Veterans Administration) takes possession of the house and resells it. VA and FHA repossessed houses come under President Kennedy's Executive Order 11063 forbidding discrimination in the sale and rental of houses. Much of this property is well built and can be purchased for a reasonable price.

FHA REPOSSESSIONS: When the FHA repossesses a house, it takes a number of steps which eventually lead to the house's resale:

1. The repossessed house is APPRAISED and a reasonable selling price is fixed. The appraiser tells FHA what repairs, if any, need to be made to make it conform to FHA standards.
2. These repairs are made.
3. If there are many repossessed properties in an area, a MANAGEMENT BROKER is hired. This man (or firm of real estate agents) supervises the repairs and keeps the house in shape while it is on the market.
4. After the house is fully repaired, it is publically advertised for sale (in Atlanta, Georgia, in the Sunday Journal-Constitution) and listed in the monthly FHA-ACQUIRED PROPERTIES mailing list. (This list may be obtained by writing the nearest state FHA office and requesting it.)
5. Only after public notice is given can the property be shown or sold.*

Interested persons must deal through a real estate agent or the management broker. This agent or broker contacts the state FHA office to make the offer to buy. In cases where there is a management broker, the real estate agent must contact him and deal through him.

After the public listing in the paper, offers may be presented to the FHA office. Usually several offers are received at the same time. When

*The management broker knows in advance which houses are FHA repossessions and what progress has been made on repairs. He has the key to the house. Sometimes he shows the house prematurely before the public listing, which is contrary to FHA policy. With the management broker's advantage of prior knowledge of property and approximate time of its sale, his clients are often able to have their bids in first. This means that the Negro buyer may have to contend with double discrimination if the agent of his choice is not the management broker.

this occurs the FHA decides which offer to consider first by seeing which ones show a willingness to buy the house at the FHA-appraised price and for the necessary down payment (usually 3% of the sales price). If the offers all indicate willingness to accept the appraised price and submit the necessary down payment and are accompanied by an appropriate earnest money deposit in the form of a certified or cashiers check made payable to the FHA, then the order of the offers is decided by lot. Only after drawing for order of consideration does the FHA run a credit check on the applicants.

FINANCING for FHA-acquired properties may be any one of three ways:

1. Purchaser pays all cash.
2. Purchaser obtains a conventional loan.
3. If private financing is unavailable under the first two means, then the FHA may accept a mortgage given by the purchaser.

VA REPOSSESSED HOUSES are handled in approximately the same way as the FHA repossessions.

The houses are appraised before foreclosure and a fair market value is assigned to the property. Repairs are made if necessary, but the houses can be bought "as is." If they are bought "as is" then the prospective buyer may, with VA approval, occupy the house for rent during the closing of the sale. The houses must be bought through management brokers; a buyer's broker must place his offer for the property through the management broker if there is one. The management broker cannot sell the house until the price has been established and the list of available properties with price and minimum down payment sent to all real estate agents requesting it. (The list is not ordinarily available to private individuals.) After this list is published, offers may be submitted to the VA (through the management broker), and all offers submitted during the first 48 hours are considered as having arrived at the same time. The VA then considers the offers in order of being most advantageous for the government; that is, which offer is willing to make the largest down payment, requires the shortest repayment time and is the best credit risk. Offers are considered in order of their risk, with minimum risk being considered first. In all cases, a veteran's offer comes first. After the first 48 hours, offers are considered in the order they are received.

If a prospective Negro home buyer is interested in the FHA-repossessed properties and he feels that he is being discriminated against by the real estate agents in the area or by the management broker, he may make a complaint to the FHA field office. "Discrimination" could be refusal to show an FHA-acquired house, or refusal to sell such a house. Proof of discrimination may come through the use of "checkers" or white "buyers" who go to the same real estate agent who has told a Negro buyer that no FHA-acquired property is available. If the checkers are told that repossessed property is indeed on the market, that woud constitute discrimination. Another proof of discrimination would be if a real estate agent told a Negro buyer that the FHA-acquired house he was interested in had an "offer in process." The Negro buyer could check with the FHA field office to see if for that property an offer was in process. If it were not and the real estate agent had lied, then that would be proof that the agent was discriminating. The complaint of discrimination should be backed with as much evidence as possible, something more than just a "feeling." To prove discrimination is often difficult; it requires a knowledge of real estate practices and legal rights which the layman often does not have. The home buyer could turn for help in building his case to his local Legal Aid Society, NAACP chapter, Urban League office or Council on Human Relations. (See page 42 for addresses).

Researchers who worked on this pamphlet found it very difficult to extract from FHA a written description of complaint procedures in cases of alleged discrimination. The VA could not provide any such written description at all. FHA procedures apparently have not been given wide distribution and anyone asking the agency is likely to be given the impression that the procedure is, at best, vaguely defined, involving only that a written complaint be submitted to the local field office.

In reality, Executive Order 11063, sections 51601-51612 (which outline these procedures) is very specific. These sections provide, in part, that: (1) all complaints be submitted in writing by the individual or an officer of the organization on whose behalf it is filed, using FHA form 797 where possible; (2) that the responsibility for processing the complaint rests with the Insuring Office Director having jurisdiction over the housing involved; (3) that FHA must make every effort to properly dispose of the complaint within 30 days and that when more time is needed preliminary reports should be submitted giving reasons for the delay and establishing a new terminal day; (4) that no public statement be made concerning the details of a complaint pending a final decision on its merits; (5) that acknowledgement of the complaint be made by the Insuring Office Director within two working days of its receipt; (6) that the alleged violator after first being informed of the complaint against him, also be notified not to take any action that would cause the housing accommodations which are the subject of the complaint to become unavailable to the complainant until the matter is properly settled; (7) that where the Director has found evidence of discrimination no further FHA applications of the violator be accepted for processing and any applications that he has in process shall be discontinued until either (A) the discriminatory practice has been eliminated and satisfactory assurances of future compliance have been received or (b) the findings of discrimination are reversed by the commissioner.

Complaint procedures through the VA—as already stated—were not available in written form. Through conversations with VA spokesmen, however, the process seems essentially to amount to this: If real estate agents in the area and the management broker will not show to a prospective Negro buyer the VA-acquired properties, then that buyer may appeal directly to the VA which may then sell the house to him without dealing through the broker. The complaint should be submitted to the local VA office in writing together with all other documents to prove the discriminatory act.

Both FHA and VA indicate that they have had few complaints; both were extremely cautious in discussing their procedures. Whatever the reason for such an attitude, this much is certain: complaint procedures should be adequately defined by both agencies and should be readily available at all local and field offices. In filing a complaint with either agency it would be advisable to send a copy to the regional U. S. Commission on Civil Rights and the state Advisory Committee to the U. S. Commission on Civil Rights.

Redress for complaints in any event will probably be slow and reluctant. But if rights under the President's Executive Order are not used then they are really meaningless. And unless those who have been discriminated against are willing to file a complaint and to carry it through with persistence there likely will never be adequate complaint procedures.

PRESIDENT'S EXECUTIVE ORDER 11063

On November 20, 1962, President John F. Kennedy issued Executive Order 11063 which forbids housing discrimination in federally aided housing programs. The housing affected by the order is that:

1. owned or operated by the federal government (homes repossessed under FHA or VA programs fall in this group);
2. provided in whole or in part with the aid of federal loans, grants, advances or contributions;
3. provided in whole or in part by loans insured, guaranteed or otherwise secured by the credit of the federal government (all homes financed through the Federal Housing Administration or the Veterans Administration);
4. provided by the development or redevelopment of real property made available by a state or local public agency through federal financial assistance for slum clearance and urban renewal.

The order applies to all housing and related facilities provided with federal assistance made available after November 20, 1962. It also applies to all housing that is owned or operated by the federal government, no matter when provided (such as FHA and VA foreclosures). The order also covers all housing owned or operated by the Defense Department, as well as any housing that is financed with the aid of FHA mortgage insurance for defense personnel.

BUILDERS AND DEVELOPERS OF NEW HOUSING PRODUCED UNDER THE FEDERAL LOAN INSURANCE (FHA) OR GUARANTEE PROGRAM (VA) ARE PROHIBITED FROM DISCRIMINATING in the sale or rental of this housing if their applications for government assistance were filed after November 20, 1962, the time of the executive order.

HOME FINANCING INSTITUTIONS ARE PROHIBITED FROM DISCRIMINATING on the basis of race, color, creed or national origin in their lending practices with respect to housing loans which are insured, guaranteed, or otherwise secured by the credit of the federal government as the result of applications filed after November 20, 1962.

AN INDIVIDUAL HOMEOWNER SELLING HIS OWN HOME IS NOT COVERED BY THIS ORDER. The Federal Housing Administration and the Veterans Administration have exempted owner-occupants of one- or two-family houses from the regulations issued by these agencies to implement the executive order. Lenders, however, doing business under FHA or VA programs may not refuse a loan to a qualified buyer in such cases because of race, color, creed, or national origin.

EXPLANATION OF TERMS

CLOSING COSTS: Charges to the buyer presented at the time of purchase. The charges are usually unexpected, and they must be paid for at the time of purchase in CASH. They include the cost of title insurance and the amount of hazard insurance due for the remainder of the year (if prepaid by previous owner), the amount of real estate tax due for the rest of the year, recording fees charged by state and sometimes city offices to record the change of ownership, recording tax fees for states which require revenue stamps (tax stamps) to be attached to the documents filed. Besides these charges are the fees the lending institution may pass on to the borrower for the services of experts used to check the investment value of the property and the position of the borrower before making a loan (title search or the check to see that the title to the property is in good order; property survey or the check on the dimensions of the property; appraisal of the value of the property to guide the lender in deciding how much to lend; personal credit report on the borrower to see if he is a good credit risk, has a steady job and pays his debts). A fee for the outside lawyer who is attending to the seller's interest may be charged to the buyer. In FHA loans closing costs also include a discount percentage which is, in effect, a service fee paid the lending institution for handling the loan. The items charged to the buyer at closing are negotiable. Sometimes the seller may pay part of them. In all cases the buyer can find out a few days in advance the approximate sum necessary for these costs by telephoning the lender or the real estate agent or by having the buyer's lawyer do so.

DOWN PAYMENT: The money given as partial payment for the house at the time of purchase.

EARNEST MONEY: The money given by a possible buyer to the seller to show that he intends to buy the house. With this money as promise to buy, the seller holds the house for the buyer while he is arranging for a loan. Usually in a preliminary sales agreement (have a lawyer check this agreement before signing), the possible buyer has his earnest money returned if he is not able to get the necessary loan.

EQUITY: The actual dollars and cents value that an owner has in his home; in effect, his investment once all fees and charges against his property have been paid.

HAZARD INSURANCE: Insurance against fire, windstorm and other specified natural hazards. This insurance is required by the lender and is usually part of the payment each month to the lender.

INTEREST: The fee paid lending institution for the loan; the amount of money the lender charges the borrower for the use of the lender's money. Interest is usually given as a per cent. The borrower must pay that per cent per year for the money not repaid the lender.

LOAN: The money borrowed to buy a house; the money lent either by a lending institution (such as a bank) alone or lent by a lending institution and backed by the Veterans Administration or Federal Housing Administration for buying a house.

Conventional Loan: Two-party loans between the borrower and lender. The loan is "secured" or backed by the value of the house being bought and by the credit evaluation on the borrower. This credit evaluation depends on the borrower's job, salary and prospects of remaining at the job and his record in paying past debts.

FHA Loans: Three-party loans where the Federal Housing Administration is involved as well as the lender and borrower. The FHA insures the lender against loss if the borrower fails to repay the loan. For this insurance the borrower pays ½ of 1% of the total loan. This money goes into a common pool to pay the losses when borrowers default.

VA Loans: Three-party agreement where the Veterans Administration guarantees repayment of part (60%) of the loan up to a maximum of $7500.00.

MORTGAGE: Agreement for a long-term loan where the lender has a claim on the property as security for the money he has lent and may foreclose or take back the property if the borrower does not pay the amount borrowed according to a time schedule.

MORTGAGEE: Another name for the lender.

MORTGAGOR: Another name for the borrower.

PRINCIPAL: The sum borrowed. When the borrower repays the loan, he pays each month a certain amount for interest on the money lent and for insurance and taxes; the rest of the payment is paid on the principal or the money borrowed.

TITLE: The right to exclusive or sole ownership.

TITLE DEED: Legal document stating that a piece of property belongs to the owner and was transferred to him from the previous owner with no legitimate claim remaining unsatisfied.

TITLE INSURANCE: Insurance to make sure that the lender experiences no loss if the title to a property has earlier claims to it. This insurance provides funds to defend the insured title against any claims (such as a forged deed or an undisclosed heir) and to compensate the insured party against loss. The buyer, for a small additional fee, may cover his own equity with title insurance. The insurance is paid only once, at the time of sale, and is a per cent of sales price.

TITLE SEARCH: The examination of records and documents concerning previous ownership to make certain that the title (or deed of ownership) to the property has no claims or debts against it.

General discussion as to how to determine a good house and a good value:

"Buying a House—Is the Price Right?," Changing Times, Vol. 18, November, 1964, pp. 30 - 32. This article points out ways to try to determine whether or not a house's price represents "true market value"; it suggests that if the prospective buyer hasn't the time himself for determining the value then he should hire a professional appraiser.

"How to Take the Questions out of Buying or Selling a House," Better Homes and Gardens, Vol. 41, March, 1963, pp. 117 - 120. Discusses with detail the problems of home financing, finding a good location, checking construction, determining the condition of the house and true market value and how to make an offer.

Before You Buy A House by Robert A. Marshall, Changing Times. Published by Kiplinger Washington Editors, Inc., 1729 H Avenue, N. W., Washington, D. C.
This 96 page paperback booklet discusses in detail and in an interesting manner the many questions a buyer has when deciding on a new home. It helps the buyer select a house which suits him and explains in simple but precise language the intricacies of financing. Although it was published in 1964, very little of the material is dated. It would be $1.95 well spent by any serious home buyer.

Discussion of specific topics related to homes, sound efficient construction and lasting beauty and comfort:

"Homes: Construction, Maintenance, Community Development," a bibliography of government pamphlets available on the home. This bibliography lists pamphlets on such topics as better lawns, plumbing, interior decoration, floors, roofing and termites. Prices for the pamphlets range from $3.00 to 5¢ with most available at a cost of 40¢ to 5¢.

Consumers All: The Yearbook of Agriculture, 1965. Each year the Agriculture Department publishes this practical book of facts dealing with every part of the home and home management. It discusses how to landscape a garden, select a good fabric for curtains or protect a house from decay and termite damage. The cost of this 512 book is $2.75 and may be ordered from the Superintendent of Documents, Washington, D. C. 20402. The local library in a town will probably have a copy.

DUAL JUSTICE IN THE COURTS-- UNCONCERNED COMMUNITY

Justice is turned back, and righteousness stands afar off;
for truth has fallen in the public squares, and uprightness cannot enter . . .
The Lord saw it, and it displeased Him that there was no justice. Isaiah 59:15-15

"Dual justice takes many forms, some merely disgusting and others so quietly terrifying that they balk the scrutiny of rational men."

The answer — A concerned community
The ultimate responsibility is with the people.

THE FELLOWSHIP OF THE CONCERNED
THE SOUTHERN REGIONAL COUNCIL
5 FORSYTH STREET, N. W.
ATLANTA, GEORGIA

From the discussion groups of the 1965 workshop of the Fellowship of the Concerned, came an urgent request that the Fellowship of the Concerned launch a campaign of women visiting the courts -- showing their interest and concern in what is happening.

What has been done thus far:

1. The Executive Committee of the Southern Regional Council gave the program their hearty approval.

2. The State Councils on Human Relations will be partners with us in this program.

3. A call went out to the presidents of national women's organizations asking them to come to Atlanta for two day's of discussion. The response was most gratifying.

The morning session of the first day was spent listening to a group of lawyers discussing for us the problems we had to meet and answering their questions. The remainder of the time was in the hands of these national women who divided themselves into several committees.

Mrs. Stuart Sinclair, President, United Church Women, National Council of Churches

Miss Dorothy Height, President, National Council of Negro Women

Mrs. Max Goldstein, National Board, National Council of Jewish Women

Mrs. George Gunning, National Board, National Council of Catholic Women

Mrs. A. L. Cram, Jr., Vice President, National Board Y.W.C.A.

Mrs. Michael Shapiro, First Vice President, B'nai B'rith Women

Mrs. George E. Kimball, Vice President, Unitarian Universalist Women's Federation

Mrs. Benjamin Mays, Representing Woman's Missionary Council, Christian Methodist Episcopal Church

Mrs. O. Ivan Cole, President, International Christian Women's Fellowship, Disciples of Christ

Mrs. Rose Anna Nelson, First Vice President, Woman's Home and Foreign Missionary Society, African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church

Miss Evelyn Green, Executive Secretary, Board of Woman's Work, The Presbyterian Church in the U. S.

Mrs. Niles C. Clark, Representing Woman's Society of Christian Service, Board of Missions, The Methodist Church

Mrs. Edward M. Brown, Representing Council of Lay Life and Work, United Church of Christ.

The following is their report:

A. Issued the following statement.

> "We, as members of national women's organizations, believe that the freedom, dignity, and security of the individual are basic to American democracy.
> "Since it is the nature of women to be a civilizing influence we are particularly concerned about the treatment of people in our democracy today.
>
> "As women citizens of this nation we feel a moral responsibility for the administration of justice in the courts.
> "This requires knowledge, personal commitment, and united action."

B. Directed the Southern Regional Council to prepare material on the discrimination in jury selection and the dual justice in the courts -- one for Negroes, one for whites.

C. Asked that workshops on the courts be held in each of our eleven Southern States -- and that visits to the courts be made beforehand in preparation for the state workshops. (One of the lawyers who spoke to the group said, "If women would visit the courts regularly it would revolutionize the courts.")

(Please study the attached "Observer Guidelines" prepared for us by Mrs. William Wood, First Vice President, League of Women Voters of the United States.)

WORKSHOP ON COURTS

Prepared by Mrs. Wm. Wood, Vice President, League of Women Voters of the United States

Observers Program

Some selective process should be used in recruiting observers. Personal appearance and demeanor are important. Those willing to participate should --

1) Conduct themselves in a polite, well-mannered way.

2) Be willing to sit through proceedings and refrain from making remarks or engaging in conversation with those nearby while the Court is in session.

3) Act like a fair-minded person.

It is wise for observers to work in teams of two. This makes it possible to check with one another when any report is written.

When observing in the Courts the following should be kept in mind:

1) Trials are open. However, any judge has power to exclude the public and to have part of the hearing in private.

2) Know the procedures in the Court to be visited. Attorneys can be helpful in briefings on this.

3) Know the Court schedule -- what cases are coming up, the time the Court opens, etc.

4) Many Courtrooms have limited space. Get there in time to get a seat near the front so you can hear. Do not expect special favors in having a seat saved. If offered, do not accept a Judge's invitation to sit on the bench.

5) Areas of interest:
   a. Judge's demeanor toward the person before the Court.
   b. Bail.
   c. Legal Counsel.
   d. Jury selection.
   e. Sentencing, fines, etc.

6) Observe several times with the same judge presiding.

7) Observe procedures under more than one judge.

SOUTHERN JUSTICE:

THE PROBLEM

Much has been written on the South's dual system of justice -- one brand for the white man -- yet another for the Negro. Legislation is even now being debated which hopefully will bring about change. But it will take more than new laws to rectify the abuses of generations. The vigilance of dedicated citizens willing to spend time and patience sitting in courtrooms and observing, willing to inquire, to ask the hard questions about long established procedures can be quietly effective. A coalition of women's organizations acting on local levels can fill this need. When lynch law was prevalent in the South, the Association of Southern Women for the Prevention of Lynching was formed and over the years contributed hugely toward eliminating mob rule in the South. The same spirit of that earlier organization is now needed as the South faces up to the new challenge of Jim Crow justice.

Let's look just briefly at the overall situation, for basic to any meaningful action is an understanding of the directions one is trying to move.

The double standard of justice in the South is most obvious in the record on civil rights cases.

From 1960 through mid-1965 at least twenty-six Negroes and white civil rights workers were slain. Only one assailant was sentenced -- to ten years in prison.

Toward the end of 1965, however, the three men accused of murdering Mrs. Viola Liuzzo were convicted of "conspiracy to violate her civil rights" and were sentenced. This was after one of them had been acquitted of the charge of murder. The next day Damon Strange was convicted of manslaughter in a night-rider slaying in Anniston, Alabama.

If the double standard of justice were limited to civil rights cases, one might find reason for optimism -- however slight -- in these recent convictions. But the problem goes much deeper.

The double standard of justice looms constantly over the daily life of every Negro in the South. In ordinary contacts with police, in traffic courts, in civil procedures, and in criminal cases the dual standard is a standing abuse to all Negroes.

Capital Cases

Despite the fact that more than half of all convicted rapists are white, 87 per cent of all the persons executed for rape between 1930 and 1963 were Negroes convicted and sentenced by southern courts.

Between 1930 and 1961, 34 people were executed for the capital offense of night-time burglary. Twenty-nine of them were Negroes and all but one were put to death in a southern or border state.

Studies have shown that a Negro murderer is likely to get the maximum penalty if his victim is a white person, while southern courts are inclined to be lenient if the victim is another Negro. A white person is more likely to receive the maximum penalty for killing another white person than for killing a Negro.

Minor Offenses

Negroes suffer from what has been described as "cash register justice." Suppose a judge gives two men, one a Negro and one white, the same sentence for drunk driving: $150 fine or twelve months in jail. If the Negro is a laborer at $1.25 per hour (when he can find work) and the white man earns $250 a week, the sentence is not really the same because a fine of three days' pay for the white man is an impossible sum for the Negro.

To be sure, "cash register justice" victimizes the poor of both races, but the Negro, being poorest, suffers most frequently. In a 12-month period ending in June of 1962, 2,341 persons served terms in Georgia's state prison system for their inability to pay small fines. Seventy-five per cent of these were Negroes.

The same result is obtained in the setting of bail: the impoverished sometimes must await trial in jail because they cannot raise the amount which allows the well-off offender to be free.

Experts in criminal correction have long argued that an effort should be made to determine the offender's ability to pay before imposing the penalty. So far the argument has had little effect in the South.

Legal Counsel

An indigent Negro accused of a major crime often must accept a court-appointed white attorney who has little enthusiasm for his case. But even if they have money, Negroes may find it difficult to get an attorney, and in the Deep South, white attorneys are reluctant to accept controversial cases. To do so can cost an attorney his practice and may even result in ostracism by his community. There have been several examples of this in recent years.

Jury Selection

A southern Negro charged with a crime has little chance of being tried by "a jury of his peers." Actually, methods of jury selection work against poor whites as much as against Negroes, and they are unjust in other parts of the United States as in the South. But the record of southern juries in racial cases is a striking and depressing result of the pre-judicial systems of jury selection which prevail.

All-White Justice

Exclusion from juries is not the only way in which Negroes are denied participation in the administration of justice. Only recently have southern cities and states hired a token number of Negro police officers; often their duties are almost entirely confined to Negro neighborhoods.

Very few officers of the southern courts are Negroes. This is as true of southern federal courts as of state and municipal courts. A recent report of the Southern Regional Council included the following statistics:

RACIAL DISTRIBUTION OF OFFICERS AND PERSONNEL IN SOUTHERN FEDERAL COURTS

	TOTAL	WHITE	NEGRO
Circuit Court Judges	12*	12	0
District Court Judges	65	65	0
Referees in Bankruptcy	55	55	0
U. S. Commissioners	253	253	0
U. S. Clerks	28	28	0
Deputy U.S. Clerks	321	321	0
U. S. Attorneys	29	29	0
Assistant U.S. Attorneys	158	153	5
Jury Commissioners	109	109	0
U. S. Marshals	29	29	0
Deputy U. S. Marshals	165	156	9
Secretarial and Clerical	364	**	**

*This is the number of judges of southern residence now serving on the Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, and Eighth Circuits. The numbers respectively are three, seven, one, and one.

Exact number of Negroes not ascertainable. The number from observation is quite small.

SOUTHERN JUSTICE

Jury Selection

In a suit attacking the jury system of Jefferson County, Alabama, Charles Morgan, attorney-at-law, noted that selection techniques "differ from state to state and within states from court to court. The federal system differs from state systems. Qualifications differ from state to state. Federal qualifications differ from state qualifications." Some jury commissioners, Morgan pointed out, compile jury lists from telephone books; others use city directories, voter registration lists, the rolls of the Junior Chamber of Commerce, church membership lists, lists of school teachers, automobile owners, American Legion members, property tax payers. The result of such methods is that no real balance of the population is achieved. Jury lists become heavily laden with middle and upper class citizens. The poor, both Negro and white, are automatically excluded and since residential segregation is a fact of life in the South, jury commissioners can even effectively screen out middle class Negroes by close scrunity of their addresses.

The first step in a program of reform should be for local groups to determine how jury panels are chosen in their particular localities. But it isn't enough simply to pressure for change. An alternative should be presented. How can a true cross-section of the population be achieved, as called for in the proposed Civil Rights Act of 1966? Mr. Morgan advances a surer means than is currently in practice. This is the so-called Kraft method and is, in effect, the methods of opinion research analysts. (John F. Kraft, from whom the name is taken, is president of an opinion and market research firm. He has worked for many years both in the Elmo Roper firm and in the Lou Harris firm.) To select jury panels under this system would be a simple matter of choosing at random a specified number of residential blocks in a given city and from every fifth household making a random selection of citizens eligible to serve on juries -- men and women over 21, upper income and lower income people, white and Negroes. The whole focus of the approach, Mr. Kraft explains, "would be to remove human discretion from scientific sampling, to remove the possibility of bias in selecting the sample."

SOUTHERN JUSTICE

Courtroom Practice -- What Can Be Done

The county courthouse in the South is the last remaining stronghold of publicly sanctioned segregation. Not even the federal government has yet penetrated it. Beyond calling for elimination of discriminatory jury selection methods in state courts, the proposed Civil Rights Bill will not greatly affect accepted practices and procedures at the county courthouse. It will, apparently, be only through local citizen action that change can be brought about. This could be a long and frustrating process. The South has demonstrated its unwillingness to abandon segregation voluntarily and those who take upon themselves the task of reform should be prepared to face a good deal of resistance -- as well as local hostility directed against them. Yet the effort must be made. And it may well be that church women can here be more effective than the more direct action groups. Courts are peculiarly sensitive to any act that might remotely be interpreted as contemptuous. The authority of county judges in contempt cases is very broad. However, local women's organizations, sitting quietly in a courtroom, observing what goes on and later working for reform through community action could hardly be felonious.

Points that observers should be alert for are, of course, evidences of segregation. Such evidence probably won't be hard to find. Negroes may, as a matter of course, automatically sit on the back row or in the gallery or they may be directed to sit in segregated seats by the court. Water fountains in some county courthouses may still be segregated as may restrooms.

Negroes in southern courts traditionally have been denied normal courtesy titles. Few southern judges or lawyers address Negro witnesses by any other than first names. Listings of witnesses in records of trial sometimes do not include "Mr." or "Mrs." titles for Negroes. Negro attorneys are frequently addressed as "Colonel," "Captain," "Preacher," by the court to avoid the use of "Mister."

Another project of the group could be analysis of cases where a Negro and a white man are accused of comparable crimes. The group could sit in on the entire proceedings first of one and then the other. Notes could be kept on how both proceedings were handled, with special attention to the court's attitude toward the defendant, the comparative energies of white defense attorneys on their client's behalf, interrogation of Negro and white witnesses -- and jury panel selection. If both defendants were convicted, a comparison could also be made of the sentences given; follow-through could be made of jail and prison conditions.

SOUTHERN JUSTICE

The Various Courts

Normally one thinks of only two types of courts -- state and federal. While this is, of course, basically the case, state courts are broken down into many categories.

Descriptive names vary from state to state but basically a state court system works this way. Superior courts (or district courts, circuit courts -- depending on the title used within the states) normally will have original and concurrent jurisdiction in all civil and criminal causes -- with the exception of administration of estates which would be under the jurisdiction of probate or ordinary courts. In some states superior courts also have jurisdiction in equity cases (those where injunctive relief is sought) while other states have separate equity (or chancery) courts. Divorce cases and cases involving titles to real estate will also normally fall under the jurisdiction of superior courts -- though some states again have separate court divisions for handling such cases.

Subordinate to the superior courts are the various municipal and county courts which have been created to take the heavy burden of minor civil and criminal cases from the higher court. Some of these include: police or recorder's courts used primarily for the disposition of minor offenses -- such as traffic violations -- and the binding over of greater offenders to higher courts; criminal courts which will handle misdemeanors; county civil courts which will have jurisdiction over civil cases where the sum involved is comparatively small. This sum may vary from state to state, but rarely is over $500.

SOUTHERN JUSTICE

The Rights of Individuals in the Hands of Police

Negro distrust of white policemen is widespread both in rural areas and in the cities; both North and South. Such suspicion is not unjustified. For too long the white policeman has been the secular arm of segregation and racial discrimination and his methods have been no credit to his community or to his profession. Despite efforts of progressive city and county administrations in recent years to eliminate not only police brutality but police violation of individual and human rights, a great deal more effort needs to be made. Citizens groups thus should familiarize themselves with the rights of individuals in the hands of police. The following is a summation of those rights: (Source: Criminal Law and Punishment, P. J. FitzGerald, Oxford University Press, 1962; pp. 175-180.)

1. Search and entry -- no one must submit to being searched unless he is a suspect who has been arrested.
2. Arrest -- police cannot detain a subject for questioning without a warrant;
   Police cannot make an arrest without a warrant unless he reasonably suspects a felony having been committed;
   Arresting officer must bring an accused person (if arrested without a warrant) before a judge as soon as possible. Superior officer in charge must inquire into case and may release the accused on bail if the case is not serious. He must release him if accused does not come before a judge within 24 hours;
   When brought before a judge, the prisoner has the right to demand bail; if refused, he can appeal to higher court. Bail must not be excessive;

The remedy for a person wrongfully detained is to apply for a writ of Habeus Corpus to a judge, requiring accuser and accused to go before a judge where cause of arrest is to be stated. If court is not satisfied that a valid reason exists for detaining the accused, the prisoner is to be instantly released.

A decision of the U. S. Supreme Court handed down June 13, 1966, directly affects the rights of individuals in the hands of police. The ruling holds:

1) that an individual must be warned prior to questioning that he has the right to remain silent;
2) that he must be warned that any statement he makes may be used against him in court;
3) that officials must inform him of his right to have legal counsel present at the time he is questioned;
4) that he must be told by authorities that if he does not have money enough to employ an attorney, he has the right to have one appointed by the court to represent him; to consult with him before making any statement; and to have him present while he is making a statement;
5) that if an accused person requests legal representation no questions will be asked him until an attorney is present.

TITLE I - FEDERAL JURIES

From the proposed

"Civil Rights Act of 1966"

The present statutes reflect the will of Congress that federal juries be composed of a cross-section of the community. But these laws do not provide sufficient guidance to jury commissions across the nation as to how they shall carry out this Congressional purpose. The result has been the use of varying sources of names of prospective jurors, differing systems of selection and diverse tests of qualification. While this uncertain system appears not to have operated unconstitutionally, in some districts Negro representation on juries has been substantially less than the proportion of Negroes in the community, and other classes have sometimes been inadequately represented on juries. In any event, the system used in many districts is an imperfect means of insuring that the will of Congress is carried out, and carried out uniformly.

Title I of the "Civil Rights Act of 1966" is drawn to eliminate uncertainty and make clear beyond dispute that each judicial district or division is fulfilling its constitutional and statutory obligations in selection and assignment of jurors. It sets forth the sources from which potential jurors are to be drawn and the procedures to be followed in selecting jurors and testing their qualifications.

Title I declares it to be the policy of the United States that all qualified persons shall have the opportunity to serve on grand and petit juries in federal courts and shall have an obligation to serve when summoned. It prohibits discrimination in the selection of federal jurors on account of race, color, religion, sex, national origin, or economic status.

The bill requires that the names of prospective jurors be taken at random from the voter registration rolls, which are defined to include lists of eligible voters prepared by federal examiners under the Voting Rights Act of 1965. The voter rolls are considered to be the best universally available source of names substantially reflecting a full and fair cross-section of the community. Where, however, the judicial council of the circuit determines that use of the voter rolls as the exclusive source of names would not be consistent with the prohibition of discriminatory selection, the council would be required to prescribe other sources of names in addition to the voter rolls. It is anticipated that it will be necessary to prescribe additional sources of names for use in some districts where Negroes are at present not fairly represented on the voting rolls.

The qualifications for jury service prescribed by existing law are retained, but it is provided that all persons found in accordance with objective criteria to possess such qualifications are to be deemed qualified as jurors. Under the present law, the statutory qualifications may have been regarded as establishing the minimum to be required, leaving the courts and jury commissions free to impose more stringent qualifications. The bill makes clear that the qualifications set a ceiling, that requirments beyond those listed may not be imposed.

Title I also provides a ready means for challenging jury selection in criminal and civil cases on grounds that the procedures established by the bill have not been followed. This challenge procedure is made available prospectively, and should be a major guarantee of the equal rights which are the objective of the legislation.

TITLE II - STATE JURIES

Title II of the "Civil Rights Act of 1966" is based on the power of Congress to enforce the Fourteenth Amendment by "appropriate legislation" and is designed to eliminate unconstitutional discrimination in the selection of grand and petit juries in State courts. This title provides that no persons shall be denied the right to serve on State juries on account of race, color, religion, sex, national origin, or economic status. In areas in which such discrimination is not practiced, existing jury selection procedures would not be upset. Where discrimination still exists, this title provides the means to eliminate it.

Title II has two principal features. First, it authorizes the Attorney General to bring civil actions in the federal courts for injunctive relief against discriminatory practices in State court jury selection. Under existing law, the Attorney General has no authority to initiate jury discrimination suits but may only intervene (under Title IX of the Civil Rights Act of 1964) in private suits. The authority vested in him by this title would be similar to the authority the Attorney General now has to seek injunctions against discrimination in voting, public accommodations and employment and, under Title III of this bill, against discrimination in public schools and facilities.

Upon a finding of discrimination, the court is expressly authorized to grant specified kinds of effective relief, including a decree which would, (1) prohibit the use of any qualification or ground of exclusion, exemption or excuse which has been administered in a discriminatory manner or which lends itself to such abuse; (2) require the use of objective criteria in determining qualifications, exclusion, exemptions, or excuses; (3) require maintenance of such records as may be necessary to show, in the future, whether discrimination is being practiced; and (4) appoint a master to perform the duties of the State jury officials. In addition, the court may grant other appropriate relief under general equitable principles.

The second principal feature of this title deals with the need for disclosure and development of information relevant to the question whether discrimination results from the system for selecting jurors. This objective is accomplished by a challenge procedure which may be used by the Attorney General in a suit under this title, private litigants residing in the area who seek to enforce the prohibition against discrimination by a civil action under 42 U.S.C. 1983, or a defendant in a criminal case or convicted person attacking collaterally a criminal conviction.

Upon the filing of an allegation of discrimination, appropriate State officials are required to furnish a "written statement of jury selection information." This statement is to describe in detail the procedures followed by the State jury officials in selecting jurors--including the sources of names of prospective jurors, the criteria used in determining qualifications for jury service, and the methods used for summoning jurors and assigning them to jury panels. The complaining party may cross-examine jury officials and introduce any other relevant evidence that may be available in support of the challenge. If, at that point, there is some evidence of discrimination, the complaining party is given access to any other relevant records of jury selection which are not otherwise publicly available and these may be introduced in support of the challenge. If the court then determines that there is probable cause to believe that discrimination has occurred, it is the responsibility of the State to produce additional evidence demonstrating that the alleged discrimination did not occur.

This provision meets twin considerations. It affords interested parties and the court access to the relevant records of jury selection needed to permit a fair determination whether discrimination has occurred or may occur. In addition, it assures that records may be kept confidential except as necessary to the court proceeding. Use of this challenge procedure in collateral attacks upon criminal convictions is available only with respect to judgments of conviction entered after the effective date of the title.

INTRODUCTION

IN 1960, THE SOUTHERN REGIONAL COUNCIL, the Southeastern Office, American Friends Service Committee, and the Department of Racial and Cultural Affairs, National Council of the Churches of Christ, published a report on five years of violent reaction to the 1954 Supreme Court school decision, "Intimidation, Reprisal and Violence in the South's Racial Crisis." Since then, the Council and others have continued to record and report this most disgraceful aspect of the South's struggle to overcome its worst mistakes. With the same sense of sadness and urgency, this report continues the story—with its warning to the nation that violence has not abated, and that the miracle of non-retaliation from Negroes cannot be expected to continue.

Assistance of the American Friends Service Committee in preparation of research materials for this report is acknowledged. Research and writing of the project was by Mrs. Glenda Bartley of the Southern Regional Council research staff.

The following paragraph from the 1960 report is fully applicable to the situation six years later:

> Finally, this is not a comprehensive survey of southern reactions . . . It describes only their angry, violent side. Another accounting could be given of patience, responsibility, courage, and good will by both Negroes and whites. Though this aspect of the South is not in view in the report, it is an authentic and undimmed face of the South, to which each of the sponsoring agencies has paid tribute more than once. But we feel an obligation to call attention to the dangers posed by the record that follows—dangers for which all of us, through silence or inaction, must share the responsibility.

PART I

The South's Temper, 1964-1966

As Negro children began what some newspapers termed "massive" integration of southern public schools in September, 1965, the nation was surprised that Southerners accepted the change in a peaceful manner. The truth is that conditions in the South were neither integrated nor peaceful. Between five and six per cent of the region's 3,014,025 Negro school-age children attended classes with whites, and often these children and their parents paid a very high price for the experience. Men and women who were already desperately poor were evicted from sharecropper's cabins or tenant farms. Many without the training for good jobs lost the meager ones they had held for years. Some were beaten and shot at. Others saw their children abused and imprisoned. Yet the headlines continued to reassure the nation that "School Integration Continues to Spread Quietly Across the South."

There are several reasons for the nation's misunderstanding of the South's condition.

Passage of the Civil Rights Act in 1964 indicated to many whites that the Negro's problem was now largely solved and, with restrictions barring him from participation in American life removed, he would disappear into the mainstream and quit pestering their consciences.

Immediate effects of the 1964 law were felt only in the area of public accommodations, giving middle class Negroes access to peripheral trappings of the white man's world, which were at best merely a symbol of the law's intent. The fall and winter of 1964 confirmed the fact that many urban and some rural public accommodations were desegregated.

Then, in the spring of 1965 the Office of Education announced plans to bring southern schools into compliance with the law. Virtually all districts filed plans with the federal bureau stating that various grades were open to both races, usually on a "freedom of choice" basis. Somehow the fact that in the immediate past cities had submitted to token integration only after lengthy court battles was overlooked, and it was assumed that federal money and southern honor would do the trick in the small towns and country areas.

So, when school opened in the fall, little communities like Ruby, South Carolina, which completely desegregated all twelve grades, and Philadelphia, Mississippi, which admitted a few Negro children without a riot, received national attention. The impression was false and the apathy was national, not southern. The old patterns of resistance were still being employed; wherever weakness was found in federal enforcement it would be exploited.

Soon, the federal government discovered that freedom of choice in many communities was a cruel misnomer. Negro parents who filled out transfer forms for their children (from which the Office of Education deduced the number of children in desegregated schools) often changed their minds. In many cases schools reported peacefully desegregated on the first day of classes had only a fraction of the children who had signed letters of intent—usually because the superintendent had advised Negro parents to keep their children home or send them to the Negro school until any possibility of trouble abated. Once school opened "without incident" the matter was no longer "news." Many people subjected to violence, intimidation, or economic reprisal live in isolated rural areas or small communities, and the "news" did not get out. It spoke its own language, however, to the local Negroes.

Rationale of Retaliation

At the same time the nation was deluding itself about southern school desegregation, it was ignoring the economic and occasionally violent reprisals which followed in the wake of voter registration drives.

The Voting Rights Law of 1965 was the first supplement to the Civil Rights Act. Again, once the law was passed, it seemed the issue was settled. Law created fact, and all those people for whom the Selma march spoke would now be citizens. That hundreds of people in Black Belt counties in Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana were out of work or off the land because they registered to vote was hardly noticed. The deeper implications of joblessness, poverty, and frustration attached to this evidence of economic dependence were largely ignored.

The nation also has regarded violence as a characteristic of all the former Confederate states. This is an illusion. Violence has for several years been largely confined to the Deep South, and there generally to Alabama, Mississippi, north and delta Louisiana, and southwest Georgia. Occasional outbursts in the peripheral South, Texas, Arkansas, Florida, north Georgia, Tennessee, Virginia, North and South Carolina, have been isolated incidents and not a manifestation of organized resistance. Though cities like Birmingham are hardly distinguishable from the surrounding countryside, the hard-core violent resistance areas are largely rural.

Here registrars know the Negroes who try to register and the jobs they hold on the plantations they "belong" to. A superintendent knows the mother hopefully filling out a transfer form for her child is a maid in the house just down the street. There also is, as one Mississippian put it, the "lack of a public sector"—a place where both races have traditionally met in an impersonal manner. In cities the buses may have had segregated seating customs but Negro and white at least rode on the same bus bound for destinations unknown to each other. The city affords (and in the case of the Negro, demands) anonymity. In the small town and rural areas, any contact between the races is a personal one, and so more painful when one tries to change patterns.

Perhaps this partially explains the real personal grudge many rural whites have against Negroes. It is not just against those who are, for reasons unknown to whites, out in the streets demonstrating for what they choose to call freedom, but against those who aren't. For those who continue to crop for Mr. John and stay out of trouble, they feel contempt. True, the wrath of whites is almost always directed at those Negroes who are trying to change things, but relationships also deteriorate with those who do not join the effort. So there is no foundation of respect, anywhere. Along with this is the feeling on the part of the white man that he is trapped, just as the Negro is trapped, in a situation over which he has no control. He reads and hears daily that only the Negro receives federal help for his predicament, and southern education is sufficiently deficient that he has no facts with which to refute this.

Having swapped the ballot for racial shibboleths, he sees democracy once again passing him by; this time as a vehicle for the very people he sacrificed so much to "keep down." Feeling beleaguered, cornered, and contemptuous, such whites permitted or abetted continued efforts to use legal, economic, and ultimately, violent methods of denying a whole people self-respect.

Plight of the Poor

Heightening the frustrations of all the rural South is the fact that cotton continues to decline as a significant portion of agricultural production. Again the peripheral South is different, having already begun to diversify its farm production and move toward industrialization in the 1940's. The Deep South—Black Belt Alabama and the Mississippi Delta particular y —have been much slower in abandoning cotton. Yet here, too, unmarketable short staple cotton and curtailed allotments, cattle, pine trees—along with mechanization have pushed people off the land. As a single staple economy wrenches itself toward a mature, diversified one, the need for unskilled labor sharply increased.

In the traditional sense these people are beyond the definition of cybernation—men and women whose one skill is bending over a hoe or a cotton stalk, who have been trained in this capacity since childhood, whose schools close in planting and pickin' time to resume in "slack" seasons. They themselves are products of the plantation system—of a feudalism that transcends the old manorial concept and becomes almost a familial relationship, with the plantation manager, the Man, a patriarch. That this patriarch might be benign and allow his docile children to remain on the land long after their usefulness has gone is often true. But once they threaten his dominion, he punishes them simply by removing them, cutting them off from their inheritance, which is the land, the hoe, and the cotton stalk.

Many of the disinherited are like the 82-year-old man whose mother was born a slave on the Wilcox County farm he was forced to leave. In his new home without water or light, he will live by "growing some corn." In West Feliciana Parish, Louisiana, a woman, blind, crippled, born a slave, will live in a shanty with relatives. Another man and his wife, living on $33 a month social security, are homeless after registering to vote. Driven off the land they had farmed for decades, these people's resolve was best expressed in one old woman's pathetically stubborn defiance: "Our only sin was wanting to be citizens . . . . Would I go back to my old house if I would promise not to vote? Chile, I wouldn't promise not to vote if they gave me the house."

Retaliation against younger families began in September and usually hinged on their attempts to exercise "freedom of choice" in school desegregation. During October, November, and December the cause was voter registration. The crops were in and the people, old men and women, young families, had to go.

A family in Bolivar County, Mississippi, which had always increased its cash yield by following the mechanical cotton picker to glean what it missed, watched the "picker" drag a disc, plowing their cotton under. The truck which used to pick women up to take them to the fields "didn't stop at their houses any more." Men who had held jobs for over ten years suddenly were demoted or fired. A man lost his job with the Alabama Power Company after enrolling his child in a "desegregated" school; the county was holding up his unemployment check. A Thomas County, Georgia, man lost his job and his land after transferring his children to a "white" school. Women lost their jobs as domestics and their husbands could no longer find work as handymen. Many, like an evicted sharecropper who said of the plantation owner, "He's had a mechanical picker since '55, and he has lots of people who ain't registered working," forfeited their livelihoods for their challenge to paternalism.

All over the old recalcitrant part of the South families lost their land and their homes for registering to vote or for transferring their children. More than a hundred families in Wilcox and Lowndes Counties, Alabama, at least a hundred people in West Feliciana Parish, Louisiana, and uncounted numbers of families in Bolivar, Issaquena, Sharkey, and Washington Counties, Mississippi, were put off the land. Though many of these evictions were punitive, reduced acreage allotments under the Agricultural Act of 1965 were to take a far greater toll. An estimated 4,706 seasonal workers in the Mississippi Delta alone would not be needed in 1966. These people will join the already staggering number of unemployed in the state. Agriculture Secretary Orville Freeman in December, 1965, stated that "the Mississippi welfare agency estimates that as many as 500,000 more needy persons will be added to the regular winter case load of about 300,000." Mississippi's total population is only 2,178,174. That 800,000 (or 36.7%) of this number were scheduled to receive some form of public assistance indicated the magnitude of the problem.

Tent cities in Issaquena and Washington Counties in the Delta and in Lowndes County, Alabama, housed the dispossessed. In one of the coldest winters in Delta memory people huddled inside the tents, unable to find work, waiting for federal food commodities that would hold off hunger while they tried to keep from freezing. Too many times the food got tangled in red tape and the hope of its arrival turned to bitterness.

Secretary Freeman had assured the Delta Ministry of the National Council of Churches that money would be available "soon" for Operation Help (an experimental commodities program set up under contract between state officials, the Office of Economic Opportunity, and the Department of Agriculture).

A spokesman for inhabitants of a tent city near Tribbett, Mississippi, recounted more than a year's frustrating efforts to get commodities distributed to additional poverty-stricken people in the state. Each time a private organization within a county offered to finance and staff distribution centers for the food, the U. S. Dept. of Agriculture referred the plan to the Mississippi Welfare Department, which substituted an alternate program. Immediately after the state bureau set up a commodity program in one such county the Department of Agriculture found it necessary to send an agent to investigate charges of discrimination. In another, the Food Stamp program was substituted. Food stamps must be purchased; a dollar stamp will buy six dollars worth of food (the figure represents the national average); so the very poor were not helped at all by the program. Finally a state-wide plan was initiated under which the Welfare Department was to get 24 million dollars worth of additional commodities from the Agriculture Department and 1.6 million dollars from the Office of Economic Opportunity to distribute food to 500,000 people for six months.

In the old system conditions under which vital food commodities were distributed, when they were distributed, were described by a Delta woman:

> "To live, we got to go out and chop cotton for $3 a day, maybe two or three days a week. At the end of cotton picking, we gets the same for picking the scrap the machines leave. Then in November when they start qualifying you for the commodities, they say you got to find out how many people you worked for and get them to sign for you as being poor. If they don't feel like signing, like maybe they don't like you for civil rights activities, you don't get commodities. But you still poor, whether the white boss says so or not."

In many rural areas county welfare or other administrative boards have refused to accept federal food and money. In Washington County, Mississippi, where the greatest number of people are off the land and out of work, the board of supervisors refused additional government surplus commodities because (in the words of a Delta newspaper) "the program would probably benefit primarily Negroes, and landowners are said to feel they would have more difficulty in getting spring labor if commodities were not cut off in March."

Earlier in that county, in desperation, a group of about 50 of the dispossessed had left their tents and taken up residence briefly in an abandoned air base near Greenville. This adroit demonstration brought the nation's attention at last to the plight of Mississippi's poor Negroes generally, or at least to the surface of their problems.

The federal government responded in its traditional manner—by, as a spokesman for the Office of Economic Opportunity's Rural Task Force said, "putting the problem in the same category with Watts, trying to head off trouble." It undertook a labor survey in the Delta and activated the long-promised, dormant 25.6 million dollar surplus program in the state, "the most massive food distribution program since the depression." If the commodities program were stop-gap, presaging more constructive action, it would be welcome relief. But there was the impression that thirty years after the depression, federal remedies for hunger and broken lives and hopelessness had not changed. People who needed the best, most imaginative programs society could muster still got commodities—subsistence—"the dole."

There was not much chance that such palliatives could do more than keep the mass of people alive while buying off moderate leadership. Caesar's old desire for fat folks around him had not changed.

As a matter of policy the poverty program brings together in local administrative agencies whites and Negroes of all classes. While this is perhaps a noble blueprint intention, it has the effect in such a state as Mississippi of putting intransigent whites in a position to block the kind of change which the program is designed to facilitate.

The poverty program had indicated a shift in emphasis on the part of the federal government toward solutions to the fundamental problem of dependence, of economic vulnerability. It came before massive demonstrations demanded it. But it has not as yet reached those who most desperately need it, and its effect has been in all too many instances one of heightening frustrations. This adds another dimension to the problem of government's role in the Negro's struggle: In the event of massive protest or outright riots by poor people the government's traditional approach of enacting a law that answers the surface needs and quiets the protesters will be less easy, since such a law already exists. So again—the need for strong enforcement and implementation is at the crux of the problem. A reappraisal of this essential aspect of government programs as they affect the Negro community is vital if the nation is to have an answer for outbursts such as Watts which seem almost inevitable in the immediate future.

The poverty program had promised to do more than "dole"—to allow poor people themselves to launch an attack on poverty by means of increasing their own training and exposing themselves to at least a smattering of middle class culture and values. Yet it has failed in many instances to provide even the stop-gap measures such as commodities to fill immediate needs of those who are desperately poor. Its effect was to deepen the disillusionment of people like those in Mississippi who said:

> "You know, we ain't dumb, even if we are poor. We need jobs. We need food. We need houses. But even with the poverty program we ain't got nothin' but needs . . . See, you can only accept poor peoples by being poor and really know what being poor is like. And all this stuff about poverty programs and federal funds, that's out for poor peoples. We were looked upon as just a civil rights demonstration [at the Greenville air base]. But really we were there demanding and waiting and asking that these things be brought there to fill some desperate needs. And we was asking that the poor peoples be accepted as they stood. And instead of getting what we was asking we got the whole air force troopers in on us. To me, that's our government."

> "I feel that the federal government have proven that it don't care about poor people. Everything that we have asked for through these years has been handed down on paper. It's never been a reality.
> "We the poor people of Mississippi is tired. We're tired of it so we're going to build for ourselves, because we don't have a government that represents us."

Self-Help

To a few, "building for ourselves" had gone beyond the immediacy of a tent city to establishment of cooperatives aimed at breaking the chains of economic dependence. Cooperatives, producing everything from candles to furniture, handbags, quilts and clothing, faced many difficulties. Tools, teachers, and money were badly needed. Without capital, and long-term capital at that, most cooperatives were doomed. Outlets for products were hard to find; often they were either "sympathy" markets which are quickly exhausted or sophisticated ones that require a broad financial base for participation. Cooperatives which foster communal arrangements run the risk of becoming another Koinonia (an integrated communal farm in south Georgia which was under siege for several years). The co-ops held out hope for a way to those desperately in need of it and so were in danger of increasing bitterness and frustration if the effort failed.

At the same time, they also fostered a spirit of organization that does not die with the failure.

Self-respect on the part of Negroes is at the heart of all efforts to improve their status within the community and the nation. For people who have lost all hope and confidence (and this would include many whose pathetically small educational experience has stifled verbalization rather than enhanced it) self-respect can come from another's interest and respect. That civil rights organizations stress the beauty and worth of each individual has had a large part in instilling self-respect in people whom society as a whole has literally forgotten. To men and women who have had their identities absorbed into a system more ruthlessly dehumanizing than modern industrial society, being valued by another person can be a real beginning toward self-respect. The co-ops have much the same effect, producing tangible objects that are sources of pride. In a real sense the Tribbett tent city, set up to provide homes for striking Delta laborers, while failing to provide a permanent solution to the complex problems of jobless, homeless people, was a rallying point for all the Delta's dispossessed. All across the South, aggressive county "Improvement Leagues" and "Christian Associations" are evidence of Negroes' new awareness of their power.

Half a century after Booker T. Washington's "self-improvement" plan, the poorest Negro's chance of sharing in the South's "new prosperity" was so remote that even the hard-won ballot was often a cruel joke. If the voter's league succeeded in conquering white dominance and taking over a county—what then? Where would the money come from to pave the roads candidates promised would be paved?

To desegregate rural schools may solve the immediate problem, but those schools remain the worst in the nation. Many rural counties do not now afford the minimum matching funds states require. It is prosaic but nonetheless true that nascent efforts toward tax equalization may be the most far-reaching gain for rural Negroes yet devised. But virtually every tax case must be fought long and bitterly in the courts, holding in abeyance any hope that Wilcox, Lowndes, and like counties can be governed at all.

In struggling with these problems newly formed Negro organizations are confronted with the old vestiges of protest, of negativism, and with a growing bitterness and real alienation from American life. Woven into these organizations is a new radicalism which, on the surface, wants no part of the white man's consensus, daring the Negro to go his own way—to, as Charles Silberman said in Fortune (November, 1965), "stop pounding on the door" and, in effect, "tear the house down." Some groups are torn between the tempting chauvinism of their own political slate, which proves their strength, and merger with white "moderates" who are willing to yield to the most superficial of their demands in order to manipulate that power. This presents Negroes with a dilemma that must be faced by the nation as a whole.

The dilemma is an American reflection of a world-wide pattern in which the poor, colored, economically underdeveloped, rural world is seeking fundamental changes in the face of the status quo-oriented world of rich, white, urbanized Europe and North America—all fostered by industrialization, creating "haves" in cities, by-passing shabby "have-nots" on the land. Until recently people in the countryside were never organized.

The Populists came closest in the past, close enough to put a permanent fear into southern Bourbons—fear that lower class whites and Negroes might actually cooperate to throw off Bourbon rule. That fear operates today. So far there has been little actual political cooperation between the races, except in border states like Texas where the Negro population is comparatively small and increasingly urban. There labor, Negroes, Latin Americans and white liberals struggle toward an effective coalition. But Texas has a degree of primitive political sophistication that removes it from the southern arena. In the South generally the lower class white has absorbed enough of the shibboleths, looks forward to a share in the "new prosperity," and finds such psychological value in feeling superior to the Negro that it has been difficult to forge a class awareness. He may, however, come to vote with Negroes on some issues without really meaning to. These people still feel a link with the upper class power structure because of color, rejecting alliance with the Negro for economic reasons. That this further isolates the Negro goes without saying.

Answering Anger

Urban Negroes are cut off from all but the most impersonal contact with whites. They are crowded into slums in the city's core surrounded by housing project palisades, ringed by white suburbia. Until very recently urban Negroes have been poorly organized, venting their frustration on other Negroes. Now radicalism of the same tonal quality as the rural brand has permeated city organizations, directing the rebellion outward. In the past the only attention-getter that produced results was demonstrations. But outside of isolated picketing of a slum-lord's home or sporadic rent strikes, there is a troublesome realization that the negativism of protest can only call attention to the problem and has little to do with fundamental solutions. In one large city slum, civil rights groups and unaffiliated interested citizens have worked for more than a year to organize effective self-help projects that reach people untouched by the poverty program. The efforts met with limited success until early February when an old man froze to death in an unheated shack. Out of this and other instances of people wretchedly cold, hungry, and hopeless came picketing and rent strikes, and the threat that the slum could become another Watts.

Young liberal idealists who have worked to organize the community have themselves been challenged by the new mood of anger and rebellion. People evicted for participating in a rent strike gathered around a campfire which was the only warmth for families living in hastily erected tents. Out of this meeting came the new voice, the new challenge and the old weapon: "Why don't we 'accidently-on-purpose' burn all these damn houses down?" Young men and women, Negro and white, who had recently seemed radical suddenly became the "moderates," arguing against the burning and the destruction of a white-owned grocery store and white-run Bible center in the area. They came away knowing that their victory was a new form of tokenism—violence grudgingly held in abeyance.

In abdicating responsibility for the lives of Negroes held in slums or in feudal conditions on the land, the white South may already have thrown away its chance to direct the new explosive energy that is feeding on Negro discontent. It has cut itself off from the slums. It has, through "welfare," paid poor Negroes (and, incidentally, whites) to stay off the middle class streets and out of sight. If there is any possibility for whites to regain any voice in the Negro community, they will have to forsake their solidarity, cease bloc voting, and above all work diligently to break the cycle of segregated housing, poor schools, and menial jobs. City governments would have no choice but to deal realistically with the causes of discontent rather than with hand-picked middle class Negro negotiators.

Until recently the great mass of Negroes living in poverty in city slums has been cut off from middle class Negroes, who emulated their white counterparts. The same thing was true politically—in rare instances when a Negro was elected to public office he usually joined the white power structure as soon as it made room for him. Now there is a new middle class mood of resentment, which matches in spirit if not in depth the folk consciousness of rural radicalism.

Reasons for this resentment are obvious. Middle class Negroes, virtually the only ones touched so far by federal legislation, have found progress toward tangible results of equal opportunity frustratingly slow. There is a new awareness that even the first "easy" gains—simply peeling off the old dead layers of institutionalized prejudice—took ten years. To struggle so long just to see two prominent civil rights leaders' children in one elementary school or seven middle class Negroes join the Georgia House while an outspoken representative of lower class Negro radicalism was denied his seat on grounds that he disqualified himself by rashly-worded opposition to the Vietnam war—to buy tokenism at too high a price—has at last worn patience thin. Finally, too, successful middle class Negro politicians are becoming aware of the wishes and race consciousness of their overwhelmingly poor constituency. Typical of this new voice in southern politics was the conservative, newly-elected Negro alderman of Atlanta who warned whites that Negroes in the heart of the city would no longer honor the traditional Negro-upper class white alliance which had agreed on an annexation balance and had at the same time assured control by paternalistic whites. Affirming that Negroes might soon control the city because of the white flight to the suburbs, the alderman speculated on Negroes' control of such vital services as electric power and water as an effective method of bargaining with white suburbia. He urged a fair housing law as a realistic remedy.

All levels of government must deal realistically with this new determination to negotiate from strength rather than rely on the old appeal to white conscience. Whites, too, must realize that in many ways the psychological condition of Negroes generally is similar to that of the middle class and peasantry in France prior to the revolution. The first feeble gains, opening the door just wide enough to let those outside look at life inside, have spurred a greater desire to participate in that life; at the same time frustration with lagging progress tempts the outsiders to destroy it . . . .

Federal Response

To many it has seemed that the nation's response to Negroes' needs has been unimaginative. And most efforts to implement existing laws have met with limited success. In the case of both the Civil Rights and Voting Acts, government action came as a response to protest by organized groups, and, though their effects were far from complete, they stilled the protest. There is every indication that the government will react in the same manner to continued violence against civil rights workers in the South. But this is merely a surface response—a sort of negation of negativism. Little actual headway can be made until Negroes in the South are less economically vulnerable and thus less subject to that method of intimidation. There is an incredibly tenacious determination on the part of poverty stricken people, particularly in rural areas, to give their children a chance for a better education. But loss of a job requires that people sustain themselves and their determination over what seems an endless time. Thus this form of reprisal is often more effective than a bombing or a beating. Violence often merely strengthens the will and in many cases unites a whole community where other attempts at unity have failed. And yet the violence persists, and does have its deadly effectiveness, if not directly any more, then in subconscious ways that limit Negro options and initiatives.

One of the strongest moves toward better enforcement of the civil rights law was the tightening of guidelines for school desegregation by the Office of Education for fall, 1966, school openings. But the test of this new strength was yet to come.

In a letter asking Negro parents voluntarily to send their children to segregated schools in spite of a Justice Department-initiated suit seeking desegregation of the system, Wilcox County, Alabama, school officials invoked the old reminder that one day the Yankee would tire of idealism, as he had in the past, abandoning the Negroes once again to the white South: "The people of this county will, in all probability, have to continue to live here in this county together after the influences from without have ceased. It is best for all if they can do so in a mutual spirit of good will."

One recalcitrant county in a state notorious for defiance should not be treated as a curiously rebellious mutant in an otherwise acquiescent region. At almost the same time that Wilcox County sounded its primitive warning, Deep South public officials were protesting the sudden, drastic nature of the Office of Education's new guidelines requiring pupil desegregation beyond tokenism and a start toward faculty integration. Twelve years after the Brown decision, feigned shock and overt defiance were not yet isolated phenomena and the violence hinted at in the Wilcox letter is still very much a factor to be reckoned with by people who defy custom in the "hard-core" South.

There have been ten killings, uncounted beatings, burnings, bombings, and shootings since that "peaceful" school desegregation began in September, 1965. Yet the result will never again be the old fearful withdrawal. And, though the violence is largely rural, it is felt in the city more keenly now than ever before. Though Negroes have for some time been moving into cities and all major civil rights organizations except the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee operate chiefly from city bases, the emotional center of the civil rights movement remains in places like Lowndes County, scene of two civil rights slayings, and a symbol of the Movement is unpunished brutalization of Negroes in such places. Now a "civil rights assassin" who gets off with a stern reprimand by the judge and a hearty handshake from his cohorts may trigger widespread violent reprisal by Negroes in city slums and on the land. A Negro "moderate's" outrage that his brother's killer escaped without even the reprimand prompted his rejection of any possibility of dealing peacefully with whites: "We'll have to lay and wait for them all night, and fight with them all day . . . . No Negroes are free until all Negroes are free. No one can free us but ourselves. . . . It's time to start killing."

Throughout accounts of the white South's violence there runs a new thread of Negroes' fearlessness and determination—and a warning: "I've been stomped down and stomped down all of my life. It's been long enough."

Behind misleading headlines and misconceptions about orderly progress in the South were complexities long familiar.

In the first place, since 1954 and before, reaction to federal court decrees and law affecting segregation had been of three kinds—a grudging, but good faith acceptance, an effort to evade through administrative delay and cheating, and all-out resistance with violence and terroristic intimidation and reprisal. All three reactions could and did occur in all eleven states. Some states, like Tennessee, were characterized by a predominance of the first; some, like Virginia and South Carolina, by a predominance of the second; and some, like Alabama and Mississippi, by a predominance of the third. These were old familiar configurations in the South.

The pattern of reaction to the 1964 civil rights law was essentially this same three-way split. If there was any cause for rejoicing, it was in that at least in its official stance, the government of such a state as Mississippi was no longer encouraging all-out, violent resistance. But there was no overnight change in the South in attitude or patterns of compliance, with the overnight change of the law.

Nor was there any change in one of the oldest truths regarding these three southern reactions to the will of the nation. The resistance would be attempted, grow, and persist to the degree that the enforcement arms of the federal government allowed it. Full enforcement, as it has always been, was possible. It was not forthcoming.

Two other pieces of federal legislation promised a permanent solution to this old problem of enforcement. One was the pledge of the Johnson Administration in 1965 to enact new laws to strengthen southern institutions of justice, and to protect persons exercising constitutional rights from southern lawlessness. The other was the 1965 Voting Rights Act, which promised eventual development of Negro political power sufficient to demand compliance, and an end of lawless violence.

Out of these forces—poverty, continued white resistance, less than full federal enforcement, resultant disillusionment—and out of the new psychological state of Negro Americans (their unwillingness to settle for anything less than full citizenship) was coming something new in the South. It could destroy whatever hopefulness there was in the situation for the kind of transformation the nation seemed to think had already come. Or it could be another catalyst to force the nation and the white South yet another turn in the torturous facing about to full intellectual honesty in dealings with Negroes.

This most compelling factor has to do with the mood of answering anger, of retaliatory violence among Negroes of the South, and the threat in the cities, particularly, of rampage and riot, echoing the legacy of white lawlessness so long the South's greatest disgrace. The anger itself is not new, nor the fear among white Southerners that it will be unleashed. Only the signs that the anger is closer to the surface, nearer to exploding, are new. That it has not exploded in the past is but a dim hope that it will not explode in the future. Unless the realization of promises and potential can be speeded—this seems about the only hope.

But the worst excesses of the ugly side of the South have always had a counterpoint, however faint, of a relation between the races more truly representative of the American ideal than anywhere else. In the shifting patterns of public and private life in the South, forces are at work which encourage this better side of the South more than they have ever before been encouraged. The forebodings current in 1965-66 among those who know the region best in many ways suggest darkness before dawn. It is important to know, though, that the new day is not yet here.

Acts of Intimidation, Reprisal and Violence September, 1965 through February, 1966

SEPTEMBER

Laurel, MISSISSIPPI

Jackson Daily News 9/16/65. Dateline: Laurel (AP).

"Shots were fired into the house of a local civil rights leader here today for the second time in 90 days."

A Negro dentist, president of the local chapter of the NAACP, said, "There were no injuries this time as was the case June 15."

Folling Fork and Anguilla, MISSISSIPPI

AFSC Field Report.

Ten families enrolled their children in "white" schools. All working members of all ten families lost their jobs.

Akron, ALABAMA

Selma Times-Journal 9/3/65. Dateline: Akron (AP).

The night before 35 Negroes were to enter a previously all-white school someone tried to set fire to city hall and the fire department.

The Negro children were not permitted to enroll.

AFSC Field Report.

White men with guns ringed the school and prevented Negro parents from registering their children.

Grace and Glen Allen, MISSISSIPPI

AFSC Field Report.

Negro parents who tried to exercise "freedom of choice" were evicted.

Calhoun, GEORGIA

Atlanta Constitution 9/29/65. Dateline: Calhoun (UPI).

A Negro motorist was injured when three white boys pushed his car over an embankment and left him in the wreckage.

West Point, MISSISSIPPI

AFSC Field Report.

A family who owns a few acres of land and their own home near West Point enrolled two of their eight children in the "white" school. For the past twenty years the father had worked at the same job in West Point. After his son tested the validity of the public accommodations section of the Civil Rights Act, the father lost his job. He got it back, enrolled his children and lost it again. He was offered money to withdraw the children. He refused. His wife lost her job as a domestic. In November, just after his employer had called him back to work, the sheriff arrested him for having a shotgun in his car. (Carrying a shotgun in an automobile is legal in Mississippi.) He was fired again in December. Later he was jailed for running a stop sign.

Baker County, GEORGIA

Atlanta Constitution 9/4/65. Dateline: Washington (AP).

A group of Baker County Negroes asked the Justice Department for protection from local whites.

One spokesman said that 150 Negro children were signed up to go to the white schools but their parents were threatened with loss of jobs, so the number went down to 40.

Another spokesman said Negroes were beaten when they went to the courthouse in Newton to try to talk to the Baker County sheriff.

Amherst, VIRGINIA

Norfolk Virginian-Pilot 9/6/65. Dateline: Amherst (AP).

A riot involving 250 people of both races broke out during a fight between five Negroes and five whites.

Wetumpka, ALABAMA

AFSC Field Report.

The mother of three of 19 Negro children attending "white" schools in Elmore County has been active in voter registration and school desegregation. She had been regularly called as a substitute teacher until she enrolled her children in integrated schools. Since then she has had only one call. In October her house burned, and the fire department did not attempt to put out the blaze. One of her sons was accused of stealing a pair of $4 sunglasses from the supermarket where he had worked for some time. He was arrested, found guilty, sentenced to jail or a fine of $38. When his mother paid the fine, her son was released bleeding from a head wound.

Atlanta Journal 2/16/66. Dateline: Washington.

"Intimidation, harassment and violence have prevented school desegregation in Sumter County, Georgia, and accompanied it in Americus, according to the U. S. Civil Rights Commission."

"In Sumter, all Negro children who picked white schools to attend under a free choice plan changed their minds . . . .

"In Americus . . . Negro students were struck with fists, had rocks and books thrown at them, were called derogatory names, had books torn from their hands, were tripped and spat on, and were nearly run down by cars in the school parking lot."

Headland, Henry County, ALABAMA

AFSC Field Report.

A mother said the whites sent someone to try to convince them not to send their children to the "desegregated" school. She got a message that someone would "hang those children up to a tree if they tried to go to the white school."

West Point, MISSISSIPPI

AFSC Field Report.

A couple who own their home took several children to the "white" schools in the opening days before buses began picking them up. When whites fired into her home, the woman sat on her porch with her shotgun and fired back. As a result of their transporting the children, both lost jobs and the white man who owns access to the road leading to their property fenced it off and put up "no trespassing" signs.

Cottonwood, ALABAMA

AFSC Field Report.

When one mother sent her son to the "white" school a policeman came to her home and said that if she did not withdraw the boy he would be "put away."

Merigold, MISSISSIPPI

AFSC Field Report.

After enrolling their seven children in the newly desegregated Drew school system, a Negro family was evicted from the plantation where both had worked ten years. The overseer offered to go with them to withdraw the children. When they refused, he would not allow the family to follow the automatic cotton picker to increase the yield of their 26 acres. When the picker went along the rows there was a disc attached to it that plowed the cotton under.

Thomas County, GEORGIA

AFSC Field Report.

A Negro farmer enrolled two of his children in Thomas County "white" schools. His home was shot into and he began receiving threatening telephone calls. His landlord told him he had three days to get out of the home in which he had lived for nine years. After he moved to Thomasville, the county superintendent told his children they would have to leave the county school system as their residence was now Thomasville.

Wetumpka, ALABAMA

Southern Courier 9/18/65. Dateline: Wetumpka.

After being struck with rubber bands repeatedly by the same white boy, a Negro girl jabbed him in the arm with a pencil. She was expelled from school, arrested, held in jail overnight, and finally released on a $300 property bond.

Alabama Journal (Montgomery, Ala.) 1/5/66. Dateline: Wetumpka.

Fire destroyed the home of a Negro man, "whose daughter, one of 17 Negro students who desegregated Wetumpka High School in September, had been suspended from school for stabbing a white boy with a pencil. She returned to school Monday, following the end of her suspension period."

The deputy state fire marshal found two whiskey bottles "filled with something" in the bed of a truck parked outside the burned home, but said he saw no evidence of arson or "racial trouble."

Demopolis, ALABAMA

AFSC Field Report.

A Negro truck driver was fired from his job after attending a PTA meeting at the "white" school where his daughter is a student. He had held the job 18 years and had an excellent employment record—the only driver with no traffic violations on his record. After the PTA meeting local merchants had a meeting and agreed not to accept any merchandise he delivered.

Camilla, GEORGIA

Atlanta Journal 2/22/66. Dateline: Washington.

"The Justice Department has charged a Mitchell County, Georgia deputy sheriff with illegally arresting and beating a Negro farm worker" in September.

AFSC Field Report.

When a Negro tenant farmer filled out transfer forms for his six children to attend the "white" school, the man whose farm he lived and worked on came with a deputy sheriff and asked whether he planned to transfer his children. The tenant replied that he intended to do so. He was then handcuffed and taken to jail, severely beaten on the way, and again beaten while in jail, this time by a white prisoner.

Choctaw County, ALABAMA

AFSC Field Report.

On the first day of school white men with guns surrounded the "white" school.

Memphis, TENNESSEE

Memphis Commercial Appeal 9/25/65. Dateline: Memphis.

In an effort to arrest a Negro suspect two white police officers were "struck by a hail of bricks, bottles and boards" hurled by other Negroes.

Conway, NORTH CAROLINA

Raleigh News & Observer 9/29/65. Dateline: Conway.

A local union official, active in the county voters' movement, was victim of a cross-burning and a beating by whites.

Fayette County, TENNESSEE

Chattanooga Times 9/2/65. Dateline: (AP).

"A west Tennessee school bus driver, accused of spraying disinfectant on two Negro first graders before letting them on a desegregated bus, was sharply criticized by his superiors."

The Fayette County school superintendent called it a "stupid act that marred the peaceful and orderly desegregation program in our county."

The bus driver declined "to admit or deny the incident, but said he assigned the youngsters to the rear of the bus."

Wilmington, North Carolina

Raleigh News & Observer 9/7/65. Dateline: Wilmington (UPI).

A Negro man and his white neighbor were sitting on the Negro's front porch when another white tossed two lighted Molotov cocktails into the side of the dwelling. Neighbors smothered the flames.

Jacksonville, NORTH CAROLINA

Raleigh News & Observer 10/5/65. Dateline: Jacksonville.

"Two young men who admitted guilt in connection with the dynamite bombing of a Negro migrant workers' sleeping quarters last month near Swansboro, Monday were given five-year suspended sentences in Onslow Superior Court.

"In passing sentence . . . [the judge] said he had given much thought to the crime during the weekend and concluded there was no motive to harm the Negroes, that the men were trying to frighten them."

Enterprise, Coffee County, ALABAMA

AFSC Field Report.

A Negro salesman was demoted from area manager for a Chicago-based business firm to representative. He consistently led his region in sales. He had enrolled his children in an integrated school in September.

Warner Robins, GEORGIA

AFSC Field Report.

A Negro woman had been lunchroom manager in the Negro high school for ten years. Her daughter urged Negro parents to transfer their children. The lunchroom manager, whose work had never drawn complaints, was fired ostensibly for not keeping her kitchen in good condition.

Waynesboro, GEORGIA

AFSC Field Report.

A Negro family exercised "freedom of choice" and sent their child to a formerly all-white school. They were evicted and their home was shot into.

Aberdeen, MISSISSIPPI

Memphis Commercial Appeal 9/7/65. Dateline: Aberdeen.

"Police said Monday that at least 32 shots were fired Sunday night into the home of a Negro couple whose son enrolled at a previously all-white school in Aberdeen last week . . . ."

The couple's son was one of two Negro children admitted "without incident" to the second grade.

"School desegregation also got under way in several other cities over the state without trouble . . . .

"Other shooting incidents were reported in Central Mississippi—one in Scott County and another at Florence.

"The Scott County sheriff's office declined comment on a report that a Negro parent exchanged shots with a group of white men who tried to burn a cross in front of his home near Forest . . . .

"They also have a daughter who registered at a previously all-white school."

McComb, MISSISSIPPI

Jackson Daily News 9/9/65. Dateline: McComb (AP).

A hand grenade was hurled into a yard, exploding near two Negro workmen who were building a patio.

Vanceboro, NORTH CAROLINA

Raleigh News and Observer 9/21/65. Dateline: Washington.

A spokesman for Negroes in the Vanceboro area blamed inadequate police protection for Negroes from the Ku Klux Klan for outbreaks of violence by Negro youths.

"The Negroes of the Vanceboro area, and the whites who believe in justice and lawful means, have been more than patient with the many atrocities which they have suffered in the last few months," the spokesman said.

OCTOBER

Knoxville, TENNESSEE

Chattanooga Times 12/4/65 Dateline: Knoxville (AP).

Three 15-year-old Negro boys were indicted for murder in the razor slaying of a white man, October 16. They were quoted at the time of their arrest as saying they attacked the man "because he was the first white man they saw after they became angered over watching a white boy stab a Negro boy in a street fight."

Suffolk, VIRGINIA

Norfolk Virginia-Pilot 11/1/65. Dateline: Suffolk.

"Two Negroes were wounded Sunday (10/31) by a shotgun blast fired from a passing car . . . just after they left a Negro voter rally."

Barnwell, SOUTH CAROLINA

The Columbia State 11/1/65. Dateline: Barnwell (AP).

The local NAACP field director said that four Negro voter registration drive workers "were severely beaten up and one stabbed by a crowd of 15 or 20 white youths and men at Barnwell Saturday night.

"The field secretary said the group told him at least one Barnwell police officer saw the incident and did nothing."

Nashville, TENNESSEE

Chattanooga Times 10/4/65 Dateline: Nashville (AP).

An African student, arrested when companions were allegedly found drinking whiskey from coffee cups (violating Nashville's blue laws), charged that he was beaten by police.

Blackville, SOUTH CAROLINA

The Columbia State 10/13/65. Dateline: Blackville.

"Fights between whites and Negroes that broke out during a municipal election write-in campaign by Negroes here were under investigation Tuesday by the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

"The Negroes filed a protest with the U. S. Attorney General, charging that Negro pollwatchers were beaten. Blackville city officials said Negro pollwatchers attempted to come inside the voting booths.

"The fights took place outside polling places Monday, Blackville police said. No charges were filed, officers said."

Covington, TENNESSEE

Chattanooga Times 10/21/65. Dateline: Memphis (AP).

"A Negro civil rights worker said Wednesday a white man pistol-whipped a Negro woman and fired shots at a Negro man outside a drive-in restaurant in nearby Covington Tuesday night."

While the two Negroes were inside the drive-in "this man walked up to the car and told the others they had no business there."

Chattanooga, TENNESSEE

Chattanooga Times 10/14/65.

A Negro neighborhood youth corpsman was shot and killed by a white fellow worker. The young Negro was seated on bleachers the corpsmen were building near a high school, when the white youth walked up and opened fire with a .22 caliber pistol.

Tallapoosa County, ALABAMA

Norfolk Virginia-Pilot 10/12/65. Dateline: Norfolk.

A white girl participating in a VISTA training program at Tuskegee Institute was living with a rural Negro family in Tallapoosa County.

"Soon after we got there this white man came by, screaming that the Klan was coming and asking us to go with him and he'd save us," she said. "We didn't go with him.

"But then later this Negro man was beaten up and had his arm broken because of his association with us. They threatened to take another man's job away."

Vanceboro, NORTH CAROLINA

Raleigh News and Observer 11/2/65. Dateline: Vanceboro.

A Negro church was dynamited Sunday, Oct. 31, in the third bombing in Craven County during the year.

"Negro leaders said it had not been used for civil rights meetings and they were at loss to explain the incident."

Birmingham, ALABAMA

Birmingham News 10/22/65. Dateline: Birmingham.

A young Negro was charged with murder in the knife-slaying of a white man.

"The white youth reportedly swung at the Negro with a bat and was stabbed in the chest."

Colerain, NORTH CAROLINA

Raleigh News & Observer 10/12/65. Dateline: Colerain.

In a predominantly white neighborhood a school scheduled to receive six Negro classes containing approximately 200 students was heavily damaged when "oil or gas of some type" was poured on the floor and the building set fire.

Montgomery, ALABAMA

New Orleans Times-Picayune 10/31/65. Dateline: Montgomery (AP).

Alabama's attorney general, "an outspoken moderate on the racial issue and frequent critic of Gov. George C. Wallace, is nursing a sore jaw and some loosened teeth Saturday, after being slugged at a football game."

The attorney general had recently acted as prosecutor in the murder trial of a Ku Klux Klansman.

Trenton, NORTH CAROLINA

Raleigh News & Observer 10/16/65. Dateline: Trenton (AP).

The FBI began investigation of a dynamiting outside the home of a Negro in the Wise Forks community.

Hampton, SOUTH CAROLINA

The Columbia State 10/6/65. Dateline: Hampton.

"An elderly Negro junk dealer was shot and killed in Hampton Tuesday afternoon, apparently after an argument over money."

The sheriff said the old man had been "a fixture in the town. He made his living by collecting and selling junk from a movable cart."

A white man was charged with the murder.

Lincolnton, GEORGIA

Atlanta Constitution 10/23/65. Dateline: Lincolnton.

"A pickup truck drove into a line of about 95 teen-age Negro marchers Friday afternoon, signalling a charge by about 30 whites shouting 'Kill the niggers! Kill them!'

"Demonstrators were beaten to the ground as five state troopers left their cars and tried to restore order. No one was reported hurt . . . .

"Meanwhile in Washington, Ga., 13 Negro civil rights demonstrators swore out peace warrants against the white driver of another pickup truck, charging he had tried to run them down."

Smithfield, NORTH CAROLINA

Raleigh News and Observer 11/23/65. Dateline: Smithfield.

Five white persons, including three high school students, are charged with dynamiting the all-Negro Bagley Elementary School in the early-morning of October 25.

Newton, GEORGIA

Atlanta Constitution 10/6/65. Dateline: Newton (AP).

The Baker County sheriff said five carloads of unidentified men built a large fire in front of a rural Negro home Monday night and then began firing, apparently with a shotgun.

Crawfordville, GEORGIA

Washington Post 10/19/65. Dateline: Crawfordville.

The Taliaferro County sheriff said that seven Ku Klux Klan 'Black Shirts' were arrested on charges of "forcing a Negro farmer off a road near here yesterday, attempting to beat him and pointing shotguns and pistols at him."

The sheriff said that the farmer had not taken part in recent demonstrations in the area.

"He's just a good ol' darky," the Sheriff said.

Atlanta Journal 10/22/65. Dateline: Americus.

"Telephone harassment and cold shoulders in Americus have forced a 63-year-old former college president and his wife to become the second family to decide to leave the southwest Georgia town where racial unrest flared this summer."

The white man had sent a letter to local government officials asking them "to try and contain our racial problems."

Birmingham, ALABAMA

Birmingham News 10/7/65. Dateline: Birmingham.

"A white ambulance driver who refused to pick up a dying Negro traffic victim Wednesday night has been fired from his job."

The manager of the ambulance company said the driver reached the still-conscious man and drove away, "leaving the victim lying on the concrete where he died."

The driver told the ambulance manager he did not pick up the injured Negro because "he didn't think he was seriously hurt."

The Negro was victim of a two-car collision in which he was trapped between the vehicles. An official wreck investigator said both the man's legs had been chopped off by the impact.

NOVEMBER

Livingston, LOUISIANA

New Orleans Times-Picayune 11/19/65. Dateline: Livingston (AP).

Five white men were given six-month suspended sentences for aggravated assault "in the shooting of a Negro's car near Watson."

The Negro man drove his car past the one in which the five were riding and they opened fire on him with a rifle.

Nashville, TENNESSEE

Memphis Commercial Appeal. 11/9/65. Dateline: Nashville (UPI).

"A 10-year-old Negro boy brutally beaten . . . by a white youth died Monday night." A fifteen-year-old white boy, already charged with assault with intent to murder, "probably" would be charged with murder, according to police.

Fayetteville, NORTH CAROLINA

Raleigh News and Observer 11/8/65. Dateline: Fayetteville.

Three Negro marines, armed with pistols, a carbine, a sawed-off shotgun and a hand grenade, terrorized the Fayetteville area several hours before their arrest. They claimed membership in the National Abolitionist Forces, "described as a militant Negro group."

The organization's handwritten oath includes clauses "against the Ku Klux Klan and white rule," officers said.

Ferriday, LOUISIANA

New Orleans Times-Picayune 11/23/65. Dateline: Ferriday (AP).

Police, arriving at the scene of a firebombing, arrested the civil right's worker whose home was target of the blast. The man had emerged from the burning building carrying a shotgun.

Mami, FLORIDA

St. Petersburg Times 11/25/65. Dateline: Miami (UPI).

"A 30-year-old Air Force veteran was charged yesterday with firebombing Negro and Jewish residential areas from a small airplane to 'scare the pants off' left wing agitators."

Barnwell, SOUTH CAROLINA

The State (Columbia, S. C.) 11/2/65. Dateline: Barnwell.

A fight erupted between Negro and white youths at a Halloween street dance. One Negro girl received a stab wound and three other Negroes reported injuries. Police suggested that the Negroes sign warrants for the arrest of whites responsible for the attack, whose pictures appeared in a newspaper. Civil rights workers helping with a voter registration project in the area said they did not pursue the matter "because it wouldn't do any good."

Greenville, ALABAMA

Southern Courier 11/20-21/65. Dateline: Greenville.

"When police halted a civil rights march here last Saturday, one officer's leg was broken and other policemen were hit by flying bricks, rocks and bottles."

To the city attorney, who was also injured, it was "clearly a case of anarchy."

Many of the young people involved were "in high spirits after the incident. They said it was provoked by police. Six of the marchers said they were hit with billy-clubs before the rock-throwing began."

Local Negroes, cooperating with SCLC's protest against "segregated justice," want "a better life, and they want the whites to know it . . . .

"Some white people still say they don't understand what the Negroes want. A slender 18-year-old Negro girl found this hard to believe.

" 'Nothing seems to help,' she said, 'We're trapped!!'. . . .

"One 15-year-old girl told a mass meeting that 'there ain't one of you here that's a man, because you let them cops make you run.'

"After Saturday's fray, a battered sign the marchers had carried lay on the ground.

"It said, 'Violence Is the Result of Ignorance, Peace is God's Way.' "

Gray, GEORGIA

Atlanta Journal 11/10/65. Dateline: Gray (AP).

A former Marine Corps surgeon has been charged with arson in the burning of two Negro churches and a home.

Baton Rouge, LOUISIANA

New Orleans Times-Picayune 11/8/65. Dateline: Baton Rouge (AP).

The FBI joined local investigators "seeking a reason for the explosions which destroyed a Baton Rouge printing shop late Saturday night."

The owner said "about 80 per cent of their jobwork was for churches, that they had printed no controversial material, and had not been involved in any labor disputes."

Prior to the bombing the FBI had made a routine investigation at the plant to determine if the owner had printed cards for the Ku Klux Klan. A few days later, the owner said, "a man came into the place with several pieces of literature he said he wanted printed for the KKK." The owner declined the job and "explained that the FBI had already checked his shop."

Memphis, TENNESSEE

Memphis Commercial Appeal 11/15/65.

The Memphis branch of the NAACP filed a complaint against two white police officers charging brutality. The complaint cited an incident in which a Negro mother was abused by police. The officers came to her home to investigate a complaint of disorderly conduct. "She stated that she told them no one there had called and there had been no disturbance. When the officers entered the house to search it, she said, she asked them if they had a search warrant and . . . (one of the officers) told her he did not need one."

She said the officers "proceeded into her children's rooms after she told them her daughters were in bed and some of the other children were preparing for bed."

The woman said she was "not allowed to put on street clothes before leaving the house and was shoved into her closet when she tried to dress. She also said she was kicked by one of the officers after being pushed out of the house."

The complaint also charged that she "was cursed in the presence of her children, aged 1 to 15 years."

She charged she was later beaten while in police custody.

Jackson, MISSISSIPPI

Jackson Daily News 12/1/65.

The partially decomposed body of an unidentified Negro was found in Lake Hico November 30. A deputy investigator described the victim as wearing carpenter's overalls with a red shirt tied around his waist.

"For this reason," the deputy said, "we would not rule out the possibility of foul play."

He said police feel that the shirt might have been used to drag the body to the water's edge.

Victoria, Lunenburg County, VIRGINIA
Norfolk Virginian-Pilot 11/19/65 (AP).

A Negro youth suffered a scalp wound when he was shot from a passing car. He was standing in front of the Virginia Student Civil Rights Committee headquarters.

Charlotte, NORTH CAROLINA
Raleigh News and Observer 11/23/65. Dateline: Charlotte (AP).

"The stillness of a foggy, rainy morning was broken by explosions at the large, modern homes of four Negro civil rights leaders. They and their families escaped injury although damage was extensive . . . .

"A city councilman, a federal court official, a dentist and the state president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People were the targets of pre-dawn bombers Monday."

The head of "Operation Rebuilding" felt that "they (the bombers) have done much damage to four homes. They have done far greater damage to our community."

Jackson, MISSISSIPPI
Greenwood Commonwealth 11/20/65. Dateline: Jackson (AP).

A white Unitarian minister who was active in civil rights work fled Mississippi due to renewed threats on his life. On August 22, 1965, he was hit in the back and side by a shotgun blast in what police called a "civil rights assassination attempt." A friend said the minister left because of threats against him and others in the downtown apartment building where he lives. He was asked to leave the building after other occupants were threatened.

Morton, MISSISSIPPI
Arkansas Gazette 11/3/65. Dateline: Jackson (UPI).

A Negro civil rights worker sued the mayor and town marshal of Morton, charging he was beaten and falsely imprisoned.

The CORE staff worker filed suit in federal district court, charging that the marshal blocked a march and beat him with "a large club or ax handle," while another white man covered the rest of the marchers with a shotgun. He said he was arrested and taken to city jail and again beaten before being placed in a cell. He said he then went before the mayor and was required to post $275 bond on charge of parading without a permit, disturbing the peace and resisting arrest.

The regional director of the American Civil Liberties Union charged that eleven Negro sharecroppers were being forced from their homes in Wilcox County for trying to register to vote.

The ACLU spokesman said some of the complaints seem "directly related to the intimidation section of the Voting Rights Act of 1965."

FINDINGS AND RECOMMENDATIONS BASED ON A STUDY OF ECONOMIC INTIMIDATION AND DISCRIMINATION IN WILCOX, COUNTY, ALABAMA.

Submitted to the regional director of ACLU from a man living in Wilcox County.

A Negro couple registered to vote. The grocer demanded immediate payment of money owed for groceries: "You think you're smart. I'd like to take a damn two-by-four up side your head for registering. Get out of my store."

One of the families which was forced to move because of participation in demonstrations has no money, no food, and no credit. Their water was turned off by the city just after they took part in a protest march.

In many cases land was taken away and the rent raised from nothing to $25 per month. Most of the families involved make less than $1,000 a year.

A man whose mother was born in slavery on the land he was forced to leave is eighty-two years old. According to the study, "He did not want to move. No water or lights where he now lives. Will grow some corn."

One man and his wife, having no income other than $33 per month from Social Security, were told by their landlord that if they registered they would have to move. They registered and he carried out his threat.

A Negro woman voted in a state election. Her employer hit her with a broom and told her to "get out."

The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee set up tents to house Negro families evicted after registering to vote.

The Lowndes County sheriff said that "it was quite possible that some families were diplaced," but he blamed automation and a changing economy for displacement.

The SNCC office in Atlanta had charged that 20 families had been told to move because of voting rights activities.

Southern Courier 1/8-9/66. Dateline: Freedom City, Lowndes County.

The sheriff said that "probably the families had to go because they weren't needed as the plantation changed over to cattle raising and mechanical cotton pickers . . ." One evicted sharecropper said of the plantation owner, "He's had a mechanical picker since '55, and he has lots of people who ain't registered working."

To younger people, with "lots of children, Freedom City can't be the last stop. They will have to find land of their own to build houses and to work."

Application has been made to the Office of Economic Opportunity for $1,500 for each farmer to start a house.

"Not only would this program provide houses for people living in Freedom City tents, but it would also provide them with the work of building them.

"So although Freedom City residents know they can't live in tents forever, they still feel they are a community with a future in Lowndes County . . . .

"To one family, which doesn't want to leave the land they've farmed for generations, there is only one alternative to Freedom City:

" 'We've got to take some of the white man's land and build houses on it . . . . That's what you need to do—he got it all.' "

Greenville, MISSISSIPPI

Delta Ministry Reports, February, 1966.

Median income for plantation Negroes in the Delta is $456. Because of mechanization and a one-third crop allotment reduction, the state employment service estimates that 4,706 of the 18,124 seasonal workers living with their families on plantations in the Delta will not be needed to work next year.

Of those already off the land and out of work, living in tent cities and abandoned shacks along the Delta, about 50 entered the unoccupied Air Force base at Greenville January 31. Some thirty hours later they were forced to move out by air police.

Following what for many of them was just another eviction, three spokesmen of the group held a press conference in the Delta Ministry office in Greenville. Out of this conference came specific grievances, resentments, frustrations, and anger, and a real sense of alienation from American society.

"I feel that the federal government have proven that it don't care about poor people. Everything that we have asked for through these years has been handed down on paper. It's never been a reality.

"We the poor people of Mississippi is tired. We're tired of it so we're going to build for ourselves, because we don't have a government that represents us."

". . . See, you can only accept poor peoples by being poor and really know what being poor is like. And all this stuff about poverty programs and federal funds, that's out for poor peoples.

"We were looked upon as just a civil rights demonstration. But really we were there demanding and waiting and asking that these things be brought there to fill some desperate needs. And we was asking that the poor peoples be accepted as they stood. And instead of getting what we was asking we got the whole air force troopers in on us. To me, that's our government."

". . . The building was more respectable than poor hungry peoples with nothing and nowhere to go. If the peoples was satisfied and willing to sit there to find ways to do for themselves, the government should have let them stay there. The building was more important than poor folks . . . .

"The only reason . . . for eviction was that the building that we was in didn't have running water and didn't have any type of fire protection. And see I know that the federal government can't tell me that was the reason we was put out, because all over Mississippi houses don't have running water or fire protection."

A spokesman for the Delta Ministry recounted over a year's frustrating effort to get commodities distributed to poor people in the state. Each time a group within the county offered to distribute commodities the Department of Agriculture referred the plan to the Mississippi Welfare Department, which substituted an alternate program. In one instance immediately after the state department set up a commodity program the Department of Agriculture found it necessary to send an agent to investigate charges of discrimination. In another county the Food Stamp program was initiated. The Food Stamp program costs individuals money, so the very poor were not helped by it. Under a state-wide plan the welfare department is to get 24 million dollars worth of commodities from Agriculture and 1.6 million dollars from OEO to distribute food to 500,000 for six months. The food was due to be ready for distribution January 23. "When that day came we could not find (any) food being given out. And now it's February."

"I'd like to add to that to live, we got to go out and chop cotton for $3 a day, maybe two or three days a week. At the end of cotton picking, we gets the same for picking the scrap the machines leave. Then . . . when they start qualifying you for commodities, they say you got to find our how many people you worked for and get them to sign for you as being poor. If they don't feel like signing, like maybe they don't like you for civil rights activities, you don't get commodities. But you still poor, whether the white boss says so or not."

". . . See, if you belong to any civil rights group or participate, they tell you you can't get a job with the poverty program, because that's political and you know, you can't have that. And that's what's happening with the poverty program: It's political — that's the reason it's not doing anything for the poor."

". . . You know, we ain't dumb, even if we are poor. We need jobs. We need food. We need houses. But even with the poverty program we ain't got nothin but needs. That's why we was pulled off that building that wasn't being used for anything. We is ignored . . . The thing about property upset them, but the thing about poor people don't. So there's no way out but to begin your own beginning, whatever way you can. So far as I'm concerned, that's all I got to say about the past. We're beginning a new future:

". . . Because of the fact that we was refused by the government and evicted, it's important that we start planning our own government."

Delta Democrat-Times 2/10/66.

"The Washington County Board of Supervisors plans to meet at 10 a.m. Friday to reconsider its decision Monday to reject county participation in an expanded food program.

The president of the board confirmed that "the supervisors will meet in the courthouse Friday and give further consideration to participation in a $24 million program announced by the State Welfare Dept.

"The reason given Monday for the board's rejection was that county farmers and merchants don't want it.

"The program would probably benefit primarily Negroes and landowners are said to feel they would have more difficulty in getting spring labor if commodities were not cut off in March."

"The offense is currently classed a misdemeanor and carries a light fine and lighter jail sentence. The existing statute is so loosely written that it has occasionally led law officers in rural areas to laugh off volleys of gunshots fired into homes if no injury is reported.

"Officers have been prone to assume the negativistic attitude that since the offense is a misdemeanor, why bother to conduct a full-fledged investigation? A conviction, they have reasoned, would hardly be worth the time, effort and expense consumed by a thorough probing.

"This unfortunate fact, coupled with a barrage of civil rights activity in the state, has triggered the imagination of certain groups of people. The result has been a number of incidents in which nightriders fire upon the homes of persons they do not see eye to eye with."

The figures presented herein were accumulated during the summer and late summer of 1966. While they do not represent the final registration figures for the November elections, the difference is not expected to be large. The figures were compiled from a variety of sources---public and private, official and unofficial.

For four states---Arkansas, Tennessee, Texas and Virginia---complete or near-complete county-by-county figures showing white and Negro registration were not available. For these four states, statewide estimates have been made, based on the best information obtainable.

For two states---Florida and Mississippi---figures did not indicate the race of a sizeable number of registrants. These have been divided between the white and Negro columns on the basis of VEP estimates.

Know Your RIGHTS

©1966 A.C.L.U. of Georgia

AS AN AMERICAN, YOU HAVE RIGHTS

This book tells you what they are.

It shows you what you can do, and what you cannot do if you are questioned or arrested.

POLICEMEN HAVE RIGHTS, TOO

A policeman's job is to protect you from crime.

When he is doing this, he has the right to your help.

The pictures on the next pages show what rights you have, and what rights policemen have.

You may want to share this book with your neighbors and friends.

"Say, did you see what happened?"

"Do you know Joe Jones?"

If a policeman asks you a question like this - about something that does not have to do with you personally - it is your job to help him.

But suppose he asks you: "What are you doing around here?" or other questions about you personally.

If you want to, you can tell him what you are doing there, but all you need to tell him is your name and your address.

If it sounds like the policeman thinks you did something against the law, ask him: "Am I under arrest?" If he says yes, ask him: "What for?"

If you are under arrest, you do not have to answer any more questions. Whatever you tell the policeman could be held against you.

WATCH WHAT YOU SAY!

If he says "No, you are not under arrest," you may ask "May I go?"

If he says NO to that, you ARE under arrest, and do not have to answer any more questions.

Try to remember the badge number of the policeman and what he looks like. Also remember what he says and what you say. The same goes for any other people who are there.

Later, this could help your lawyer to help you.

If you were in trouble before, running away won't help you.

Even if you feel you are being wrongly arrested, DO NOT RUN AWAY.

Fighting with a policeman is a serious crime.

It will only make things worse. Go with him quietly.

A policeman does not have the right to search you unless you are being arrested or he has a search warrant.

But even if he searches you when you do not think he has the right, do not try to stop him.

You may tell him: "I do not give you permission to search me."

If you are driving a car, a policeman has the right to see your driver's license and car registration. Show them to him if he stops your car.

Get out of the car right away. Do not give him the idea you are about to run away, run him down, or harm him.

If a policeman asks to come into your home, you do not have to let him in. The law says: "Your home is your castle."

If the policeman has a search warrant, ask for a copy of it. Make sure the warrant talks about your home.

If he insists on coming in without a warrant, do not try to stop him. You may say: "I do not give permission for you to search my home."

The same thing goes for searching your car.

If the police take anything of yours - from your house or your car or from you - you may ask for a written receipt if they do not offer you one.

This receipt must be given to you by the policeman taking the property.

If the policeman has a warrant for your home, the landlady must let him in.

But without a warrant, your landlady has no right to say it is okay to search your home without your permission.

If you don't already know, ask the policeman who arrested you what the charge is.

Other policemen may ask you more questions. All you need to tell them is your name and your address. You may say: "I want a lawyer."

Do not answer questions until the lawyer comes.

If you can afford it, it is best to have your own lawyer.

But, if you don't have the money, you have the right to a free lawyer when you are charged with a crime that might send you to jail.

Even though this free lawyer may not see you until just before court, this is better than being your own lawyer.

If you ask for a free lawyer right away, the police cannot ask you any more questions until your lawyer is there.

The police may only let you make one completed telephone call. If you do not have the right change, or you do not know the lawyer's number, ask the police to make change for you and to give you a telephone book.

If they do not want to, ask and keep asking until they do.

If you do not know the number of a lawyer, or are afraid you won't find him in, it might be better to call a friend or a member of your family, who could then telephone a lawyer for you.

You need not answer questions or sign anything until the lawyer is there.

If you are arrested for drunk driving, you may ask for a blood test.

If you have not been drinking, the test will be in your favor. But if you have, it can be used against you.

You may ask for this test or you may refuse it. It cannot be given without your permission.

U.S. Law says that you should be taken before a judge right away to find out what the charges against you are, and whether there is enough evidence to hold you.

At this hearing - a commitment hearing - the judge will also tell you what your bail is. Ask to have a lawyer for this hearing.

If the police hold you in jail and do not take you before the judge without delay, you may remind them of your right to a prompt hearing.

Just as important as not saying anything is your right not to sign any statement. If you do not understand legal talk, you may not know what you are signing.

You may say that you will not sign anything until you talk with your lawyer.

You have a right to meet privately with your lawyer. What you tell him is just between you and him. It cannot be used against you.

So remember, whatever you want to tell - tell your lawyer and no one else.

You also have a right to have your lawyer with you during questioning.

The lawyer will take your side and try to help you.

Your lawyer is like a doctor or a dentist. You don't take out your own appendix or fix your own teeth.

Don't try to be your own lawyer, either.

If you are not treated right by a policeman -- if he calls you "nigger" or "nigger-lover" or "boy", or calls you by your first name instead of Mr. or Mrs., or curses you or abuses you, you should complain about him.

In Atlanta, there is a Police Committee meeting every Monday night, and you can take your complaint there.

In other cities, you may complain to the Mayor, or the City Council and to the Police Chief.

Your complaint will not help or hurt your own case. But maybe it will help the Police Department find out about those few policemen who cannot learn to be fair and polite.

If you have a real complaint, it is being a good citizen to let the right people know about it.

What you have just read may sound like a lot of rules to remember.

But the important things can be said over again in three sentences:

- You have the right not to answer questions.
- You have the right not to sign anything.
- You have the right to have a lawyer if you are arrested.

These rights, and others, belong to every American. They come to us from the United States Constitution.

They apply to everyone, regardless of race, color, religion or age.

MINIMUM WAGE LAW

With Explanation

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT WITH 1966 AMENDMENTS

SIGNED INTO LAW BY THE PRESIDENT
SEPTEMBER 23, 1966

PUBLIC LAW 89-601

Foreword

The Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1966 make a series of minimum wage law changes which begins on February 1, 1967, and does not end until February 1, 1971. The Amendments not only raise the minimum wage to a new high but also broadly increase the number of workers who are entitled to its benefits.

A total of 8 million workers are added to the previously covered 29.6 million to make a grand total of 37.6 million directly affected by the FLSA. The Amendments extend the FLSA to employees in four major areas which were never reached before—(1) schools, hospitals and nursing institutions; (2) laundries and drycleaners; (3) hotels, motels and restaurants; and (4) agriculture. Schools and hospitals were not viewed as commercial businesses; they are now specifically labeled as such, whether public or private. FLSA benefits are also extended to a great many more employees in retail trade and in the construction industry, to federal service contract employees and to certain federal employees.

The complicated Amendments bring many workers under the FLSA by reducing the dollar volume a business enterprise must have before it is covered; in some cases, there is no dollar volume requirement at all. The Amendments add other workers by eliminating exemptions of employers or workers.

The objective of this publication is to explain the practical effects of the changes made by the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1966. The Fair Labor Standards Act, with the 1966 amendments appearing in italics, is reproduced at ¶ 500. Historical notes show when a provision is new or has been amended.

An explanation of the new minimum wage rates begins at ¶ 110. Overtime pay is discussed starting at ¶ 210. Detailed explanations of the FLSA changes, presented on the basis of employer and worker groups, start at ¶ 310. An introductory discussion to acquaint newly covered employers with the FLSA starts at ¶ 440.

If more detailed coverage of the federal government's regulation of minimum wages and overtime pay is required, reference should be made to the FEDERAL WAGES-HOURS UNIT of the publishers' LABOR LAW REPORTS.

Employees who have been covered by the minimum wage provisions of the FLSA prior to the 1966 Amendments are entitled to higher hourly minimum wages as follows:

$1.40 an hour for one year beginning February 1, 1967, and
$1.60 an hour beginning February 1, 1968.

Prior to these increases, the minimum rate for presently covered employees was $1.25 an hour.

The amendments establish two minimum wage schedules, one for presently covered employees and one for employees covered by the FLSA for the first time because of the amendments. The rates for newly covered employees start at a lower figure than those for presently covered employees, and the rates are escalated over a longer period of time in reaching the maximum fixed for presently covered employees (see ¶ 120).

Rates below the general standards fixed for presently and newly covered employees are permissible under the amendments for students and handicapped workers (see ¶ 395).

Law: Sec. 6(a)(1).

¶ 120

For employees (other than agricultural workers, certain federal employees and certain employees under federal contracts) who are brought under the FLSA's minimum wage provisions for the first time, a schedule of minimum wage rates is established as follows:

$1.00 an hour beginning February 1, 1967;
$1.15 an hour beginning February 1, 1968;
$1.30 an hour beginning February 1, 1969;
$1.45 an hour beginning February 1, 1970; and
$1.60 an hour beginning February 1, 1971.

Special minimum rates are specified for agricultural workers (see ¶ 130), federal employees (see ¶ 150) and certain employees under federal contracts (see ¶ 140).

Employees who are newly covered under the FLSA minimum wage requirements also acquire companion rights to equal pay for equal work regardless of sex. This is true whether they are brought within coverage because of employment by an enterprise or because of cancellation of an exemption formerly applicable to them.

Lower Dollar Enterprise Tests

It is possible for some newly covered employees who receive the lower rate to later become entitled to the higher rate for presently covered employees. On the other hand, presently covered employees entitled to the higher rate could shift to the lower rate for newly covered workers. The shifts could occur until February 1, 1971, when the minimum wage rates for presently covered employees and those for newly covered employees will become the same.

These shifts could occur with changes in an employer's annual dollar volume of sales. The amendments changed the dollar volume test for enterprise coverage by reducing from $1 million to $500,000 the annual gross sales needed for coverage. The lower wage rate for newly covered employees would apply under the $500,000 enterprise test whenever gross sales are less than $1 million, thus basing coverage solely upon the lower test established by the 1966 amendments. However, an employee would have to be regarded as a presently covered worker entitled to the higher minimum wage and overtime pay standards whenever his employer would meet the former $1 million test for enterprise coverage.

Law: Sec. 6(b).

¶ 130

For the first time agricultural workers employed on farms are covered by the FLSA's minimum wage requirement. A special minimum wage rate schedule is established for agricultural employees as follows:

$1.00 an hour beginning February 1, 1967;

$1.15 an hour beginning February 1, 1968; and

$1.30 an hour beginning February 1, 1969.

Children under 16 working with their parents at piece-rate jobs on farms must be paid the same piece rates paid to employees over that age.

There are conditions under which agricultural employees are exempt from these minimum wage requirements. Employees who are not exempt are entitled not only to the minimum wage benefits but also to equal pay for equal work regardless of sex. All agricultural employees remain exempt from the FLSA's overtime pay provisions.

A detailed explanation of the new rules which apply to agricultural employees appears at ¶ 345.

Law: Secs. 6(a)(5), 13(a)(6).

An employer who provides services to the federal government under a contract or subcontract subject to the Service Contract Act of 1965 must pay his employees at least the minimum wage rates applicable to newly covered employees (see ¶ 120). These rates apply unless the employees are already entitled to the higher rates prescribed for presently covered employees (see ¶ 110) or unless higher rates are specified in determinations under the Service Contract Act of 1965. Special rules apply to linen supply contracts, as explained at ¶ 340.

Law: Sec. 6(e).

The following federal employees are now entitled to the minimum wage benefits (see ¶ 110) and overtime pay benefits (see ¶ 210) accorded presently covered employees under the 1966 Amendments:

(1) certain federal wage board employees whose compensation is required to be fixed and adjusted in accordance with prevailing wage rates,

(2) employees of naval facilities whose wages are established to conform with those of private establishments in the immediate vicinity, and

(3) federal employees in nonappropriated fund instrumentalities under the jurisdiction of the Armed Forces, such as, for example, post exchanges.

On the other hand, federal employees performing services during a workweek in a work place within the Canal Zone are entitled to the lower rates applicable to newly covered employees (see ¶ 120).

All of these federal employees must receive equal pay for equal work regardless of sex.

Law: Sec. 18(b).

Employees in Puerto Rico and Virgin Islands

¶ 160

The special minimum wage rates presently applicable to workers in Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands under wage orders established through industry committees are increased under the 1966 Amendments by a percentage which is the equivalent of the percentage of increase on the mainland. For persons presently covered by an industry wage order, the wage rates are increased 12 percent effective 60 days after February 1, 1967, or 1 year from the effective date of the most recent wage order, whichever is later. Then 1 year later, a second increase is made of 16 percent of the rates applicable under the most recent wage order issued prior to February 1, 1967. These increases are reviewable by industry committees.

The Secretary of Labor will appoint a special industry committee to recommend a minimum wage rate for employees who are brought within the FLSA by the 1966 Amendments. The committee's recommendations are not to take effect before 60 days after February 1, 1967.

Law: Sec. 6(c).

Tips

Special rules apply to an employee who is engaged in an occupation in which he customarily and regularly receives more than $20 a month in tips. As to such an employee, an employer may credit up to 50 percent of the employee's minimum wage as coming from tips actually received by the employee.

For example, if the minimum wage of a tipped employee is $1.00 an hour, his employer can credit as much as $0.50 as being from tips. The employer would pay the remainder or $0.50 an hour to the tipped employee. The tips and payment from the employer, when combined, would at least equal the statutory minimum wage. However, the employee must actually have received not less than 50 percent of his minimum wage in tips.

If an employee is receiving less in tips than the amount credited by the employer, the employer is required to pay the balance so that the employee receives at least the minimum wage.

In the 1961 amendments to the FLSA, the Secretary of Labor had been directed to make a study of problems involving tips in relation to wages. The results of the study contributed toward the new rules applicable to tipped employees and helped bring about the extension of minimum wage coverage to employees of hotels, motels, restaurants and other businesses that employ tipped personnel.

Law: Secs. 3(m), 3(t).

OVERTIME PAY FEATURES

Presently covered employees . . . ¶ 210

Newly covered employees . . . ¶ 220

Commission salesmen . . . ¶ 230

There is no change in the general overtime pay standard for presently covered employees. The premium rate of time and one half the regular rate is continued for hours worked in excess of 40 in any workweek. The federal employees discussed at ¶ 150 are entitled to overtime pay based on this standard.

An employee's regular rate is determined by dividing his total remuneration for employment (except exclusions permitted by the FLSA) in any workweek by the total number of hours actually worked by him in that workweek for which such compensation was paid.

An exception to the general rule that overtime pay is figured on the basis of the regular rate exists with respect to employees of certain petroleum distributors. Certain overtime hours worked by such employees may be compensated at one and one half times their minimum rates; other overtime hours command pay at one and one half times their regular rates (see ¶ 390).

Law: Sec. 7(a)(1).

¶ 220

Overtime pay standards are established for newly covered employees in three steps. Generally, overtime pay at the rate of time and one half the regular rate is required for workweek hours over:

44 hours a week beginning February 1, 1967;

42 hours a week beginning February 1, 1968; and

40 hours a week beginning February 1, 1969.

As is the case with presently covered employees, an exception from the regular rate basis for calculating overtime pay is created by the 1966 Amendments for employees of qualified petroleum distributors. Part of the employees' overtime pay may be computed on the basis of their FLSA minimum rates; other overtime hours must be paid for on the basis of their regular rates (see ¶ 390).

The Amendments also contain special overtime pay provisions for hospital employees. A hospital and an employee may agree that the employee's overtime pay will be calculated on the basis of a 14-day work period rather than the customary 7-day period. Overtime must be paid for hours worked in excess of 8 daily and in excess of 80 during the 14-day period.

Enterprise Coverage

Because of the reduction in the annual dollar volume test for coverage of enterprises from not less than $1 million to not less than $500,000 and the elimination of monetary tests for certain types of businesses (see ¶ 310), there is a possibility that an employee subject to the lower overtime pay standards for newly covered employees might shift to the higher standards for presently covered employees. It would also be possible for an employee to shift from the higher to the lower standards. These shifts could occur until February 1, 1969, when the two overtime pay schedules for newly covered employees and for presently covered employees will become the same.

The lower overtime pay and minimum wage requirements would apply any time when enterprise coverage is occasioned by the $500,000 test established by the 1966 amendments as distinguished from the $1 million test prior to the amendments. However, an employee would be regarded as a presently covered worker entitled to the higher overtime pay and minimum wage requirements whenever his employer meets the former $1 million test for enterprise coverage.

Changes in Exemptions

The 1966 amendments make many changes in exemptions. For example, they establish new overtime pay exemptions for seasonal industries (see ¶ 350). These exemptions replace former exemptions including, among other things, those for the area of production, seasonal activities, first processing and the handling of livestock and poultry. If a former 14-week overtime pay exemption, for example, is cancelled by these new seasonal exemptions, the employees affected would be governed by the overtime pay standards for newly covered workers during a 14-week period. However, these same employees would be governed by the overtime pay standards for presently covered employees during the remaining 38 weeks of the year when their former exemption did not apply, since the 1966 amendments make no change in their status with respect to this period.

Whenever an employee becomes entitled to FLSA overtime pay by reason of the cancellation of an overtime pay exemption, the overtime pay requirements established for newly covered workers apply.

Law: Secs. 7(a)(2), 7(j).

¶ 230

A clarifying change has been made in the FLSA provisions which permit commissions paid to employees of retail or service establishments to qualify as overtime pay. The exemption applies to a salesman if two conditions are met:

(1) The salesman's regular rate of pay must be in excess of one and one half times the statutory minimum rate applicable to him.

(2) More than half of the salesman's compensation for a representative period (not less than one month) must represent commissions on goods or services.

The shortest period of time that can be used as the representative period under the second condition is one month. Aside from this specification, the facts in the particular case would govern the length of the period.

The 1966 Amendments provide that in determining the proportion of compensation representing commissions, all earnings resulting from the application of a bona fide commission rate shall be deemed commissions on goods or services without regard to whether the computed commissions exceed the draw or guarantee.

Prior to this amendment, the government, in enforcing this leeway, took the position that compensation could be considered commissions for purposes of overtime pay only when commissions exceeded draws. In the event of an advance that exceeded a draw, the advance had to be substituted for the draw in making the determination.

Dollar-Test Enterprises

A business not specifically named in the FLSA enterprise coverage provisions is subject to the statute on an enterprise basis if:

(1) two of its employees are personally engaged in interstate commerce, produce goods for commerce, or handle goods which have already been produced by someone else for commerce; and

(2) yearly gross sales, exclusive of certain excise taxes, amount to $500,000 beginning February 1, 1967 ($250,000 beginning February 1, 1969).

Prior to the FLS Amendments, the dollar test was $1 million; the commerce test concerning employee activities remains unchanged.

Retailers and local transit operators are now tested for enterprise coverage under these provisions. Former specific enterprise tests for them are deleted by the amendments. The dollar test for both of them previously was $1 million, and, in addition, retailers had to purchase $250,000 worth of interstate goods yearly.

The only other dollar test for enterprises concerns gasoline service establishments. It has not been changed; it is discussed at ¶ 385.

Other Enterprises

There are other enterprise coverage provisions that have no dollar condition, only the two-employee commerce condition. They pertain to the construction industry (see ¶ 335); laundries and drycleaners (see ¶ 340); and schools, hospitals and nursing institutions (see ¶ 330).

Industries Affected for First Time

Any business or endeavor not coming within these specifically named categories is tested for enterprise coverage under the $500,000 standard (which later becomes $250,000). Industries that will be subject to this enterprise testing for the first time because they have lost former full wage exemptions include hotels, motels and restaurants (see ¶ 320); food service (see ¶ 380); automobile, aircraft and farm implement dealers (see ¶ 375); and agriculture (see ¶ 345). Enterprises in these industries now have an exemption only from overtime pay, not from minimum wages and equal pay for equal work regardless of sex (except, possibly, agriculture). Prior to the amendments, they were fully exempt.

Enterprise coverage extends the benefits of the FLSA to all of the employer's workers (unless otherwise exempt), regardless of whether they are individually performing interstate work; otherwise, coverage extends only to employees personally doing such work.

Wage Scales

Employees who get the benefits of the statute for the first time because they are employed by an enterprise subject to coverage under the amendments are entitled to the wages specified for newly covered employees (for minimum wages, see ¶ 120; for overtime pay, see ¶ 220). Even though an employee is individually engaged in interstate activities, these rates apply if he is brought within the terms of the statute because of the cancellation of an exemption.

Enterprise employees who would have been covered under the enterprise provisions as they existed prior to the amendments have the advantage of the rates specified for presently covered employees; the minimum rates appear at ¶ 110 and the overtime standard is discussed at ¶ 210. These rates also apply to employees who were individually covered prior to the amendments and who remain individually covered thereafter.

Law: Secs. 3(r), 3(s).

Retail or Service Establishments

All employees of a retail or service establishment, including those employees who are engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce, are exempt from the FLSA if the establishment meets the requirements of the retail and service establishment exemption. In order to qualify as an exempt retail or service establishment, it is necessary:

(1) that 75 percent of the establishment's dollar volume of sales of goods or services, or of both, be not for resale and be recognized as retail sales or services in the particular industry,

(2) that the establishment make more than 50 percent of its sales of goods or services within the state in which it is located, and

(3)(a) if the particular establishment is part of a covered enterprise, that the establishment's annual sales volume be less than $250,000, or

(3)(b) if the particular establishment is not part of a covered enterprise, that the establishment's annual sales volume be less than $500,000.

The FLSA limits the size of an establishment that may be exempt. When a retail or service establishment is a segment of a covered enterprise, the establishment cannot claim the benefit of the exemption unless the volume of its business is below $250,000 a year. An establishment which is not part of a covered enterprise may be exempt until January 31, 1969, even if its annual business reaches or exceeds $250,000—just so long as it does not meet the $500,000 test for enterprise coverage which is effective until that time. On February 1, 1969, when the enterprise coverage test will be reduced from $500,000 to $250,000, the retail and service establishment exemption will no longer be available to any establishment having an annual sales volume between $250,000 and $500,000.

Businesses Excluded or Included

Expressly excluded from the scope of this exemption are establishments and employees engaged in laundering and dry cleaning. The same is true with regard to hospitals, old-age homes, nursing homes, mental institutions, schools for physically handicapped, mentally handicapped or gifted children, elementary and secondary schools (exclusive of teachers and academic administrative personnel), and institutions of higher education. Regardless of any business volume, each of these endeavors (including those that are public or nonprofit) is a covered enterprise if at least two employees are engaged in activities touching on commerce.

The establishments that come within the scope of the retail and service establishment exemption include restaurants, retail food service establishments, retail automobile dealers, and hotels and motels, even though the FLSA contains specific overtime pay exemptions for these types of establishments. An establishment cannot claim the retail or service establishment exemption unless it meets all the exemption requirements (a wholesale automobile dealer does not qualify for this exemption).

The fact that restaurants and other establishments may qualify for the general exemption for retail or service establishments is of considerable importance because, in addition to the overtime pay exemption provided for their industries, the minimum wage and equal pay provisions of the Act are inapplicable to establishments within the scope of the general exemption.

Similarly, an amusement or recreational establishment may be able to avail itself of the retail and service establishment exemption when it would otherwise be nonexempt for failure to meet the requirements of the amusement or recreational establishment exemption noted at ¶ 325.

Law: Secs. 3(s)(1), 13(a)(2).

An unconditional exemption from the overtime pay provisions of the FLSA is provided for the employees of an establishment which is a hotel, motel or restaurant. For purposes of this overtime pay exemption, it makes no difference whether or not such establishment is a covered enterprise or part of such an enterprise.

The overtime pay exemption does not affect the application of the minimum wage and equal pay provisions to employees who are within FLSA coverage either because they are themselves engaged in interstate work or because the establishment which employs them is a covered enterprise. However, the overtime pay exemption is not the only exemption available for such an establishment.

If a hotel, motel or restaurant meets the requirements of the retail or service establishment exemption, the minimum wage and equal pay provisions of the FLSA are also inapplicable to the employees of the establishment. Unlike the overtime pay exemption, which is applicable to establishments of any size, the retail or service establishment exemption does not apply to an establishment whose annual dollar volume of business exceeds certain limits (see ¶ 315).

Enterprise Coverage

Heretofore, the employees of hotels, motels and restaurants had no FLSA benefits since they were expressly excluded from enterprise coverage and the few employees doing interstate work were exempt. As amended, the FLSA merely denies them the right to overtime pay but gives nonexempt employees minimum wage and equal pay protection by eliminating the former exclusion from enterprise coverage. Employees who are now covered must be paid the minimum wage rates applicable to newly covered employees (see ¶ 120).

Tipped Employees

Special rules can be applied to a "tipped employee," that is, an employee engaged in an occupation in which he customarily and regularly receives more than $20 a month in tips. In paying the wages of a tipped employee, the employer may credit up to 50 percent of the applicable minimum wage as coming from tips, but he may do so only if the employee actually received the amount credited. The maximum tip allowance for a newly covered employee is 50 cents per hour while the $1.00 minimum wage rate remains in effect (see ¶ 170).

Other Exemption

A special overtime pay exemption is provided for the food service employees of retail or service establishments (see ¶ 380).

Law: Sec. 13(b)(8).

Amusement or Recreational Establishments

Certain amusement or recreational establishments are fully exempt from the minimum wage, equal pay and overtime pay requirements of the FLSA, irrespective of whether or not they are covered enterprises or parts of such enterprises. In order to qualify for this full exemption, an amusement or recreational establishment must meet one of two exemption tests which require that its business be of a seasonal nature.

An amusement or recreational establishment is fully exempt (1) if it does not operate for more than seven months in a calendar year, or (2) if it has average receipts for any six months of the preceding calendar year which do not exceed one third of the average receipts for the other six months of that calendar year. An amusement or recreational establishment which fails to meet either one of these two tests may possibly come within the retail or service establishment exemption (see ¶ 315).

Wage Rates

An amusement or recreational establishment which does not qualify for exemption may or may not be part of a covered enterprise. In either case, employees who are themselves engaged in interstate work and who were not exempt prior to the 1966 amendments must be paid the minimum wage rates for presently covered employees (see ¶ 110). On the other hand, the minimum wage rates for newly covered employees (see ¶ 120) are applicable to employees newly entitled to FLSA benefits because of new coverage of the enterprise. The employees of a nonexempt amusement or recreational establishment are within coverage of the equal pay provisions of the FLSA, unless they come within the scope of some other minimum wage exemption. The overtime pay requirements for presently covered employees are discussed at ¶ 210, those for newly covered employees at ¶ 220.

Law: Sec. 13(a)(3).

Employees of a bowling establishment are partially exempt from the overtime pay requirements of the FLSA. They need not be paid overtime compensation so long as they do not work more than 48 hours a week. Hours worked in excess of 48 a week must be compensated at time and one half the regular rate unless another exemption applies. The partial overtime pay exemption extends to a bowling establishment which is a covered enterprise or part of such enterprise. The duty to comply with the minimum wage and equal pay provisions of the FLSA remains unaffected.

If a bowling establishment meets the requirements of the retail or service establishment exemption, it is fully exempt from the minimum wage, overtime pay, and equal pay provisions. In case of enterprise coverage, only an establishment doing an annual business of less than $250,000 can invoke the retail or service establishment exemption (see ¶ 315).

Wage Rates

The minimum wage rates that are applicable to employees of bowling establishments not qualifying for the retail or service establishment exemption depend upon whether coverage results from the 1966 Amendments. Employees who are themselves engaged in interstate work and who were not exempt prior to the 1966 Amendments must be paid the minimum wage rates for presently covered employees (see ¶ 110). The minimum wage rates for newly covered employees (see ¶ 120) apply to employees now entitled to FLSA protection because of new coverage of the enterprise.

Law: Sec. 13(b)(19).

Schools, Hospitals and Nursing Institutions

Employees of schools, hospitals, and nursing institutions are brought under the FLSA for the first time. These employees are entitled to the minimum wages prescribed for newly covered employees (see ¶ 120) and, if not exempt, to the overtime pay benefits accorded newly covered employees (see ¶ 220). They are also entitled to equal pay for equal work regardless of sex. The extended coverage does not apply to employees of federal hospitals.

The minimum wage, overtime pay and equal pay provisions have been extended, on an enterprise basis, to employees of elementary and secondary schools, excluding teachers and academic administrative personnel; institutions of higher education; hospitals and nursing institutions; and schools for physically handicapped, mentally handicapped or gifted children. It makes no difference whether the schools, hospitals or institutions are public or private or operated for profit or operated not for profit. The dollar amount of the business is immaterial. The FLSA commerce requirements are satisfied by the employment of two workers who merely handle goods that have moved in or have been produced for interstate commerce.

Pertinent Exemptions

The amendments offer a partial exemption from the FLSA overtime pay requirements to institutions, other than hospitals, engaged in caring for the sick, the aged, the mentally ill, or defective who reside on the premises. The exemption is limited to 48 hours per week. A deviation from the overtime pay provisions permits hospitals to use a 14-day period in calculating overtime pay (see ¶ 220).

An exemption existing prior to the amendments which is of particular interest to newly covered schools, hospitals and nursing institutions completely exempts administrative, executive and professional employees from the wage provisions. On the other hand, the previously existing retail or service establishment exemption is made specifically unavailable to schools, hospitals and nursing institutions brought within coverage of the statute.

Law: Secs. 3(d), 3(r), 3(s)(4), 3(v), 3(w), 7(j), 13(a)(1), 13(a)(2), 13(b)(8).

An enterprise engaged in the business of construction (or reconstruction) which satisfies the commerce requirements is subject to the FLSA regardless of the dollar volume of business done. Prior to the FLS Amendments, a construction business had to have a yearly gross of $350,000 before it was covered.

Employees whose duties personally involve commerce or the production of goods for commerce are entitled to the minimum wages applicable to presently covered employees, as listed at ¶ 110; and to overtime pay on the basis available for presently covered employees, as discussed at ¶ 210. This is true whether or not the business is brought within enterprise coverage by reason of the 1966 amendments.

The pay rates applicable to employees whose own duties do not involve commerce or the production of goods for commerce depend upon whether the business is a covered enterprise solely because of elimination of the dollar test. If it is covered for that reason alone, the minimum wage rates for newly covered employees at ¶ 120 and the overtime standards for newly covered employees at ¶ 220 apply. If the enterprise grosses $350,000 yearly, the rates shown at ¶ 110 and 210 for presently covered employees apply. All of the employees who are entitled to the FLSA minimum wage benefits also have the right to equal pay for equal work regardless of sex.

White Collar Exemption

It is possible that some of the employees may come within exemptions extending to minimum, overtime and equal pay, such as the exemption for administrative, executive and professional employees. There is no specific exemption for the construction industry, as such.

Law: Sec. 3(s)(3).

Laundries and drycleaners are now subject to FLSA coverage on an enterprise basis. All that is necessary for such coverage is employment of two workers in connection with commerce; the mere handling of goods produced for interstate commerce is a sufficient link. The amount of business done by a laundry or drycleaner is of no consequence. An enterprise must adhere to the federal wage standards with respect to all of its employees (who are not otherwise exempt), whether or not the employee himself is personally doing work of an interstate nature. A covered enterprise is subject to the statutory directives as to minimum wages, equal pay for equal work, and overtime compensation.

Contractors and subcontractors who provide linen supply services to the United States are specifically subject to the minimum wage and equal pay provisions (see ¶ 140).

A complete wage exemption formerly available to laundries and drycleaners was canceled by the FLS Amendments. Under that exemption, a laundry or drycleaner was completely exempt from the federal wage standards, unless 25 percent of its business was for customers engaged in mining, manufacturing, transportation or communications. If this exemption was lost because of the amount of industrial work, coverage would not have attached on an enterprise basis unless gross yearly sales amounted to $1 million. If sales did not meet that figure, only employees individually engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce had the benefits of the law. Although there is no longer a specific exemption for laundries and drycleaners, advantage can still be taken of the full wage exemptions for driver-salesmen and for administrative, executive and professional employees.

Minimum and Overtime Wage Rates

Except for government work, the minimum and overtime rates specified for newly covered employees apply to employees brought within reach of the FLSA either because of new enterprise coverage or because of cancellation of the exemption. These minimum rates are listed at ¶ 120; the overtime rates appear at ¶ 220.

Again except for government work, employees who were covered by the FLSA prior to the amendments—either on an enterprise or on an individual employee basis—are entitled to be paid at the rates fixed for presently covered employees (see ¶ 110 for minimum wage rates and ¶ 210 for overtime pay). With respect to government work, if it accounts for more than 50 percent of gross yearly sales, the minimum rates for presently covered employees apply (see ¶ 110); otherwise the rates for newly covered employees are applicable (see ¶ 120).

Law: Secs. 3(s)(2), 6(e)(2), 13(a)(1).

Agricultural employees are brought under the FLSA for the first time. While the newly covered agricultural employees are not entitled to overtime pay premiums, they are entitled to the special minimum wages shown at ¶ 130. Agricultural workers entitled to minimum wages must also receive equal pay for equal work regardless of sex.

Congress intended that employees of only large farms be covered. To be covered, an employee must work for an employer who used more than 500 man-days of agricultural labor in any calendar quarter of the preceding year. A man-day is a day in which an employee performs any agricultural work for at least one hour.

An agricultural worker is not covered if he is employed as a hand harvest laborer, is paid on a piece rate basis, commutes daily from his permanent residence to the farm, and has been employed in agriculture less than 13 weeks during the preceding calendar year.

The parent, spouse, child and other members of an agricultural employer's immediate family are not covered by the FLSA. Neither are cowboys or Basques engaged in the range production of livestock. Sharecroppers and tenant farmers whose work is closely controlled are covered by the Act. Children under 17 years old can be employed on piece-rate jobs on the same farm as their parents. Children below the age of 16 cannot be employed in hazardous occupations, except by their parents on their parents' farm.

The 1966 amendments grant minimum wage and equal pay benefits to statutorily covered employees who are in the following related operations:

irrigation projects
country elevators cotton ginning
transportation of fruits and vegetables.

These rights are granted by partial cancellation of former complete exemptions, leaving only overtime pay exemptions in effect. A complete wage exemption formerly applied to livestock auction work by farm employees. That exemption has been reduced to a mere overtime pay exemption.

Enterprise Coverage

A farming enterprise doing a yearly business of $500,000 ($250,000 beginning February 1, 1969) and employing two workers whose activities have interstate aspects is subject to the FLSA on an enterprise basis. All of its employees, who are not otherwise exempt, have minimum wage and equal pay rights. This is true whether or not the employees are personally engaged in work falling in the interstate category.

Law: Secs. 3(e), 3(u), 13(a)(6), 13(b)(12)-13(b)(16), 13(c)(2).

Newly phrased exemptions for seasonal industries are features of the FLS Amendments of 1966. One exemption pertains to seasonal industries generally; the other, to farm enterprises. Findings must be made by the Secretary of Labor that the required seasonal conditions exist before advantage can be taken of either of these exemptions. Both exemptions offer relief from the overtime pay standards during 14 weeks yearly. However, a total of only 20 weeks per year is allowed to an employer who qualifies under both. If prior official policy is continued, it will not be necessary for the exempt weeks to run consecutively.

The general exemption is available to industries found by the Secretary to be of a seasonal nature. Under it, statutory overtime need not be paid until after 10 hours daily or 50 hours weekly have been worked.

The farm exemption extends to 10 hours daily or 48 hours weekly. It is available to industries found by the Secretary:

(1) to be characterized by marked annually recurring seasonal peaks of operation at the places of first marketing or first processing of agricultural or horticultural commodities from farms; or

(2) to be of a seasonal nature and engaged in the handling, packing, storing, preparing, first processing, or canning of any perishable agricultural or horticultural commodities in their raw or natural state.

These exemptions replace former exemptions pertaining to seasonal industries, area of production, first processing, and handling of livestock and poultry. Some of the exemptions were 14-week overtime exemptions, some were year-round overtime exemptions, and one was a full exemption from minimum, overtime and equal pay.

Specific Wage Rates

Employees who are brought within the terms of the FLSA by reason of the cancellation or replacement of any of the former exemptions are entitled, for the most part, to minimum wages based on the rates applicable to newly covered employees (see ¶ 120). The rates for presently covered employees, shown at ¶ 110, will apply to employees who were entitled to minimum wages prior to the amendments. It is possible that a few newly covered employees will qualify as agricultural employees; if so, the rates appearing at ¶ 130 apply.

Any employees entitled to minimum wages are also entitled to equal pay for equal work regardless of sex.

The overtime pay standards for newly covered employees appear at ¶ 220. The standard remains the same for employees who were previously covered (see ¶ 210).

Presumably, the lower rates apply only to the additional time an employee is brought within the terms of the FLSA. For example, if an employee's 14-week yearly overtime pay exemption is canceled by the amendments, and no new exemption applies, the lower overtime pay standards can be used for computing his overtime pay during 14 weeks; the unchanged previous standard applies to the other 38 weeks that he is not exempt. It would seem logical that the 14 weeks selected for pay based on the lower standard should correspond with the 14 weeks that previously would have been chosen for the exemption.

Law: Secs. 7(c), 7(d).

Small Newspapers

An employee of a small newspaper which meets certain requirements is exempt from the minimum wage, equal pay and overtime pay provisions of the FLSA if he is employed in connection with its publication. The 1966 Amendments retain this exemption but modify it slightly.

In order to qualify for the exemption, a newspaper must be one that:

(1) is a weekly, semiweekly or daily newspaper,
(2) has a circulation of less than 4,000, and
(3) has a major part of its circulation in the county where published or counties contiguous to that county.

The 1966 Amendments relaxed the third requirement since formerly a newspaper had to be both printed and published in the county (or contiguous counties) where it had its major circulation. Hence, the place where the newspaper is printed is no longer relevant for purposes of the exemption.

Law: Sec. 13(a)(8).

Transportation Companies

¶ 360

Local transit systems and taxicab operators are affected considerably by the FLS Amendments. Both categories of employers are subject to wider coverage.

Local Transit Systems

Operators of street, suburban or interurban electric railways, or of local trolley or motorbus carriers are subject to wider FLSA coverage by reason of the 1966 amendments. Gross yearly sales of $500,000 (exclusive of excise taxes) bring them within enterprise coverage; formerly $1 million was the figure. They are covered whether they are publicly or privately owned and whether they are operated for profit or not for profit. The minimum wage and equal pay exemptions formerly available to operators who did not qualify as enterprises have been canceled. The former overtime pay exemption for all employees, regardless of the enterprise status of their employer, is restricted to an exemption for operating employees of railways or carriers subject to state or local regulation.

Covered employees of railways and carriers not meeting the enterprise conditions must be paid at least the minimum rates for newly covered employees (see ¶ 120) and the overtime rates for newly covered employees (see ¶ 220). A covered enterprise can pay the minimum rates appearing at ¶ 120 if its yearly business is less than $1 million, but it must pay the minimum rates listed at ¶ 110 for presently covered employees if the business exceeds that amount. The overtime pay standards for these enterprises are those applicable to newly covered employees, as shown at ¶ 220.

Taxicab Operators

Only the drivers employed by taxicab operators are now exempt from the FLSA, and only from the overtime pay requirements. Prior to the amendments, all of the employees of taxicab operators were fully exempt from the wage provisions. Now employees engaged in commerce or employed by a covered enterprise (see ¶ 310) are entitled to minimum wages and to equal pay for equal work regardless of sex, and those not employed in the capacity of drivers are entitled also to overtime pay. The minimum rates appearing at ¶ 120 apply; the pertinent overtime standards are discussed at ¶ 220.

With respect to the minimum wages of taxicab employees who receive tips, an employer may credit up to 50 percent of the minimum wage with tips actually received by the employee. For comment on the rules pertaining to tips, see ¶ 170.

Law: Secs. 3(d), 3(r), 13(b)(7), 13(b)(17).

Employees of a motion picture theater are exempt from the minimum wage, equal pay and overtime pay provisions of the FLSA, regardless of whether or not the theater is a covered enterprise or part of such an enterprise. This was also true under the FLSA prior to amendment, but the exemption was specific only insofar as an enterprise was concerned.

The exemption is wider now in that it extends to an "establishment" which is a motion picture theater. Formerly, the theater had to meet all of the tests of a "retail or service establishment."

Law: Sec. 13(a)(9).

There is an exemption from the minimum wage, equal pay and overtime pay provisions of the FLSA for employees engaged in small-scale forestry and logging operations. The 1966 Amendments changed a pre-existing exemption to limit it to workers of employers who have not more than 8 persons in such operations. Prior to the 1966 Amendments, 12 such workers could be employed under the exemption.

No change was made in the kinds of operations that the employees may engage in. Their activities may include the planting and tending of trees, the surveying or felling of timber, and the preparing and transporting of logs to the mill or other transportation terminal.

The limit of 8 employees is applicable on a workweek basis so that the exemption is lost for any workweek in which more than 8 persons are employed in such operations. In any workweek in which more than 8 but not more than 12 workers are employed, their employer must pay them not less than the minimum wage rate for newly covered employees (see ¶ 120) and must also treat the employees as newly covered for overtime pay purposes (see ¶ 220). In a workweek in which the number of persons doing such work exceeds 12, all employees must be treated as presently covered employees for both minimum wage purposes (see ¶ 110) and overtime pay purposes (see ¶ 210). The equal pay provisions of the FLSA are fully applicable in any workweek in which the exemption is lost.

Law: Sec. 13(a)(13).

Prior to the 1966 Amendments, the FLSA contained a minimum wage, equal pay and overtime pay exemption for all employees of a retail or service establishment which was primarily engaged in the selling of automobiles, trucks or farm implements. The 1966 Amendments added aircraft dealers but changed the full exemption to a mere overtime pay exemption which is limited to certain categories of employees.

The overtime pay requirements of the FLSA are now inapplicable to a salesman, mechanic or partsman employed by an establishment which is primarily engaged in selling automobiles, trailers, trucks, farm implements or aircraft to the ultimate purchaser. The overtime pay exemption does not require that the establishment qualify as a retail or service establishment, and it makes no distinction between establishments which are or are not a part of a covered enterprise.

The designated employees are exempt from the overtime pay provisions even if they work in physically separate buildings or areas so long as they are employed in a department which is functionally operated as part of the dealership. Employees who do not belong to one of the specified categories—for example, office workers—are not within the scope of the new overtime pay exemption.

Wider Wage Coverage

These changes in exemptions have the general effect of:

(1) extending minimum wage and equal pay coverage to the employees within the scope of the new overtime pay exemption; and

(2) extending minimum wage, equal pay and overtime coverage to employees in the nonexempt categories who are covered by the FLSA either on an individual or on an enterprise basis.

The minimum wage rates for newly covered employees are set forth at ¶ 120, and the overtime pay provisions for newly covered employees are at ¶ 220. Included among the employees now exempted from overtime pay may be some who were previously covered because their employer did not qualify as a retail or service establishment. Such employees would be treated as presently covered employees for minimum wage purposes (see ¶ 110).

Still in effect and still available, if all statutory conditions are met, is the general exemption for retail and service establishments (see ¶ 315). This general exemption is available to an establishment which is not part of an enterprise and which does an annual business under $500,000 ($250,000 after February 1, 1969). It is also available to any establishment which is part of a covered enterprise and does an annual business under $250,000.

Law: Sec. 13(b)(10).

Food Service Employees

A food service employee of a retail or service establishment need not be paid premium pay for overtime hours even if the establishment is part of a covered enterprise. In order for this overtime pay exemption to be applicable, two requirements must be satisfied:

(1) the establishment must be a retail or service establishment within the meaning of the general exemption for retail or service establishments (see ¶ 315), and

(2) the employee must be employed primarily in connection with the preparation or offering of food or beverages for human consumption, either on the premises, or by such services as catering, banquet, box lunch, or curb or counter service, to the public, to employees, or to members or guests of clubs.

Prior to the 1966 Amendments, the FLSA fully exempted such employees from minimum wage, equal pay and overtime pay coverage. The exemption has now been narrowed to an overtime pay exemption and the change has the effect of bringing such employees within coverage of the minimum wage and equal pay provisions if they are employed by a covered enterprise or if they individually do interstate work. These employees (if not otherwise exempt) must be paid the minimum wage rates applicable to newly covered employees (see ¶ 120). Insofar as tipped employees are concerned, a portion of their wages can be credited as coming from tips (see ¶ 170).

An establishment may qualify for the general exemption given certain retail or service establishments. If an establishment meets all of the requirements of that general exemption (see ¶ 315), the food service employees would be exempt not only for overtime pay purposes but also for minimum wage and equal pay purposes.

Law: Sec. 13(b)(18).

Gasoline Service Stations

All of the employees of a gasoline service establishment, who are not otherwise exempt, are covered by the FLSA if the establishment has an annual gross volume of $250,000 or more (excluding excise taxes at the retail level if the taxes are separately stated). Covered employees are entitled to the minimum wages specified for presently covered employees (see ¶ 110). As to overtime pay premiums, however, these employees are treated as newly covered employees (see ¶ 220). This oddity results from the fact that these employees formerly were covered by the FLSA's minimum wage provisions but were specifically exempted from overtime pay premiums; this exemption was canceled by the 1966 Amendments.

All of the employees of an establishment doing less than $250,000 gross business yearly are exempt from the law if the establishment qualifies as a retail or service establishment (see ¶ 315).

Law: Sec. 3(s)(1).

Petroleum Distribution Employees

¶ 390

Only a partial exemption from the overtime pay premiums now exists for employees of certain businesses engaged in the wholesale or bulk distribution of petroleum products. Prior to the FLS Amendments of 1966, these employees were entirely exempt from overtime pay premiums. Now, they must be paid one and one half times the applicable FLSA minimums for hours between 40 and 56 in a workweek. For hours worked in excess of 12 daily or 56 weekly, they must be paid one and one half times their regular rates.

The minimum rates specified at ¶ 110 for presently covered employees apply to employees who themselves are engaged in commerce. The minimums specified at ¶ 120 for newly covered employees apply to employees brought within enterprise coverage by reason of the 1966 amendments (see ¶ 310 for enterprise coverage).

A business qualifies for this partial exemption if it is an independently owned local bulk petroleum distributor, does less than $1 million business yearly, sells more than 75 percent within the state, and sells not more than 25 percent to customers who purchase for bulk resale.

Law: Sec. 7(b)(3).

Students and Handicapped Workers

¶ 395

New provisions permitting the employment of students and handicapped workers at below normal wage rates have been written into the FLSA by the 1966 Amendments.

Students

The Secretary of Labor can permit the employment in retail or service establishments of full-time students at not less than 85 percent of the minimum wage which would otherwise apply. Employment is limited to not more than 20 hours a week, except that during school vacations employment can be permitted on a part-time or full-time basis. The proportion of student hours in any single establishment cannot exceed certain norms.

The Secretary can also permit the employment of full-time students in agriculture on a part-time basis (not exceeding 20 hours a week) or on a part-time or a full-time basis during school vacations. The students' wage rate is not to be less than 85 percent of the applicable agricultural minimum rate.

The student provisions apply to all students regardless of age, but the student provisions do not affect the operation of child labor laws.

Handicapped Workers

New provisions regulate the employment of handicapped workers at wages below the statutory minimum, including their employment in agriculture.

Special certificates issued by the Secretary of Labor may authorize the employment of handicapped workers at wages that are lower than the applicable statutory minimum, but not less than 50 percent of that minimum. Such wages shall be commensurate with wages paid non-handicapped workers for essentially the same type, quality, and quantity of work.

In cases where handicapped workers are engaged in training or evaluation programs or where they are multihandicapped or so severely handicapped that they are unable to engage in competitive employment, the Secretary may issue certificates authorizing their employment at wages which are less than 50 percent of the statutory minimum and conform to the workers' productivity.

The Secretary is authorized to establish special rates of compensation for workers employed in federal "work activity centers," that is, centers for handicapped workers whose physical or mental impairment is so severe as to make their productive capacity inconsequential.

Law: Sec. 14.

¶ 400

The FLSA has been extended to the workers on Johnston Island and on the Eniwetok and Kwajalein Atolls. Since these employees, unless otherwise exempt, are brought under the FLSA for the first time by the 1966 Amendments, they are subject to the lower minimum wage and overtime pay requirements, the ones applicable to newly covered employees (see ¶ 120 and 220). Any employee who is entitled to minimum wages also has a right to equal pay for equal work regardless of sex.

Law: Sec. 13(f).

A court suit to collect unpaid minimum wages, unpaid overtime compensation or liquidated damages under the FLSA must normally be started within two years after the cause of action accrued. In the case of a wilful violation, however, the time limit is increased by a full year. Where a cause of action arises out of a wilful violation, the suit may be commenced within three years after the cause of action accrued.

The statute of limitations does not apply to government injunction suits, except where back pay orders are concerned. With respect to those orders, the period now will be two years in the absence of wilfulness, three years in the event of wilfulness. There is no time limit in contempt proceedings which may result in an order for back pay which has accrued since the issuance of an injunction.

Law: Sec. 601, FLS Amendments of 1966.

Congress has directed the Secretary of Labor to make a study of industry practices with respect to overtime payments for work in excess of 40 hours a week. Of particular interest to Congress is the extent to which overtime work retards the creation of new job opportunities. The Secretary is to submit his report, with recommendations, by July 1, 1967.

The Secretary is directed to make studies also of the wages of handicapped workers and of wage standards in the Canal Zone. He is to report to Congress by July 1, 1967 as to the handicapped workers; by July 1, 1968 as to the Canal Zone.

Specific legislation prohibiting age discrimination in employment is to be submitted to Congress by the Secretary on or before January 1, 1967.

Law: Secs. 603-606, FLS Amendments of 1966.

The FLSA reaches practically all enterprises and industries in the nation in which interstate activities take place. It requires the following for all workers engaged in such enterprises or activities who are not specifically exempt:

(1) Payment of a straight-time wage at not less than a specified minimum.

(2) Payment of an overtime wage of time and one half for hours worked in excess of designated weekly numbers.

(3) Payment of equal wages for equal work regardless of sex.

This law also regulates child labor on a national basis.

Slight Interstate Dealings Reached

The FLSA applies to employers who engage in interstate activities, even though only to a limited degree. All that is necessary is regularity of interstate operations.

Example—A daily newspaper with a circulation of 10,000, all of which was local except about ½ of 1% which was regularly out-of-state, came within range of the FLSA.

Small Firms Feel Enterprise Impact

Businesses stamped as enterprises by the law must satisfy the FLSA wage and child-labor standards with respect to all of their employees (unless exempt). It makes no difference that a particular employee has nothing to do with interstate commerce; he nevertheless is entitled to benefits offered by the law. Businesses not rated as enterprises are subject to the law only with respect to employees whose activities have interstate aspects.

A business need not be especially large to qualify as an enterprise. Construction contractors, laundries, dry cleaners, hospitals, schools, retirement homes and nursing facilities qualify merely by having at least two employees whose duties touch on interstate commerce. The mere handling of goods which have moved across state lines at some time in the past is sufficient to satisfy the commerce requirement. It is immaterial how small the business is.

Other firms having two such employees and which do at least $250,000 business yearly will qualify as enterprises after January 31, 1969. From February 1, 1967, until then, the requirement for enterprise coverage is $500,000 under the 1966 Amendments.

The government has wide authority in enforcing the FLSA. To aid it in doing so, employers are required to keep records showing the name, occupation and sex of employees, the time they work, the pay they receive for straight-time and overtime, and any deductions from their pay.

The government constantly investigates business firms to uncover violations of the law. It investigates on its own, as well as pursuant to complaints. The government collects any back wages found owing to employees, either on a voluntary basis or through the courts. To insure against future violations, court injunctions are procured; an injunction is hard to get rid of once it attaches to an employer's business. Flagrant, wilful violations can be taken to criminal courts for remedy. Shipping bans can be slapped on goods produced in violation of the law. Short-changed employees can themselves sue for back pay, and possibly recover an equal amount in damages. The employer must pay their attorney's fees.

Compliance with the FLSA is no defense to violation of state, municipal or other federal laws imposing stricter labor standards than those contained in the FLSA.

An employer newly covered by the FLSA—perhaps because of the wider reach of the 1966 Amendments or a geographical expansion of business operations—is faced with many problems under the federal law. The big questions are:

Coverage.—Is coverage on an enterprise basis (meaning all employees are covered) or is coverage on an individual employee basis (meaning only employees connected with interstate activities are covered)? Are any of the employees exempt?

Wage scales.—Which of the two minimum-wage and overtime-pay scales set up by the 1966 Amendments apply? This depends upon whether coverage is by reason of the amendments. The two minimum-wage scales do not become one until February 1, 1971. The two overtime-pay scales dovetail on February 1, 1969.

Figuring the payroll.—How should the payroll be figured to satisfy the FLSA standards? Idle time and time spent by employees before and after regular working hours may or may not be compensable. Fringe benefits paid to employees may or may not qualify as wages creditable towards the statutory requirements. Deductions from wages may or may not reduce the payment required by law. Differentials in the pay of men and women may or may not violate the law.

Child labor.—Does the employment of children exceed the confines of the FLSA? Is the work they perform deemed hazardous? Are they working when they should be in school? Are they old enough to engage in their particular occupations?

Recordkeeping.—Are records needed by the government for investigation purposes being properly kept? The records may contain information sufficient for the employer's needs, but not enough to satisfy the government.

Avoiding violations.—Only by answering these questions correctly, and acting accordingly, can employers be sure of not running afoul of the FLSA.

To amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 to extend its protection to additional employees, to raise the minimum wage, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1966."

[¶ 455] [TITLES I TO V—AMENDMENTS OF THE FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT OF 1938, AS AMENDED]

Sec. 101 to Sec. 501. [The amendments made by the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1966 are incorporated in place in the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, which is reproduced in full at ¶ 500.]

TITLE VI—MISCELLANEOUS

[¶ 460] STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS

Sec. 601. (a) Section 16(c) of such Act is amended by striking out "two-year statute" and by inserting in lieu thereof "statutes".

(b) Section 6(a) of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947 (Public Law 49, Eightieth Congress) is amended by inserting before the semicolon at the end thereof the following: ", except that a cause of action arising out of a willful violation may be commenced within three years after the cause of action accrued".

[¶ 470] EFFECTIVE DATE

Sec. 602. Except as otherwise provided in this Act, the amendments made by this Act shall take effect on February 1, 1967. On and after the date of the enactment of this Act the Secretary is authorized to promulgate necessary rules, regulations, or orders with regard to the amendments made by this Act.

[¶ 480] STUDY OF EXCESSIVE OVERTIME

Sec. 603. The Secretary of Labor is hereby instructed to commence immediately a complete study of present practices dealing with overtime payments for work in excess of forty hours per week and the extent to which such overtime work impedes the creation of new job opportunities in American industry. The Secretary is further instructed to report to the Congress by July 1, 1967, the findings of such survey with appropriate recommendations.

[¶ 485] CANAL ZONE EMPLOYEES AND PANAMA CANAL STUDY

Sec. 604. The Secretary of Labor, in cooperation with the Secretary of Defense and the Secretary of State, shall (1) undertake a study with respect to (A) wage rates payable to Federal employees in the Canal Zone engaged in employment of the kind described in paragraph (7) of section 202 of the Classification Act of 1949 (5 U. S. C. 1082(7)) and (B) the requirements of an effective and economical operation of the Panama Canal, and (2) report to the Congress not later than July 1, 1968, the results of his study together with such recommendations as he may deem appropriate.

[¶ 490] STUDY OF WAGES PAID HANDICAPPED CLIENTS IN SHELTERED WORKSHOPS

Sec. 605. The Secretary of Labor is hereby instructed to commence immediately a complete study of wage payments to handicapped clients of sheltered workshops and of the feasibility of raising existing wage standards in such workshops. The Secretary is further instructed to report to the Congress by July 1, 1967, the findings of such study with appropriate recommendations.

[¶ 495] PREVENTION OF DISCRIMINATION BECAUSE OF AGE

Sec. 606. The Secretary of Labor is hereby directed to submit to the Congress not later than January 1, 1967 his specific legislative recommendations for implementing the conclusions and recommendations contained in his report on age discrimination in employment made pursuant to section 715 of Public Law 88-352. Such legislative recommendations shall include, without limitation, provisions specifying appropriate enforcement procedures, a particular administering agency, and the standards, coverage, and exemptions, if any, to be included in the proposed enactment.

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT, AS AMENDED

[¶ 500]

(Act of June 25, 1938, c. 676, 75th Cong., 3rd Sess., 52 Stat. 1060, as amended by the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1966).

[¶ 501] SHORT TITLE

Section 1. This Act may be cited as the "Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938."

[¶ 502] CONGRESSIONAL FINDING AND DECLARATION OF POLICY

Sec. 2. (a) The Congress hereby finds that the existence, in industries engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce, of labor conditions detrimental to the maintenance of the minimum standard of living necessary for health, efficiency, and general well-being of workers (1) causes commerce and the channels and instrumentalities of commerce to be used to spread and perpetuate such labor conditions among the workers of the several States; (2) burdens commerce and the free flow of goods in commerce; (3) constitutes an unfair method of competition in commerce; (4) leads to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of goods in commerce; and (5) interferes with the orderly and fair marketing of goods in commerce.

[¶ 503] [Declaration of Policy]

(b) It is hereby declared to be the policy of this Act, through the exercise by Congress of its power to regulate commerce among the several States and with foreign nations, to correct and as rapidly as practicable to eliminate the conditions above referred to in such industries without substantially curtailing employment or earning power.

[¶ 510] DEFINITIONS

Sec. 3. As used in this Act—

[¶ 511] [Person]

(a) "Person" means an individual, partnership, association, corporation, business trust, legal representative, or any organized group of persons.

[¶ 512] [Commerce]

(b) "Commerce" means trade, commerce, transportation, transmission, or communication among the several States or between any State and any place outside thereof.

[¶ 513] [State]

(c) "State" means any State of the United States or the District of Columbia or any Territory or possession of the United States.

(d) "Employer" includes any person acting directly or indirectly in the interest of an employer in relation to an employee but shall not include the United States or any State or political subdivision of a State (except with respect to employees of a State, or a political subdivision thereof, employed (1) in a hospital, institution, or school referred to in the last sentence of subsection (r) of this section, or (2) in the operation of a railway or carrier referred to in such sentence), or any labor organization (other than when acting as an employer), or anyone acting in the capacity of officer or agent of such labor organization.

1966 Amendment.—In Sec. 3(d), the italicized material was added by Sec. 102(b) of the FLS Amendments of 1966.

(e) "Employee" includes any individual employed by an employer, except that such term shall not, for the purposes of section 3(u) include—

(1) any individual employed by an employer engaged in agriculture if such individual is the parent, spouse, child, or other member of the employer's immediate family, or

(2) any individual who is employed by an employer engaged in agriculture if such individual (A) is employed as a hand harvest laborer and is paid on a piece rate basis in an operation which has been, and is customarily and generally recognized as having been, paid on a piece rate basis in the region of employment, (B) commutes daily from his permanent residence to the farm on which he is so employed, and (C) has been employed in agriculture less than thirteen weeks during the preceding calendar year.

1966 Amendment.—Sec. 3(e) was amended by Sec. 103(a) of the FLS Amendments of 1966. Prior to amendment, it read "(e) 'Employee' includes any individual employed by an employer."

(f) "Agriculture" includes farming in all its branches and among other things includes the cultivation and tillage of the soil, dairying, the production, cultivation, growing, and harvesting of any agricultural or horticultural commodities (including commodities defined as agricultural commodities in section 15(g) of the Agricultural Marketing Act, as amended), the raising of livestock, bees, fur-bearing animals, or poultry, and any practices (including any forestry or lumbering operations) performed by a farmer or on a farm as an incident to or in conjunction with such farming operations, including preparation for market, delivery to storage or to market or to carriers for transportation to market.

[¶ 517] [Employ]

(g) "Employ" includes to suffer or permit to work.

[¶ 518] [Industry]

(h) "Industry" means a trade, business, industry, or branch thereof, or group of industries, in which individuals are gainfully employed.

[¶ 519] [Goods]

(i) "Goods" means goods (including ships and marine equipment), wares, products, commodities, merchandise, or articles or subjects of commerce of any character, or any part or ingredient thereof, but does not include goods after their delivery into the actual physical possession of the ultimate consumer thereof other than a producer, manufacturer, or processor thereof.

[¶ 520] [Produced]

(j) "Produced" means produced, manufactured, mined, handled, or in any other manner worked on in any State; and for the purposes of this Act an employee shall be deemed to have been engaged in the production of goods if such employee was employed in producing, manufacturing, mining, handling, transporting, or in any other manner working on such goods, or in any closely related process or occupation directly essential to the production thereof, in any State.

[¶ 521] [Sale—Sell]

(k) "Sale" or "sell" includes any sale, exchange, contract to sell, consignment for sale, shipment for sale, or other disposition.

[¶ 522] [Oppressive Child Labor]

(l) "Oppressive child labor" means a condition of employment under which (1) any employee under the age of sixteen years is employed by an employer (other than a parent or a person standing in place of a parent employing his own child or a child in his custody under the age of sixteen years in an occupation other than manufacturing or mining or an occupation found by the Secretary of Labor to be particularly hazardous for the employment of children between the ages of sixteen and eighteen years or detrimental to their health or well-being) in any occupation, or (2) any employee between the ages of sixteen and eighteen years is employed by an employer in any occupation which the Secretary of Labor shall find and by order declare to be particularly hazardous for the employment of children between such ages or detrimental to their health or well-being; but oppressive child labor shall not be deemed to exist by virtue of the employment in any occupation of any person with respect to whom the employer shall have on file an unexpired certificate issued and held pursuant to regulations of the Secretary of Labor certifying that such person is above the oppressive child-labor age. The Secretary of Labor shall provide by regulation or by order that the employment of employees between the ages of fourteen and sixteen years in occupations other than manufacturing and mining shall not be deemed to constitute oppressive child labor if and to the extent that the Secretary of Labor determines that such employment is confined to periods which will not interfere with their schooling and to conditions which will not interfere with their health and well-being.

(m) "Wage" paid to any employee includes the reasonable cost, as determined by the Secretary of Labor, to the employer of furnishing such employee with board, lodging, or other facilities, if such board, lodging, or other facilities are customarily furnished by such employer to his employees: Provided, That the cost of board, lodging, or other facilities shall not be included as a part of the wage paid to any employee to the extent it is excluded therefrom under the terms of a bona fide collective-bargaining agreement applicable to the particular employee: Provided further, That the Secretary is authorized to determine the fair value of such board, lodging, or other facilities for defined classes of employees and in defined areas, based on average cost to the employer or to groups of employers similarly situated, or average value to groups of employees, or other appropriate measures of fair value. Such evaluations, where applicable and pertinent, shall be used in lieu of actual measure of cost in determining the wage paid to any employee. In determining the wage of a tipped employee, the amount paid such employee by his employer shall be deemed to be increased on account of tips by an amount determined by the employer, but not by an amount in excess of 50 per centum of the applicable minimum wage rate, except that in the case of an employee who (either himself or acting through his representative) shows to the satisfaction of the Secretary that the actual amount of tips received by him was less than the amount determined by the employer as the amount by which the wage paid him was deemed to be increased under this sentence, the amount paid such employee by his employer shall be deemed to have been increased by such lesser amount.

1966 Amendment.—In Sec. 3(m), the last sentence, which appears in italics, was added by Sec. 101(a) of the FLS Amendments of 1966.

(n) "Resale" shall not include the sale of goods to be used in residential or farm building construction, repair, or maintenance: Provided, That the sale is recognized as a bona fide retail sale in the industry.

1966 Amendment.—In Sec. 3(n), after the first word the phrase "except as used in subsection (s)(1)" was stricken by Sec. 215(a) of the FLS Amendments of 1966.

[¶ 525] [Hours Worked]

(o) Hours Worked.—In determining for the purposes of sections 6 and 7 the hours for which an employee is employed, there shall be excluded any time spent in changing clothes or washing at the beginning or end of each workday which was excluded from measured working time during the week involved by the express terms of or by custom or practice under a bona fide collective-bargaining agreement applicable to the particular employer.

[¶ 526] [American Vessel]

(p) "American vessel" includes any vessel which is documented or numbered under the laws of the United States.

[¶ 527] [Secretary]

(q) "Secretary" means the Secretary of Labor.

(r) "Enterprise" means the related activities performed (either through unified operation or common control) by any person or persons for a common business purpose, and includes all such activities whether performed in one or more establishments or by one or more corporate or other organizational units including departments of an establishment operated through leasing arrangements, but shall not include the related activities performed for such enterprise by an independent contractor: Provided, That, within the meaning of this subsection, a retail or service establishment which is under independent ownership shall not be deemed to be so operated or controlled as to be other than a separate and distinct enterprise by reason of any arrangement, which includes, but is not necessarily limited to, an agreement, (1) that it will sell, or sell only, certain goods specified by a particular manufacturer, distributor, or advertiser, or (2) that it will join with other such establishments in the same industry for the purpose of collective purchasing, or (3) that it will have the exclusive right to sell the goods or use the brand name of a manufacturer, distributor, or advertiser within a specified area, or by reason of the fact that it occupies premises leased to it by a person who also leases premises to other retail or service establishments. For purposes of this subsection, the activities performed by any person or persons—

(1) in connection with the operation of a hospital, an institution primarily engaged in the care of the sick, the aged, the mentally ill or defective who reside on the premises of such institution, a school for mentally or physically handicapped or gifted children, an elementary or secondary school, or an institution of higher education (regardless of whether or not such hospital, institution, or school is public or private or operated for profit or not for profit), or

(2) in connection with the operation of a street, suburban or interurban electric railway, or local trolley or motorbus carrier, if the rates and services of such railway or carrier are subject to regulation by a State or local agency (regardless of whether or not such railway or carrier is public or private or operated for profit or not for profit), shall be deemed to be activities performed for a business purpose.

1966 Amendment.—In Sec. 3(r), the italicized material at the end was added by Sec. 102(a) of the FLS Amendments of 1966.

[¶ 529] [Enterprise Engaged in Commerce or in the Production of Goods for Commerce]

(s) "Enterprise engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce" means an enterprise which has employees engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce, including employees handling, selling, or otherwise working on goods that have been moved in or produced for commerce by any person, and which—

(1) during the period February 1, 1967, through January 31, 1969, is an enterprise whose annual gross volume of sales made or business done is not less than $500,000 (exclusive of excise taxes at the retail level which are separately stated) or is a gasoline service establishment whose annual gross volume of sales is not less than $250,000 (exclusive of excise taxes at the retail level which are separately stated), and beginning February 1, 1969, is an enterprise whose annual gross volume of sales made or business done is not less than $250,000 (exclusive of excise taxes at the retail level which are separately stated);

(2) is engaged in laundering, cleaning, or repairing clothing or fabrics;

(3) is engaged in the business of construction or reconstruction, or both; or

(4) is engaged in the operation of a hospital, an institution primarily engaged in the care of the sick, the aged, the mentally ill or defective who reside on the premises of such institution, a school for mentally or physically handicapped or gifted children, an elementary or secondary school, or an institution of higher education (regardless of whether or not such hospital, institution, or school is public or private or operated for profit or not for profit).

Any establishment which has as its only regular employees the owner thereof or the parent, spouse, child, or other member of the immediate family of such owner shall not be considered to be an enterprise engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce or a part of such an enterprise, and the sales of such establishment shall not be included for the purpose of determining the annual gross volume of sales of any enterprise for the purpose of this subsection.

1966 Amendment.—Sec. 3(s) was amended by Sec. 102(c) of the FLS Amendments of 1966. Prior to amendment, it read as follows:

"(s) 'Enterprise engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce' means any of the following in the activities of which employees are so engaged, including employees handling, selling, or otherwise working on goods that have been moved in or produced for commerce by any person:

"(1) any such enterprise which has one or more retail or service establishments if the annual gross volume of sales of such enterprise is not less than $1,000,000, exclusive of excise taxes at the retail level which are separately stated and if such enterprise purchases or receives goods for resale that move or have moved across State lines (not in deliveries from the reselling establishment) which amount in total annual volume to $250,000 or more;

"(2) any such enterprise which is engaged in the business of operating a street, suburban or interurban electric railway, or local trolley or motorbus carrier if the annual gross volume of sales of such enterprise is not less than $1,000,000, exclusive of excise taxes at the retail level which are separately stated;

"(3) any establishment of any such enterprise, except establishments and enterprises referred to in other paragraphs of this subsection, which has employees engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce if the annual gross volume of sales of such enterprise is not less than $1,000,000;

"(4) any such enterprise which is engaged in the business of construction or reconstruction, or both, if the annual gross volume from the business of such enterprise is not less than $350,000;

"(5) any gasoline service establishment if the annual gross volume of sales of such establishment is not less than $250,000, exclusive of excise taxes at the retail level which are separately stated:

Provided, That an establishment shall not be considered to be an enterprise engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce, or a part of an enterprise engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce, and the sales of such establishment shall not be included for the purpose of determining the annual gross volume of sales of any enterprise for the purpose of this subsection, if the only employees of such establishment are the owner thereof or persons standing in the relationship of parent, spouse, or child of such owner."

[¶ 530] [Tipped Employee]

(t) "Tipped employee" means any employee engaged in an occupation in which he customarily and regularly receives more than $20 a month in tips.

1966 Amendment.—Sec. 3(t) was added by Sec. 101(b) of the FLS Amendments of 1966.

[¶ 531] [Man-Day]

(u) "Man-day" means any day during which an employee performs any agricultural labor for not less than one hour.

1966 Amendment.—Sec. 3(u) was added by Sec. 103(b) of the FLS Amendments of 1966.

[¶ 532] [Elementary School]

(v) "Elementary school" means a day or residential school which provides elementary education, as determined under State law.

1966 Amendment.—Sec. 3(v) was added by Sec. 102(d) of the FLS Amendments of 1966.

[¶ 533] [Secondary School]

(w) "Secondary school" means a day or residential school which provides secondary education, as determined under State law.

1966 Amendment.—Sec. 3(w) was added by Sec. 102(d) of the FLS Amendments of 1966.

[¶ 540] ADMINISTRATOR

[¶ 541] [Appointment]

Sec. 4. (a) There is hereby created in the Department of Labor a Wage and Hour Division which shall be under the direction of an Administrator, to be known as the Administrator of the Wage and Hour Division (in this Act referred to as the "Administrator"). The Administrator shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall receive compensation at the rate of $20,000 a year.

[¶ 542] [Administrative Assistants]

(b) The Secretary of Labor may, subject to the civil-service laws, appoint such employees as he deems necessary to carry out his functions and duties under this Act and shall fix their compensation in accordance with the Classification Act of 1949, as amended. The Secretary may establish and utilize such regional, local, or other agencies, and utilize such voluntary and uncompensated services, as may from time to time be needed. Attorneys appointed under this section may appear for and represent the Secretary in any litigation, but all such litigation shall be subject to the direction and control of the Attorney General. In the appointment, selection, classification, and promotion of officers and employees of the Secretary, no political test or qualification shall be permitted or given consideration, but all such appointments and promotions shall be given and made on the basis of merit and efficiency.

[¶ 543] [Principal Office]

(c) The principal office of the Secretary shall be in the District of Columbia, but he or his duly authorized representative may exercise any or all of his powers in any place.

[¶ 544] [Annual Report]

(d) The Secretary shall submit annually in January a report to the Congress covering his activities for the preceding year and including such information, data, and recommendations for further legislation in connection with the matters covered by this Act as he may find advisable. Such report shall contain an evaluation and appraisal by the Secretary of the minimum wages established by this Act, together with his recommendations to the Congress. In making such evaluation and appraisal, the Secretary shall take into consideration any changes which may have occurred in the cost of living and in productivity and the level of wages in manufacturing, the ability of employers to absorb wage increases, and such other factors as he may deem pertinent.

[¶ 545] [Investigation of Effects on Employment of Foreign Competition]

(e) Whenever the Secretary has reason to believe that in any industry under this Act the competition of foreign producers in United States markets or in markets abroad, or both, has resulted, or is likely to result, in increased unemployment in the United States, he shall undertake an investigation to gain full information with respect to the matter. If he determines such increased unemployment has in fact resulted, or is in fact likely to result, from such competition, he shall make a full and complete report of his findings and determinations to the President and to the Congress: Provided, That he may also include in such report information on the increased employment resulting from additional exports in any industry under this Act as he may determine to be pertinent to such report.

[¶ 550] SPECIAL INDUSTRY COMMITTEES FOR PUERTO RICO AND THE VIRGIN ISLANDS [AND AMERICAN SAMOA*]

Sec. 5. (a) The Secretary of Labor shall as soon as practicable appoint a special industry committee to recommend the minimum rate or rates of wages to be paid under section 6 to employees in Puerto Rico or the Virgin Islands, or in Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands, engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce or employed in any enterprise engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce, or the Secretary may appoint separate industry committees to recommend the minimum rate or rates of wages to be paid under section 6 to employees therein engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce or employed in any enterprise engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce, in particular industries. An industry committee appointed under this subsection shall be composed of residents of such island or islands where the employees with respect to whom such committee was appointed are employed and residents of the United States outside of Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands. In determining the minimum rate or rates of wages to be paid, and in determining classifications, such industry committees shall be subject to the provisions of section 8.

[¶ 552] [Appointment—Membership]

(b) An industry committee shall be appointed by the Secretary without regard to any other provisions of law regarding the appointment and compensation of employees of the United States. It shall include a number of disinterested persons representing the public, one of whom the Secretary shall designate as chairman, a like number of persons representing employees in the industry, and a like number representing employers in the industry. In the appointment of the persons representing each group, the Secretary shall give due regard to the geographical regions in which the industry is carried on.

* Section 5 also relates to American Samoa by reason of Section 6(a)(3) (¶ 563).

[¶ 553] [Quorum—Compensation]

(c) Two-thirds of the members of an industry committee shall constitute a quorum, and the decision of the committee shall require a vote of not less than a majority of all its members. Members of an industry committee shall receive as compensation for their services a reasonable per diem, which the Secretary shall by rules and regulations prescribe, for each day actually spent in the work of the committee, and shall in addition be reimbursed for their necessary traveling and other expenses. The Secretary shall furnish the committee with adequate legal, stenographic, clerical, and other assistance, and shall by rules and regulations prescribe the procedure to be followed by the committee.

[¶ 554] [Submission of Data—Witnesses]

(d) The Secretary shall submit to an industry committee from time to time such data as he may have available on the matters referred to it, and shall cause to be brought before it in connection with such matters any witnesses whom he deems material. An industry committee may summon other witnesses or call upon the Secretary to furnish additional information to aid in its deliberations.

[¶ 560] MINIMUM WAGES

[¶ 561] [Presently Covered Employees]

Sec. 6. (a) Every employer shall pay to each of his employees who in any workweek is engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce, or is employed in an enterprise engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce, wages at the following rates:

(1) not less than $1.40 an hour during the first year from the effective date of the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1966 and not less than $1.60 an hour thereafter, except as otherwise provided in this section;

1966 Amendment. — Sec. 6(a)(1) was amended by Sec. 301(a) of the FLS Amendments of 1966. Prior to amendment, it read as follows:

"(a) Every employer shall pay to each of his employees who in any workweek is engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce wages at the following rates—

"(1) not less than $1.15 an hour during the first two years from the effective date of the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1961, and not less than $1.25 an hour thereafter, except as otherwise provided in this section."

[¶ 562] [Homeworkers in Puerto Rico and Virgin Islands]

(2) if such employee is a homeworker in Puerto Rico or the Virgin Islands, not less than the minimum piece rate prescribed by regulation or order; or, if no such minimum piece rate is in effect, any piece rate adopted by such employer which shall yield, to the proportion or class of employees prescribed by regulation or order, not less than the applicable minimum hourly wage rate. Such minimum piece rates or employer piece rates shall be commensurate with, and shall be paid in lieu of, the minimum hourly wage rate applicable under the provisions of this section. The Secretary of Labor, or his authorized representative, shall have power to make such regulations or orders as are necessary or appropriate to carry out any of the provisions of this paragraph, including the power without limiting the generality of the foregoing, to define any operation or occupation which is performed by such home work employees in Puerto Rico or the Virgin Islands; to establish minimum piece rates for any operation or occupation so defined; to prescribe the method and procedure for ascertaining and promulgating minimum piece rates; to prescribe standards for employer piece rates, including the proportion or class of employees who shall receive not less than the minimum hourly wage rate; to define the term "home worker"; and to prescribe the conditions under which employers, agents, contractors, and subcontractors shall cause goods to be produced by home workers;

[¶ 563] [Workers in American Samoa]

(3) if such employee is employed in American Samoa, in lieu of the rate or rates provided by this subsection or subsection (b), not less than the applicable rate established by the Secretary of Labor in accordance with recommendations of a special industry committee or committees which he shall appoint in the same manner and pursuant to the same provisions as are applicable to the special industry committees provided for Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands by this Act as amended from time to time;

[¶ 564] [Seamen on American Vessels]

(4) if such employee is employed as a seaman on an American vessel, not less than the rate which will provide to the employee, for the period covered by the wage payment, wages equal to compensation at the hourly rate prescribed by paragraph (1) of this subsection for all hours during such period when he was actually on duty (including periods aboard ship when the employee was on watch or was, at the direction of a superior officer, performing work or standing by, but not including off-duty periods which are provided pursuant to the employment agreement); or 1966 Amendment. — Sec. 6(a)(4) was added by Sec. 301(b) of the FLS Amendments of 1966. Similar wording previously appeared in Sec. 6(b)(2).

[¶ 565] [Agricultural Employees]

(5) if such employee is employed in agriculture, not less than $1 an hour during the first year from the effective date of the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1966, not less than $1.15 an hour during the second year from such date, and not less than $1.30 an hour thereafter.

1966 Amendment. — Sec. 6(a)(5) was added by Sec. 302 of the FLS Amendments of 1966.

[¶ 570] [Newly Covered Employees]

(b) Every employer shall pay to each of his employees (other than an employee to whom subsection (a)(5) applies) who in any workweek is engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce, or is employed in an enterprise engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce, and who in such workweek is brought within the purview of this section by the amendments made to this Act by the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1966, wages at the following rates:

(1) not less than $1 an hour during the first year from the effective date of such amendments,

(2) not less than $1.15 an hour during the second year from such date,

(3) not less than $1.30 an hour during the third year from such date,

(4) not less than $1.45 an hour during the fourth year from such date, and

(5) not less than $1.60 an hour thereafter.

1966 Amendment.—Sec. 6(b) was amended by Sec. 303 of the FLS Amendments of 1966. Prior to amendment, it read as follows:

"(b) Every employer shall pay to each of his employees who in any workweek (i) is employed in an enterprise engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce, as defined in section 3(s)(1), (2), or (4) or by an establishment described in section 3(s)(3) or (5), and who, except for the enactment of the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1961, would not be within the purview of this section, or (ii) is brought within the purview of this section by the amendments made to section 13(a) of this Act by the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1961, wages at rates—

"(1) not less than $1 an hour during the first three years from the effective date of such amendments; not less than $1.15 an hour during the fourth year from such date; and not less than the rate effective under paragraph (1) of subsection (a) thereafter;

"(2) if such employee is employed as a seaman on an American vessel, not less than the rate which will provide to the employee, for the period covered by the wage payment, wages equal to compensation at the hourly rate prescribed by paragraph (1) of this subsection for all hours during such period when he was actually on duty (including periods aboard ship when the employee was on watch or was, at the direction of a superior officer, performing work or standing by, but not including off-duty periods which are provided pursuant to the employment agreement)."

[¶ 571] [Other Workers in Puerto Rico and Virgin Islands]

(c)(1) The rate or rates provided by subsections (a) and (b) of this section shall be superseded in the case of any employee in Puerto Rico or the Virgin Islands only for so long as and insofar as such employee is covered by a wage order heretofore or hereafter issued by the Secretary pursuant to the recommendations of a special industry committee appointed pursuant to section 5.

(2) In the case of any such employee who is covered by such a wage order and to whom the rate or rates prescribed by subsection (a) would otherwise apply, the following rates shall apply:

(A) The rate or rates applicable under the most recent wage order issued by the Secretary prior to the effective date of the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1966, increased by 12 per centum, unless such rate or rates are superseded by the rate or rates prescribed in a wage order issued by the Secretary pursuant to the recommendations of a review committee appointed under paragraph (C). Such rate or rates shall become effective sixty days after the effective date of the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1966 or one year from the effective date of the most recent wage order applicable to such employee theretofore issued by the Secretary pursuant to the recommendations of a special industry committee appointed under section 5, whichever is later.

(B) Beginning one year after the applicable effective date under paragraph (A), not less than the rate or rates prescribed by paragraph (A), increased by an amount equal to 16 per centum of the rate or rates applicable under the most recent wage order issued by the Secretary prior to the effective date of the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1966, unless such rate or rates are superseded by the rate or rates prescribed in a wage order issued by the Secretary pursuant to the recommendations of a review committee appointed under paragraph (C).

(C) Any employer, or group of employers, employing a majority of the employees in an industry in Puerto Rico or the Virgin Islands, may apply to the Secretary in writing for the appointment of a review committee to recommend the minimum rate or rates to be paid such employees in lieu of the rate or rates provided by paragraph (A) or (B). Any such application with respect to any rate or rates provided for under paragraph (A) shall be filed within sixty days following the enactment of the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1966 and any such application with respect to any rate or rates provided for under paragraph (B) shall be filed not more than one hundred and twenty days and not less than sixty days prior to the effective date of the applicable rate or rates under paragraph (B). The Secretary shall promptly consider such application and may appoint a review committee if he has reasonable cause to believe, on the basis of financial and other information contained in the application, that compliance with any applicable rate or rates prescribed by paragraph (A) or (B) will substantially curtail employment in such industry. The Secretary's decision upon any such application shall be final. Any wage order issued pursuant to the recommendations of a review committee appointed under this paragraph shall take effect on the applicable effective date provided in paragraph (A) or (B).

(D) In the event a wage order has not been issued pursuant to the recommendation of a review committee prior to the applicable effective date under paragraph (A) or (B), the applicable percentage increase provided by any such paragraph shall take effect on the effective date prescribed therein, except with respect to the employees of an employer who filed an application under paragraph (C) and who files with the Secretary an undertaking with a surety or sureties satisfactory to the Secretary for payment to his employees of an amount sufficient to compensate such employees for the difference between the wages they actually receive and the wages to which they are entitled under this subsection. The Secretary shall be empowered to enforce such undertaking and any sums recovered by him shall be held in a special deposit account and shall be paid, on order of the Secretary, directly to the employee or employees affected. Any such sum not paid to an employee because of inability to do so within a period of three years shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts.

(3) In the case of any such employee to whom subsection (a)(5) or subsection (b) would otherwise apply, the Secretary shall within sixty days after the effective date of the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1966 appoint a special industry committee in accordance with section 5 to recommend the highest minimum wage rate or rates in accordance with the standards prescribed by section 8, but not in excess of the applicable rate provided by subsection (a)(5) or subsection (b), to be applicable to such employee in lieu of the rate or rates prescribed by subsection (a)(5) or subsection (b), as the case may be. The rate or rates recommended by the special industry committee shall be effective with respect to such employee upon the effective date of the wage order issued pursuant to such recommendation but not before sixty days after the effective date of the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1966.

(4) The provisions of section 5 and section 8, relating to special industry committees, shall be applicable to review committees appointed under this subsection. The appointment of a review committee shall be in addition to and not in lieu of any special industry committee required to be appointed pursuant to the provisions of subsection (a) of section 8, except that no special industry committee shall hold any hearing within one year after a minimum wage rate or rates for such industry shall have been recommended to the Secretary by a review committee to be paid in lieu of the rate or rates provided for under paragraph (A) or (B). The minimum wage rate or rates prescribed by this subsection shall be in effect only for so long as and insofar as such minimum wage rate or rates have not been superseded by a wage order fixing a higher minimum wage rate or rates (but not in excess of the applicable rate prescribed in subsection (a) or subsection (b)) hereafter issued by the Secretary pursuant to the recommendation of a special industry committee.

1966 Amendment.—Sec. 6(c) was amended by Sec. 304 of the FLS Amendments of 1966. Prior to amendment, it read as follows:

"(c) The rate or rates provided by subsections (a) and (b) of this section shall be superseded in the case of any employee in Puerto Rico or the Virgin Islands only for so long as and insofar as such employee is covered by a wage order heretofore or hereafter issued by the Secretary pursuant to the recommendations of a special industry committee appointed pursuant to section 5: Provided, That (1) the following rates shall apply to any such employee to whom the rate or rates prescribed by subsection (a) would otherwise apply:

"(A) The rate or rates applicable under the most recent wage order issued by the Secretary prior to the effective date of the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1961, increased by 15 per centum, unless such rate or rates are superseded by the rate or rates prescribed in a wage order issued by the Secretary pursuant to the recommendations of a review committee appointed under paragraph (C). Such rate or rates shall become effective sixty days after the effective date of the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1961 or one year from the effective date of the most recent wage order applicable to such employee theretofore issued by the Secretary pursuant to the recommendations of a special industry committee appointed under section 5, whichever is later.

"(B) Beginning two years after the applicable effective date under paragraph (A), not less than the rate or rates prescribed by paragraph (A), increased by an amount equal to 10 per centum of the rate or rates applicable under the most recent wage order issued by the Secretary prior to the effective date of the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1961, unless such rate or rates are superseded by the rate or rates prescribed in a wage order issued by the Secretary pursuant to the recommendations of a review committee appointed under paragraph (C).

"(C) Any employer, or group of employers, employing a majority of the employees in an industry in Puerto Rico or the Virgin Islands, may apply to the Secretary in writing for the appointment of a review committee to recommend the minimum rate or rates to be paid such employees in lieu of the rate or rates provided by paragraph (A) or (B). Any such application with respect to any rate or rates provided for under paragraph (A) shall be filed within sixty days following the enactment of the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1961 and any such application with respect to any rate or rates provided for under paragraph (B) shall be filed not more than one hundred and twenty days and not less than sixty days prior to the effective date of the applicable rate or rates under paragraph (B). The Secretary shall promptly consider such application and may appoint a review committee if he has reasonable cause to believe, on the basis of financial and other information contained in the application, that compliance with any applicable rate or rates prescribed by paragraph (A) or (B) will substantially curtail employment in such industry. The Secretary's decision upon any such application shall be final. Any wage order issued pursuant to the recommendations of a review committee appointed under this paragraph shall take effect on the applicable effective date provided in paragraph (A) or (B).

"(D) In the event a wage order has not been issued pursuant to the recommendation of a review committee prior to the applicable effective date under paragraph (A) or (B), the applicable percentage increase provided by any such paragraph shall take effect on the effective date prescribed therein, except with respect to the employees of an employer who filed an application under paragraph (C) and who files with the Secretary an undertaking with a surety or sureties satisfactory to the Secretary for payment to his employees of an amount sufficient to compensate such employees for the difference between the wages they actually receive and the wages to which they are entitled under this subsection. The Secretary shall be empowered to enforce such undertaking and any sums recovered by him shall be held in a special deposit account and shall be paid, on order of the Secretary, directly to the employee or employees affected. Any such sum not paid to an employee because of inability to do so within a period of three years shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts.

"(2) In the case of any such employee to whom subsection (b) would otherwise apply, the Secretary shall within sixty days after the enactment of the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1961 appoint a special industry committee in accordance with section 5 to recommend the highest minimum wage rate or rates in accordance with the standards prescribed by section 8, not in excess of the applicable rate provided by subsection (b), to be applicable to such employee in lieu of the rate or rates prescribed by subsection (b). The rate or rates recommended by the special industry committee shall be effective with respect to such employee upon the effective date of the wage order issued pursuant to such recommendation but not before sixty days after the effective date of the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1961.

"(3) The provisions of section 5 and section 8, relating to special industry committees, shall be applicable to review committees appointed under this subsection. The appointment of a review committee shall be in addition to and not in lieu of any special industry committee required to be appointed pursuant to the provisions of subsection (a) of section 8, except that no special industry committee shall hold any hearing within one year after a minimum wage rate or rates for such industry shall have been recommended to the Secretary by a review committee to be paid in lieu of the rate or rates provided for under paragraph (A) or (B). The minimum wage rate or rates prescribed by this subsection shall be in effect only for so long as and insofar as such minimum wage rate or rates have not been superseded by a wage order fixing a higher minimum wage rate or rates (but not in excess of the applicable rate prescribed in subsection (a) or subsection (b)) hereafter issued by the Secretary pursuant to the recommendation of a special industry committee."

(d)(1) No employer having employees subject to any provisions of this section shall discriminate, within any establishment in which such employees are employed, between employees on the basis of sex by paying wages to employees in such establishment at a rate less than the rate at which he pays wages to employees of the opposite sex in such establishment for equal work on jobs the performance of which requires equal skill, effort, and responsibility, and which are performed under similar working conditions, except where such payment is made pursuant to (i) a seniority system; (ii) a merit system; (iii) a system which measures earnings by quantity or quality of production; or (iv) a differential based on any other factor other than sex: Provided, That an employer who is paying a wage rate differential in violation of this subsection shall not, in order to comply with the provisions of this subsection, reduce the wage rate of any employee.

(2) No labor organization, or its agents, representing employees of an employer having employees subject to any provisions of this section shall cause or attempt to cause such an employer to discriminate against an employee in violation of paragraph (1) of this subsection.

(3) For purposes of administration and enforcement, any amounts owing to any employee which have been withheld in violation of this subsection shall be deemed to be unpaid minimum wages or unpaid overtime compensation under this Act.

(4) As used in this subsection, the term "labor organization" means any organization of any kind, or any agency or employee representation committee or plan, in which employees participate and which exists for the purpose, in whole or in part, of dealing with employers concerning grievances, labor disputes, wages, rates of pay, hours of employment, or conditions of work.

(e)(1) Notwithstanding the provisions of section 13 of this Act (except subsections (a)(1) and (f) thereof), every employer providing any contract services (other than linen supply services) under a contract with the United States or any subcontract thereunder shall pay to each of his employees whose rate of pay is not governed by the Service Contract Act of 1965 (41 U. S. C. 351-357) or to whom subsection (a)(1) of this section is not applicable, wages at rates not less than the rates provided for in subsection (b) of this section.

(2) Notwithstanding the provisions of section 13 of this Act (except subsections (a)(1) and (f) thereof) and the provisions of the Service Contract Act of 1965, every employer in an establishment providing linen supply services to the United States under a contract with the United States or any subcontract thereunder shall pay to each of his employees in such establishment wages at rates not less than those prescribed in subsection (b), except that if more than 50 per centum of the gross annual dollar volume of sales made or business done by such establishment is derived from providing such linen supply services under any such contracts or subcontracts, such employer shall pay to each of his employees in such establishment wages at rates not less than those prescribed in subsection (a)(1) of this section.

1966 Amendment.—Sec. 6(e) was added by Sec. 305 of the FLS Amendments of 1966.

[¶ 581] [Overtime Pay—Presently Covered Employees]

Sec. 7. (a)(1) Except as otherwise provided in this section, no employer shall employ any of his employees who in any workweek is engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce, or is employed in an enterprise engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce, for a workweek longer than forty hours unless such employee receives compensation for his employment in excess of the hours above specified at a rate not less than one and one-half times the regular rate at which he is employed.

1966 Amendment.—Sec. 7(a)(1) was amended by Sec. 401 of the FLS Amendments of 1966. Prior to amendment, it read as follows:

"(a)(1) Except as otherwise provided in this section, no employer shall employ any of his employees who in any workweek is engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce for a workweek longer than forty hours, unless such employee receives compensation for his employment in excess of the hours above specified at a rate not less than one and one-half times the regular rate at which he is employed; and"

[¶ 582] [Overtime Pay—Newly Covered Employees]

(2) No employer shall employ any of his employees who in any workweek is engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce, or is employed in an enterprise engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce, and who in such workweek is brought within the purview of this subsection by the amendments made to this Act by the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1966—

(A) for a workweek longer than forty-four hours during the first year from the effective date of the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1966,

(B) for a workweek longer than forty-two hours during the second year from such date, or

(C) for a workweek longer than forty hours after the expiration of the second year from such date, unless such employee receives compensation for his employment in excess of the hours above specified at a rate not less than one and one-half times the regular rate at which he is employed.

1966 Amendment.—Sec. 7(a)(2) was amended by Sec. 401 of the FLS Amendments of 1966. Prior to amendment, it read as follows:

"(2) No employer shall employ any of his employees who in any workweek (i) is employed in an enterprise engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce, as defined in section 3(s)(1) or (4), or by an establishment described in section 3(s)(3), and who, except for the enactment of the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1961, would not be within the purview of this subsection, or (ii) is brought within the purview of this subsection by the amendments made to section 13 of this Act by the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1961—

"(A) for a workweek longer than forty-four hours during the third year from the effective date of the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1961,

"(B) for a workweek longer than forty-two hours during the fourth year from such date,

"(C) for a workweek longer than forty hours after the expiration of the fourth year from such date, unless such employee receives compensation for his employment in excess of the hours above specified at a rate not less than one and one-half times the regular rate at which he is employed."

(b) No employer shall be deemed to have violated subsection (a) by employing any employee for a workweek in excess of that specified in such subsection without paying the compensation for overtime employment prescribed therein if such employee is so employed—

(1) in pursuance of an agreement, made as a result of collective bargaining by representatives of employees certified as bona fide by the National Labor Relations Board, which provides that no employee shall be employed more than one thousand and forty hours during any period of twenty-six consecutive weeks; or

(2) in pursuance of an agreement, made as a result of collective bargaining by representatives of employees certified as bona fide by the National Labor Relations Board, which provides that during a specified period of fifty-two consecutive weeks the employee shall be employed not more than two thousand two hundred and forty hours and shall be guaranteed not less than one thousand eight hundred and forty hours (or not less than forty-six weeks at the normal number of hours worked per week, but not less than thirty hours per week) and not more than two thousand and eighty hours of employment for which he shall receive compensation for all hours guaranteed or worked at rates not less than those applicable under the agreement to the work performed and for all hours in excess of the guaranty which are also in excess of the maximum workweek applicable to such employee under subsection (a) or two thousand and eighty in such period at rates not less than one and one-half times the regular rate at which he is employed; or

(3) by an independently owned and controlled local enterprise (including an enterprise with more than one bulk storage establishment) engaged in the wholesale or bulk distribution of petroleum products if—

(A) the annual gross volume of sales of such enterprise is less than $1,000,000 exclusive of excise taxes,

(B) more than 75 per centum of such enterprise's annual dollar volume of sales is made within the State in which such enterprise is located, and

(C) not more than 25 per centum of the annual dollar volume of sales of such enterprise is to customers who are engaged in the bulk distribution of such products for resale, and such employee receives compensation for employment in excess of forty hours in any workweek at a rate not less than one and one-half times the minimum wage rate applicable to him under section 6, and if such employee receives compensation for employment in excess of twelve hours in any workday, or for employment in excess of fifty-six hours in any workweek, as the case may be, at a rate not less than one and one-half times the regular rate at which he is employed.

1966 Amendment.—Sec. 7(b)(3) was added by Sec. 212(b) of the FLS Amendments of 1966. Similar wording previously appeared in Sec. 13(b)(10), which read:

"(10) any employee of an independently owned and controlled local enterprise (including an enterprise with more than one bulk storage establishment) engaged in the wholesale or bulk distribution of petroleum products if (A) the annual gross volume of sales of such enterprise is not more than $1,000,000 exclusive of excise taxes, and (B) not more than 75 per centum of such enterprise's annual dollar volume of sales is made within the State in which such enterprise is located, and (C) not more than 25 per centum of the annual dollar volume of sales of such enterprise is to customers who are engaged in the bulk distribution of such products for resale; or".

[¶ 584] [Seasonal Industry Exemption]

(c) For a period or periods of not more than ten workweeks in the aggregate in any calendar year, or fourteen workweeks in the aggregate in the case of an employer who does not qualify for the exemption in subsection (d) of this section, any employer may employ any employee for a workweek in excess of that specified in subsection (a) without paying the compensation for overtime employment prescribed in such subsection if such employee (1) is employed by such employer in an industry found by the Secretary to be of a seasonal nature, and (2) receives compensation for employment by such employer in excess of ten hours in any workday, or for employment by such employer in excess of fifty hours in any workweek, as the case may be, at a rate not less than one and one-half times the regular rate at which he is employed.

1966 Amendment.—Sec. 7(c) was added by Sec. 204(c) of the FLS Amendments of 1966. A similar exemption previously appeared in Sec. 7(b)(3), which read:

"(3) for a period or periods of not more than fourteen workweeks in the aggregate in any calendar year in any industry found by the Administrator to be of a seasonal nature,"

[¶ 585] [Processing of Agricultural Products Exemption]

(d) For a period or periods of not more than ten workweeks in the aggregate in any calendar year, or fourteen workweeks in the aggregate in the case of an employer who does not qualify for the exemption in subsection (c) of this section, any employer may employ any employee for a workweek in excess of that specified in subsection (a) without paying the compensation for overtime employment prescribed in such subsection, if such employee—

(1) is employed by such employer in an enterprise which is in an industry found by the Secretary—

(A) to be characterized by marked annually recurring seasonal peaks of operation at the places of first marketing or first processing of agricultural or horticultural commodities from farms if such industry is engaged in the handling, packing, preparing, storing, first processing, or canning of any perishable agricultural or horticultural commodities in their raw or natural state, or

(B) to be of a seasonal nature and engaged in the handling, packing, storing, preparing, first processing, or canning of any perishable agricultural or horticultural commodities in their raw or natural state, and

(2) receives compensation for employment by such employer in excess of ten hours in any workday, or for employment in excess of forty-eight hours in any workweek, as the case may be, at a rate not less than one and one-half times the regular rate at which he is employed.

1966 Amendment.—Sec. 7(d) was added by Sec. 204(c) of the FLS Amendments of 1966. A processing-of-agricultural-products exemption formerly appeared as Sec. 7(c) and read as follows:

"(c) In the case of an employer engaged in the first processing of milk, buttermilk, whey, skimmed milk, of cream into dairy products, or in the ginning and compressing of cotton, or in the processing of cottonseed, or in the processing of sugar beets, sugar-beet molasses, sugar cane, or maple sap, into sugar (but not refined sugar) or into sirup, the provisions of subsection (a) shall not apply to his employees in any place of employment where he is so engaged; and in the case of an employer engaged in the first processing of, or in canning or packing, perishable or seasonal fresh fruits or vegetables, or in the first processing, within the area of production (as defined by the Administrator), of any agricultural or horticultural commodity during seasonal operations, or in handling, slaughtering, or dressing poultry or livestock, the provisions of subsection (a), during a period or periods of not more than fourteen workweeks in the aggregate in any calendar year, shall not apply to his employees in any place of employment where he is so engaged."

[¶ 586] [Payments Excluded from "Regular Rate"]

(e) As used in this section the "regular rate" at which an employee is employed shall be deemed to include all remuneration for employment paid to, or on behalf of, the employee, but shall not be deemed to include—

(1) sums paid as gifts; payments in the nature of gifts made at Christmas time or on other special occasions, as a reward for service, the amounts of which are not measured by or dependent on hours worked, production, or efficiency;

(2) payments made for occasional periods when no work is performed due to vacation, holiday, illness, failure of the employer to provide sufficient work, or other similar cause; reasonable payments for traveling expenses, or other expenses, incurred by an employee in the furtherance of his employer's interests and properly reimbursable by the employer; and other similar payments to an employee which are not made as compensation for his hours of employment;

(3) sums paid in recognition of services performed during a given period if either, (a) both the fact that payment is to be made and the amount of the payment are determined at the sole discretion of the employer at or near the end of the period and not pursuant to any prior contract, agreement, or promise causing the employee to expect such payments regularly; or (b) the payments are made pursuant to a bona fide profit-sharing plan or trust or bona fide thrift or savings plan, meeting the requirements of the Secretary of Labor set forth in appropriate regulations which he shall issue, having due regard among other relevant factors, to the extent to which the amounts paid to the employee are determined without regard to hours of work, production, or efficiency; or (c) the payments are talent fees (as such talent fees are defined and delimited by regulations of the Secretary) paid to performers, including announcers, on radio and television programs;

(4) contributions irrevocably made by an employer to a trustee or third person pursuant to a bona fide plan for providing old-age, retirement, life, accident, or health insurance or similar benefits for employees;

(5) extra compensation provided by a premium rate paid for certain hours worked by the employee in any day or workweek because such hours are hours worked in excess of eight in a day or in excess of the maximum workweek applicable to such employee under subsection (a) or in excess of the employee's normal working hours or regular working hours, as the case may be;

(6) extra compensation provided by a premium rate paid for work by the employee on Saturdays, Sundays, holidays, or regular days of rest, or on the sixth or seventh day of the workweek, where such premium rate is not less than one and one-half times the rate established in good faith for like work performed in nonovertime hours on other days; or

(7) extra compensation provided by a premium rate paid to the employee, in pursuance of an applicable employment contract or collective-bargaining agreement, for work outside of the hours established in good faith by the contract or agreement as the basic, normal, or regular workday (not exceeding eight hours) or workweek (not exceeding the maximum workweek applicable to such employee under subsection (a)), where such premium rate is not less than one and one-half times the rate established in good faith by the contract or agreement for like work performed during such workday or workweek.

[¶ 587] [Guaranteed Weekly Pay for Variable Hours]

(f) No employer shall be deemed to have violated subsection (a) by employing any employee for a workweek in excess of the maximum workweek applicable to such employee under subsection (a) if such employee is employed pursuant to a bona fide individual contract, or pursuant to an agreement made as a result of collective bargaining by representatives of employees, if the duties of such employee necessitate irregular hours of work, and the contract or agreement (1) specifies a regular rate of pay of not less than the minimum hourly rate provided in subsection (a) or (b) of section 6 (whichever may be applicable) and compensation at not less than one and one-half times such rate for all hours worked in excess of such maximum workweek, and (2) provides a weekly guaranty of pay for not more than sixty hours based on the rates so specified.

[¶ 588] [Overtime Computed on Piece, Hourly or Basic Rates]

(g) No employer shall be deemed to have violated subsection (a) by employing any employee for a workweek in excess of the maximum workweek applicable to such employee under such subsection if, pursuant to an agreement or understanding arrived at between the employer and the employee before performance of the work, the amount paid to the employee for the number of hours worked by him in such workweek in excess of the maximum workweek applicable to such employee under such subsection—

(1) in the case of an employee employed at piece rates, is computed at piece rates not less than one and one-half times the bona fide piece rates applicable to the same work when performed during nonovertime hours; or

(2) in the case of an employee performing two or more kinds of work for which different hourly or piece rates have been established, is computed at rates not less than one and one-half times such bona fide rates applicable to the same work when performed during nonovertime hours; or

(3) is computed at a rate not less than one and one-half times the rate established shall be authorized by regulation by the Secretary as being in computing overtime compensation thereunder: Provided, That the rate so established shall be authorized by regulation by the Secretary of Labor as being substantially equivalent to the average hourly earnings of the employee, exclusive of overtime premiums, in the particular work over a representative period of time; and if (i) the employee's average hourly earnings for the workweek exclusive of payments described in paragraphs (1) through (7) of subsection (e) are not less than the minimum hourly rate required by applicable law, and (ii) extra overtime compensation is properly computed and paid on other forms of additional pay required to be included in computing the regular rate.

[¶ 589] [Credits Against Overtime Pay]

(h) Extra compensation paid as described in paragraphs (5), (6), and (7) of subsection (e) shall be creditable toward overtime compensation payable pursuant to this section.

[¶ 590] [Exemption for Retail and Service Establishments]

(i) No employer shall be deemed to have violated subsection (a) by employing any employee of a retail or service establishment for a workweek in excess of the applicable workweek specified therein, if (1) the regular rate of pay of such employee is in excess of one and one-half times the minimum hourly rate applicable to him under section 6, and (2) more than half his compensation for a representative period (not less than one month) represents commissions on goods or services. In determining the proportion of compensation representing commissions, all earnings resulting from the application of a bona fide commission rate shall be deemed commissions on goods or services without regard to whether the computed commissions exceed the draw or guarantee.

1966 Amendment.—In Sec. 7(i) the last sentence was added by Sec. 402 of the FLS Amendments of 1966.

[¶ 591] [Hospital Employees]

(j) No employer engaged in the operation of a hospital shall be deemed to have violated subsection (a) if, pursuant to an agreement or understanding arrived at between the employer and the employee before performance of the work, a work period of fourteen consecutive days is accepted in lieu of the workweek of seven consecutive days for purposes of overtime computation and if, for his employment in excess of eight hours in any workday and in excess of eighty hours in such fourteen-day period, the employee receives compensation at a rate not less than one and one-half times the regular rate at which he is employed.

1966 Amendment.—Sec. 7(j) was added by Sec. 403 of the FLS Amendments of 1966.

[¶ 601] [Convening of Industry Committee]

Sec. 8. (a) The policy of this Act with respect to industries or enterprises in Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce is to reach as rapidly as is economically feasible without substantially curtailing employment the objective of a minimum wage prescribed in paragraph (1) of section 6(a) in each such industry. The Secretary shall from time to time convene an industry committee or committees, appointed pursuant to section 5, and any such industry committee shall from time to time recommend the minimum rate or rates of wages to be paid under section 6 by employers in Puerto Rico or the Virgin Islands, or in Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands, engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce or in any enterprise engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce in any such industry or classification therein. Minimum rates of wages established in accordance with this section which are not equal to the minimum wage rate prescribed in paragraph (1) of section 6(a) shall be reviewed by such a committee once during each biennial period, beginning with the biennial period commencing July 1, 1958, except that the Secretary, in his discretion, may order an additional review during any such biennial period.

[¶ 602] [Investigation of Conditions in Industry]

(b) Upon the convening of any such industry committee, the Secretary shall refer to it the question of the minimum wage rate or rates to be fixed for such industry. The industry committee shall investigate conditions in the industry and the committee, or any authorized subcommittee thereof, shall after due notice hear such witnesses and receive such evidence as may be necessary or appropriate to enable the committee to perform its duties and functions under this Act. The committee shall recommend to the Secretary the highest minimum wage rates for the industry which it determines, having due regard to economic and competitive conditions, will not substantially curtail employment in the industry, and will not give any industry in Puerto Rico or in the Virgin Islands a competitive advantage over any industry in the United States outside of Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands.

* Section 8 relates to American Samoa by reason of Section 6(a)(3) added in 1956. See ¶ 563.

[¶ 603] [Recommendations by Industry Committee]

(c) The industry committee shall recommend such reasonable classifications within any industry as it determines to be necessary for the purpose of fixing for each classification within such industry the highest minimum wage rate (not in excess of that prescribed in paragraph (1) of section 6(a)) which (1) will not substantially curtail employment in such classification and (2) will not give a competitive advantage to any group in the industry, and shall recommend for each classification in the industry the highest minimum wage rate which the committee determines will not substantially curtail employment in such classification. In determining whether such classifications should be made in any industry, in making such classifications, and in determining the minimum wage rates for such classifications, no classifications shall be made, and no minimum wage rate shall be fixed, solely on a regional basis, but the industry committee shall consider among other relevant factors the following:

(1) competitive conditions as affected by transportation, living, and production costs;

(2) the wages established for work of like or comparable character by collective labor agreements negotiated between employers and employees by representatives of their own choosing; and

(3) the wages paid for work of like or comparable character by employers who voluntarily maintain minimum wage standards in the industry.

No classification shall be made under this section on the basis of age or sex.

[¶ 604] [Recommendations Effective After Publication]

(d) The industry committee shall file with the Secretary a report containing its findings of fact and recommendations with respect to the matters referred to it. Upon the filing of such report, the Secretary shall publish such recommendations in the Federal Register and shall provide by order that the recommendations contained in such report shall take effect upon the expiration of 15 days after the date of such publication.

[¶ 605] [Contents of Orders—Effective Date]

(e) Orders issued under this section shall define the industries and classifications therein to which they are to apply, and shall contain such terms and conditions as the Secretary finds necessary to carry out the purposes of such orders, to prevent the circumvention or evasion thereof, and to safeguard the minimum wage rates established therein.

[¶ 606] [Notice of Hearing—Publication]

(f) Due notice of any hearing provided for in this section shall be given by publication in the Federal Register and by such other means as the Secretary deems reasonably calculated to give general notice to interested persons.

[¶ 610] ATTENDANCE OF WITNESSES

Sec. 9. For the purpose of any hearing or investigation provided for in this Act, the provisions of sections 9 and 10 (relating to the attendance of witnesses and the production of books, papers, and documents) of the Federal Trade Commission Act of September 26, 1914, as amended (U. S. C., 1934 edition, title 15, secs. 49 and 50), are hereby made applicable to the jurisdiction, powers, and duties of the Secretary of Labor and the industry committees.

[¶ 620] COURT REVIEW

[¶ 621] [Wage Orders for Puerto Rico, Virgin Islands and American Samoa]

Sec. 10. (a) Any person aggrieved by an order of the Secretary issued under section 8 may obtain a review of such order in the United States Court of Appeals for any circuit wherein such person resides or has his principal place of business, or in the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, by filing in such court, within 60 days after the entry of such order a written petition praying that the order of the Secretary be modified or set aside in whole or in part. A copy of such petition shall forthwith be transmitted by the clerk of the court to the Secretary, and thereupon the Secretary shall file in the court the record of the industry committee upon which the order complained of was entered, as provided in section 2112 of title 28, United States Code. Upon the filing of such petition such court shall have exclusive jurisdiction to affirm, modify, or set aside such order in whole or in part, so far as it is applicable to the petitioner. The review by the court shall be limited to questions of law, and findings of fact by such industry committee when supported by substantial evidence shall be conclusive. No objection to the order of the Secretary shall be considered by the court unless such objection shall have been urged before such industry committee or unless there were reasonable grounds for failure so to do. If application is made to the court for leave to adduce additional evidence, and it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that such additional evidence may materially affect the result of the proceeding and that there were reasonable grounds for failure to adduce such evidence in the proceedings before such industry committee, the court may order such additional evidence to be taken before an industry committee and to be adduced upon the hearing in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as to the court may seem proper. Such industry committee may modify the initial findings by reason of the additional evidence so taken, and shall file with the court such modified or new findings which if supported by substantial evidence shall be conclusive, and shall also file its recommendation, if any, for the modification or setting aside of the original order. The judgment and decree of the court shall be final, subject to review by the Supreme Court of the United States upon certiorari or certification as provided in section 1254 of title 28 of the United States Code.

[¶ 622] [Stay of Order by Filing Bond]

(b) The commencement of proceedings under subsection (a) shall not, unless specifically ordered by the court, operate as a stay of the Secretary's order. The court shall not grant any stay of the order unless the person complaining of such order shall file in court an undertaking with a surety or sureties satisfactory to the court for the payment to the employees affected by the order, in the event such order is affirmed, of the amount by which the compensation such employees are entitled to receive under the order exceeds the compensation they actually receive while such stay is in effect.

[¶ 630] INVESTIGATIONS, INSPECTIONS, RECORDS AND HOMEWORK REGULATIONS

[¶ 631] [Investigations and Inspections]

Sec. 11. (a) The Secretary of Labor or his designated representatives may investigate and gather data regarding the wages, hours, and other conditions and practices of employment in any industry subject to this Act, and may enter and inspect such places and such records (and make such transcriptions thereof), question such employees, and investigate such facts, conditions, practices, or matters as he may deem necessary or appropriate to determine whether any person has violated any provision of this Act, or which may aid in the enforcement of the provisions of this Act. Except as provided in section 12 and in subsection (b) of this section, the Secretary shall utilize the bureaus and divisions of the Department of Labor for all the investigations and inspections necessary under this section. Except as provided in section 12, the Secretary shall bring all actions under section 17 to restrain violations of this Act.

[¶ 632] [Utilization of State Agencies]

(b) With the consent and cooperation of State agencies charged with the administration of State labor laws, the Secretary of Labor may, for the purpose of carrying out his functions and duties under this Act, utilize the services of State and local agencies and their employees and, notwithstanding any other provision of law, may reimburse such State and local agencies and their employees for services rendered for such purposes.

[¶ 633] [Employer Record-Keeping Requirements]

(c) Every employer subject to any provision of this Act or of any order issued under this Act shall make, keep, and preserve such records of the persons employed by him and of the wages, hours, and other conditions and practices of employment maintained by him, and shall preserve such records for such periods of time, and shall make such reports therefrom to the Secretary as he shall prescribe by regulation or order as necessary or appropriate for the enforcement of the provisions of this Act or the regulations or orders thereunder.

[¶ 634] [Homework Regulations]

(d) The Secretary is authorized to make such regulations and orders regulating, restricting, or prohibiting industrial homework as are necessary or appropriate to prevent the circumvention or evasion of and to safeguard the minimum wage rate prescribed in this Act, and all existing regulations or orders of the Secretary relating to industrial homework are hereby continued in full force and effect.

[¶ 640] CHILD LABOR PROVISIONS

[¶ 641] ["Hot Goods" Ban—Innocent Purchasers]

Sec. 12. (a) No producer, manufacturer, or dealer shall ship or deliver for shipment in commerce any goods produced in an establishment situated in the United States in or about which within thirty days prior to the removal of such goods therefrom any oppressive child labor has been employed: Provided, That any such shipment or delivery for shipment of such goods by a purchaser who acquired them in good faith in reliance on written assurance from the producer, manufacturer, or dealer that the goods were produced in compliance with the requirements of this section, and who acquired such goods for value without notice of any such violation, shall not be deemed prohibited by this subsection: And provided further, That a prosecution and conviction of defendant for the shipment or delivery for shipment of any goods under the conditions herein prohibited shall be a bar to any further prosecution against the same defendant for shipments or deliveries for shipment of any such goods before the beginning of said prosecution.

[¶ 642] [Investigations—Actions]

(b) The Secretary of Labor, or any of his authorized representatives, shall make all investigations and inspections under section 11(a) with respect to the employment of minors, and, subject to the direction and control of the Attorney General, shall bring all actions under section 17 to enjoin any act or practice which is unlawful by reason of the existence of oppressive child labor, and shall administer all other provisions of this Act relating to oppressive child labor.

[¶ 643] [Direct Prohibition of Child Labor]

(c) No employer shall employ any oppressive child labor in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce or in any enterprise engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce.

[¶ 649] EXEMPTIONS

[¶ 650] [Minimum-Wage, Equal-Pay and Overtime-Pay Exemptions]

Sec. 13. (a) The provisions of sections 6 and 7 shall not apply with respect to—

[¶ 651] [Executive, Administrative, Professional Employees]

(1) any employee employed in a bona fide executive, administrative, or professional capacity (including any employee employed in the capacity of academic administrative personnel or teacher in elementary or secondary schools) or in the capacity of outside salesman (as such terms are defined and delimited from time to time by regulations of the Secretary, subject to the provisions of the Administrative Procedure Act, except that an employee of a retail or service establishment shall not be excluded from the definition of employee employed in a bona fide executive or administrative capacity because of the number of hours in his workweek which he devotes to activities not directly or closely related to the performance of executive or administrative activities, if less than 40 per centum of his hours worked in the workweek are devoted to such activities); or 1966 Amendment. — Sec. 13(a)(1) was amended by Sec. 214 of the FLS Amendments of 1966 to add "(including any employee employed in the capacity of academic administrative personnel or teacher in elementary or secondary schools)".

[¶ 652] [Retail or Service Establishments]

(2) any employee employed by any retail or service establishment (except an establishment or employee engaged in laundering, cleaning, or repairing clothing or fabrics or an establishment engaged in the operation of a hospital, institution, or school described in section 3(s)(4)), if more than 50 per centum of such establishment's annual dollar volume of sales of goods or services is made within the State in which the establishment is located, and such establishment is not in an enterprise described in section 3(s) or such establishment has an annual dollar volume of sales which is less than $250,000 (exclusive of excise taxes at the retail level which are separately stated). A "retail or service establishment" shall mean an establishment 75 per centum of whose annual dollar volume of sales of goods or services (or of both) is not for resale and is recognized as retail sales or services in the particular industry; or

1966 Amendment.—Sec. 13(a)(2) was amended by Sec. 201(a) of the FLS Amendments of 1966. Prior to amendment it read as follows:

"(2) any employee employed by any retail or service establishment, more than 50 per centum of which establishment's annual dollar volume of sales of goods or services is made within the State in which the establishment is located, if such establishment—

"(i) is not in an enterprise described in section 3(s), or

"(ii) is in such an enterprise and is a hotel, motel, restaurant, motion picture theater; or is an amusement or recreational establishment that operates on a seasonal basis, or

"(iii) is in such an enterprise and is a hospital, or an institution which is primarily engaged in the care of the sick, the aged, the mentally ill or defective, residing on the premises of such institution, or a school for physically or mentally handicapped or gifted children, or

"(iv) is in such an enterprise and has an annual dollar volume of sales (exclusive of excise taxes at the retail level which are separately stated) which is less than $250,000.

"A 'retail or service establishment' shall mean an establishment 75 per centum of whose annual dollar volume of sales of goods or services (or of both) is not for resale and is recognized as retail sales or services in the particular industry; or"

[¶ 653] [Amusement or Recreational Establishment]

(3) any employee employed by an establishment which is an amusement or recreational establishment, if (A) it does not operate for more than seven months in any calendar year, or (B) during the preceding calendar year, its average receipts for any six months of such year were not more than 33⅓ per centum of its average receipts for the other six months of such year; or 1966 Amendment.—Sec. 13(a)(3) was added by Sec. 201(b)(2) of the FLS Amendments of 1966. A similar exemption previously appeared in Sec. 13(a)(2)(ii).

[¶ 654] [Manufacturing Retailers]

(4) any employee employed by an establishment which qualifies as an exempt retail establishment under clause (2) of this subsection and is recognized as a retail establishment in the particular industry notwithstanding that such establishment makes or processes at the retail establishment the goods that it sells: Provided, That more than 85 per centum of such establishment's annual dollar volume of sales of goods so made or processed is made within the State in which the establishment is located; or

[¶ 655] [Fishing and Seafood]

(5) any employee employed in the catching, taking, propagating, harvesting, cultivating, or farming of any kind of fish, shellfish, crustacea, sponges, seaweeds, or other aquatic forms of animal and vegetable life, or in the first processing, canning or packing such marine products at sea as an incident to, or in conjunction with, such fishing operations, including the going to and returning from work and loading and unloading when performed by any such employee; or

(6) any employee employed in agriculture (A) if such employee is employed by an employer who did not, during any calendar quarter during the preceding calendar year, use more than five hundred man-days of agricultural labor, (B) if such employee is the parent, spouse, child, or other member of his employer's immediate family, (C) if such employee (i) is employed as a hand harvest laborer and is paid on a piece rate basis in an operation which has been, and is customarily and generally recognized as having been, paid on a piece rate basis in the region of employment, (ii) commutes daily from his permanent residence to the farm on which he is so employed, and (iii) has been employed in agriculture less than thirteen weeks during the preceding calendar year, (D) if such employee (other than an employee described in clause (C) of this subsection) (i) is sixteen years of age or under and is employed as a hand harvest laborer, is paid on a piece rate basis in an operation which has been, and is customarily and generally recognized as having been, paid on a piece rate basis in the region of employment, (ii) is employed on the same farm as his parent or person standing in the place of his parent, and (iii) is paid at the same piece rate as employees over age sixteen are paid on the same farm, or (E) if such employee is principally engaged in the range production of livestock; or

1966 Amendment.—Sec. 13(a)(6) was amended by Sec. 203(a) of the FLS Amendments of 1966. Prior to amendment it read as follows:

(6) any employee employed in agriculture or in connection with the operation or maintenance of ditches, canals, reservoirs, or waterways, not owned or operated for profit, or operated on a share-crop basis, and which are used exclusively for supply and storing of water for agricultural purposes; or

[¶ 657] [Learners, Apprentices, Students, and Handicapped Workers]

(7) any employee to the extent that such employee is exempted by regulation, order, or certificate of the Secretary issued under section 14; or 1966 Amendment. — Sec. 13(a)(7) was amended by Sec. 215(c) of the FLS Amendments of 1966 by adding the words "or certificate".

[¶ 658] [Local Newspapers]

(8) any employee employed in connection with the publication of any weekly, semiweekly, or daily newspaper with a circulation of less than four thousand the major part of which circulation is within the county where published or counties contiguous thereto; or

1966 Amendment.—Sec. 13(a)(8) was amended by Sec. 205 of the FLS Amendments of 1966 by inserting "where published" in lieu of "where printed and published."

[¶ 659] [Motion Picture Theater Employees]

(9) any employee employed by an establishment which is a motion picture theater; or 1966 Amendment.—Sec. 13(a)(9) was added by Sec. 207 of the FLS Amendments of 1966. A similar exemption previously appeared in Sec. 13(a)(2)(ii).

[¶ 660] [Switchboard Operators]

(10) any switchboard operator employed by an independently owned public telephone company which has not more than seven hundred and fifty stations; or

[¶ 661] [Telegraph Message Service]

(11) any employee or proprietor in a retail or service establishment which qualifies as an exempt retail or service establishment under clause (2) of this subsection with respect to whom the provisions of sections 6 and 7 would not otherwise apply, engaged in handling telegraphic messages for the public under an agency or contract arrangement with a telegraph company where the telegraph message revenue of such agency does not exceed $500 a month; or

[¶ 662] [Seamen on Non-American Vessels]

(12) any employee employed as a seaman on a vessel other than an American vessel; or

[¶ 663] [Forestry and Logging Operations]

(13) any employee employed in planting or tending trees, cruising, surveying, or felling timber, or in preparing or transporting logs or other forestry products to the mill, processing plant, railroad, or other transportation terminal, if the number of employees employed by his employer in such forestry or lumbering operations does not exceed eight; or 1966 Amendment.—Sec. 13(a)(13) was amended by Sec. 208 of the FLS Amendments of 1966 by inserting "eight" in lieu of "twelve".

(14) any agricultural employee employed in the growing and harvesting of shade-grown tobacco who is engaged in the processing (including, but not limited to, drying, curing, fermenting, bulking, rebulking, sorting, grading, aging, and baling) of such tobacco, prior to the stemming process, for use as cigar wrapper tobacco.

[¶ 680] [Overtime-Pay Exemptions]

(b) The provisions of section 7 shall not apply with respect to—

[¶ 681] [Motor Carriers]

(1) any employee with respect to whom the Secretary of Transportation has power to establish qualifications and maximum hours of service pursuant to the provisions of section 204 of the Motor Carrier Act, 1935; or

[¶ 682] [Railroads, Express Companies, Pipeline and Water Carriers]

(2) any employee of an employer subject to the provisions of part I of the Interstate Commerce Act; or

[¶ 683] [Air Carriers]

(3) any employee of a carrier by air subject to the provisions of title II of the Railway Labor Act; or

[¶ 684] [Seafood Processing]

(4) any employee employed in the canning, processing, marketing, freezing, curing, storing, packing for shipment, or distributing of any kind of fish, shellfish, or other aquatic forms of animal or vegetable life, or any byproduct thereof; or

[¶ 685] [Buyers of Poultry and Dairy Products]

(5) any individual employed as an outside buyer of poultry, eggs, cream, or milk, in their raw or natural state; or

[¶ 686] [Seamen]

(6) any employee employed as a seaman; or

[¶ 687] [Local Transportation]

(7) any driver, operator, or conductor employed by an employer engaged in the business of operating a street, suburban or interurban electric railway, or local trolley or motorbus carrier, if the rates and services of such railway or carrier are subject to regulation by a State or local agency; or

1966 Amendment.—Sec. 13(b)(7) was amended by Sec. 206(c) of the FLS Amendments of 1966. Prior to amendment, it read as follows:

"(7) any employee of a street, suburban, or interurban electric railway, or local trolley or motorbus carrier; or"

[¶ 688] [Hotel, Motel, Restaurant or Nursing Home]

(8) any employee employed by an establishment which is a hotel, motel, or restaurant; or any employee who (A) is employed by an establishment which is an institution (other than a hospital) primarily engaged in the care of the sick, the aged, or the mentally ill or defective who reside on the premises, and (B) receives compensation for employment in excess of forty-eight hours in any workweek at a rate not less than one and one-half times the regular rate at which he is employed; or 1966 Amendment.—Sec. 13(b)(8) was added by Sec. 201(b)(1) of the FLS Amendments of 1966. A similar exemption previously appeared in Sec. 13(a)(2)(ii).

[¶ 689] [Radio and Television Employees]

(9) any employee employed as an announcer, news editor, or chief engineer by a radio or television station the major studio of which is located (A) in a city or town of one hundred thousand population or less, according to the latest available decennial census figures as compiled by the Bureau of the Census, except where such city or town is part of a standard metropolitan statistical area, as defined and designated by the Bureau of the Budget, which has a total population in excess of one hundred thousand, or (B) in a city or town of twenty-five thousand population or less, which is part of such an area but is at least 40 airline miles from the principal city in such area; or

[¶ 690] [Automobile, Aircraft, and Farm Implement Sales]

(10) any salesman, partsman, or mechanic primarily engaged in selling or servicing automobiles, trailers, trucks, farm implements, or aircraft if employed by a nonmanufacturing establishment primarily engaged in the business of selling such vehicles to ultimate purchasers; or 1966 Amendment.—Sec. 13(b)(10), which is similar to the wording that formerly appeared in Sec. 13(a)(19), was added by Sec. 209(b) of the FLS Amendments of 1966.

[¶ 691] [Local Truck Deliveries]

(11) any employee employed as a driver or driver's helper making local deliveries, who is compensated for such employment on the basis of trip rates, or other delivery payment plan, if the Secretary shall find that such plan has the general purpose and effect of reducing hours worked by such employees to, or below, the maximum workweek applicable to them under section 7(a); or

[¶ 692] [Agriculture—Irrigation Projects]

(12) any employee employed in agriculture or in connection with the operation or maintenance of ditches, canals, reservoirs, or waterways, not owned or operated for profit, or operated on a sharecrop basis, and which are used exclusively for supply and storing of water for agricultural purposes; or

1966 Amendment.—Sec. 13(b)(12), which formerly appeared as Sec. 13(a)(6), was added by Sec. 203(c)(B) of the FLS Amendments of 1966.

(13) any employee with respect to his employment in agriculture by a farmer, notwithstanding other employment of such employee in connection with livestock auction operations in which such farmer is engaged as an adjunct to the raising of livestock, either on his own account or in conjunction with other farmers, if such employee (A) is primarily employed during his workweek in agriculture by such farmer, and (B) is paid for his employment in connection with such livestock auction operations at a wage rate not less than that prescribed by section 6(a)(1); or

1966 Amendment.—Sec. 13(b)(13), which formerly appeared as Sec. 13(a)(16), was added by Sec. 203(c)(B) of the FLS Amendments of 1966.

[¶ 694] [Country Elevator Employees]

(14) any employee employed within the area of production (as defined by the Secretary) by an establishment commonly recognized as a country elevator, including such an establishment which sells products and services used in the operation of a farm, if no more than five employees are employed in the establishment in such operations; or

1966 Amendment.—Sec. 13(b)(14), which formerly appeared as Sec. 13(a)(17), was added by Sec. 204(b) of the FLS Amendments of 1966.

[¶ 695] [Cotton Ginning and Sugar Processing Employees]

(15) any employee engaged in ginning of cotton for market, in any place of employment located in a county where cotton is grown in commercial quantities, or in the processing of sugar beets, sugar-beet molasses, sugarcane, or maple sap, into sugar (other than refined sugar) or syrup; or

1966 Amendment. — Sec. 13(b)(15) was added by Sec. 204(b) of the FLS Amendments of 1966. Similar wording previously appeared in Secs. 7(c) and 13(a)(18).

[¶ 696] [Fruit and Vegetable Transportation Employees]

(16) any employee engaged (A) in the transportation and preparation for transportation of fruits or vegetables, whether or not performed by the farmer, from the farm to a place of first processing or first marketing within the same State, or (B) in transportation, whether or not performed by the farmer, between the farm and any point within the same State of persons employed or to be employed in the harvesting of fruits or vegetables; or

1966 Amendment.—Sec. 13(b)(16), which formerly appeared as Sec. 13(a)(22), was added by Sec. 204(b) of the FLS Amendments of 1966.

(17) any driver employed by an employer engaged in the business of operating taxicabs; or 1966 Amendment.—Sec. 13(b)(17), which has wording similar to that contained in former Sec. 13(a)(12), was added by Sec. 206(b)(2) of the FLS Amendments of 1966.

[¶ 698] [Food Service Employees]

(18) any employee of a retail or service establishment who is employed primarily in connection with the preparation or offering of food or beverages for human consumption, either on the premises, or by such services as catering, banquet, box lunch, or curb or counter service, to the public, to employees, or to members or guests of members of clubs; or

1966 Amendment.—Sec. 13(b)(18), which formerly appeared as Sec. 13(a)(20), was added by Sec. 210(b) of the FLS Amendments of 1966.

[¶ 699] [Bowling Establishments]

(19) any employee of a bowling establishment if such employee receives compensation for employment in excess of forty-eight hours in any workweek at a rate not less than one and one-half times the regular rate at which he is employed.

1966 Amendment.—Sec. 13(b)(19) was added by Sec. 210(b) of the FLS Amendments of 1966.

[¶ 710] [Child-Labor Exemptions]

(c)(1) Except as provided in paragraph (2), the provisions of section 12 relating to child labor shall not apply with respect to any employee employed in agriculture outside of school hours for the school district where such employee is living while he is so employed.

(2) The provisions of section 12 relating to child labor shall apply to an employee below the age of sixteen employed in agriculture in an occupation that the Secretary of Labor finds and declares to be particularly hazardous for the employment of children below the age of sixteen, except where such employee is employed by his parent or by a person standing in the place of his parent on a farm owned or operated by such parent or person.

(3) The provisions of section 12 relating to child labor shall not apply to any child employed as an actor or performer in motion pictures or theatrical productions, or in radio or television productions.

1966 Amendment.—Sec. 13(c) was amended to read as above by Sec. 203(d) of the FLS Amendments of 1966. Prior to amendment, it read as follows:

"(c) The provisions of section 12 relating to child labor shall not apply with respect to any employee employed in agriculture outside of school hours for the school district where such employee is living while he is so employed, or to any child employed as an actor or performer in motion pictures or theatrical productions, or in radio or television productions."

[¶ 711] [Newsboys and Wreath Production—Minimum Wage, Overtime Pay and Child-Labor Exemptions]

(d) The provisions of sections 6, 7, and 12 shall not apply with respect to any employee engaged in the delivery of newspaper to the consumer or to any homeworker engaged in the making of wreaths composed principally of natural holly, pine, cedar, or other evergreens (including the harvesting of the evergreens or other forest products used in making such wreaths).

[¶ 712] [Overtime-Pay Exemption for American Samoa]

(e) The provisions of section 7 shall not apply with respect to employees for whom the Secretary of Labor is authorized to establish minimum wage rates as provided in section 6(a)(3), except with respect to employees for whom such rates are in effect; and with respect to such employees the Secretary may make rules and regulations providing reasonable limitations and allowing reasonable variations, tolerances, and exemptions to and from any or all of the provisions of section 7 if he shall find, after a public hearing on the matter, and taking into account the factors set forth in section 6(a)(3), that economic conditions warrant such action.

[¶ 713] [Exemption for Certain Overseas Employment]

(f) The provisions of sections 6, 7, 11, and 12 shall not apply with respect to any employee whose services during the workweek are performed in a workplace within a foreign country or within territory under the jurisdiction of the United States other than the following: a State of the United States; the District of Columbia; Puerto Rico; the Virgin Islands; outer Continental Shelf lands defined in the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act (ch. 345, 67 Stat. 462); American Samoa; Guam; Wake Island; Eniwetok Atoll; Kwajalein Atoll; Johnston Island; and the Canal Zone.

1966 Amendment.—Sec. 13(f) was amended by Sec. 213 of the FLS Amendments of 1966 by adding the words "Eniwetok Atoll; Kwajalein Atoll; Johnston Island."

[¶ 721] Authority of Secretary of Labor

Sec. 14. (a) The Secretary of Labor, to the extent necessary in order to prevent curtailment of opportunities for employment, shall by regulations or by orders provide for the employment of learners, of apprentices, and of messengers employed primarily in delivering letters and messages, under special certificates issued pursuant to regulations of the Secretary, at such wages lower than the minimum wage applicable under section 6 and subject to such limitations as to time, number, proportion, and length of service as the Secretary shall prescribe.

1966 Amendment.—Sec. 14(a) was amended to read as above by Sec. 501 of the FLS Amendments of 1966. Prior to amendment it read:

"The Secretary of Labor, to the extent necessary in order to prevent curtailment of opportunities for employment, shall by regulations or by orders provide for (1) the employment of learners, of apprentices, of messengers employed primarily in delivering letters and messages and of full-time students outside of their school hours in any retail or service establishment: Provided, That such employment is not of the type ordinarily given to a full-time employee, under special certificates issued pursuant to regulations of the Secretary, at such wages lower than the minimum wage applicable under section 6 and subject to such limitations as to time, number, proportion, and length of service as the Secretary shall prescribe, and (2) the employment of individuals whose earning capacity is impaired by age or physical or mental deficiency or injury, under special certificates issued by the Secretary, at such wages lower than the minimum wage applicable under section 6 and for such period as shall be fixed in such certificates."

[¶ 722] [Students in Retail or Service Establishments]

(b) The Secretary, to the extent necessary in order to prevent curtailment of opportunities for employment, shall by regulation or order provide for the employment of full-time students, regardless of age but in compliance with applicable child labor laws, on a part-time basis in retail or service establishments (not to exceed twenty hours in any workweek) or on a part-time or a full-time basis in such establishments during school vacations, under special certificates issued pursuant to regulations of the Secretary, at a wage rate not less than 85 per centum of the minimum wage applicable under section 6, except that the proportion of student hours of employment to total hours of employment of all employees in any establishment may not exceed (1) such proportion for the corresponding month of the twelve-month period preceding May 1, 1961, (2) in the case of a retail or service establishment whose employees (other than employees engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce) are covered by this Act for the first time on or after the effective date of the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1966, such proportion for the corresponding month of the twelve-month period immediately prior to such date, or (3) in the case of a retail or service establishment coming into existence after May 1, 1961, or a retail or service establishment for which records of student hours worked are not available, a proportion of student hours of employment to total hours of employment of all employees based on the practice during the twelve-month period preceding May 1, 1961, in (A) similar establishments of the same employer in the same general metropolitan area in which the new establishment is located, (B) similar establishments of the same employer in the same or nearby counties if the new establishment is not in a metropolitan area, or (C) other establishments of the same general character operating in the community or the nearest comparable community. Before the Secretary may issue a certificate under this subsection he must find that such employment will not create a substantial probability of reducing the full-time employment opportunities of persons other than those employed under this subsection.

(c) The Secretary, to the extent necessary in order to prevent curtailment of opportunities for employment, shall by certificate or order provide for the employment of full-time students, regardless of age but in compliance with applicable child labor laws, on a part-time basis in agriculture (not to exceed twenty hours in any workweek) or on a part-time or a full-time basis in agriculture during school vacations, at a wage rate not less than 85 per centum of the minimum wage applicable under section 6. Before the Secretary may issue a certificate or order under this subsection he must find that such employment will not create a substantial probability of reducing the full-time employment opportunities of persons other than those employed under this subsection.

1966 Amendment.—Sec. 14(c) was added by Sec. 501 of the FLS Amendments of 1966.

(d)(1) Except as otherwise provided in paragraphs (2) and (3) of this subsection, the Secretary of Labor, to the extent necessary in order to prevent curtailment of opportunities for employment, shall by regulation or order provide for the employment under special certificates of individuals (including individuals employed in agriculture) whose earning or productive capacity is impaired by age or physical or mental deficiency or injury, at wages which are lower than the minimum wage applicable under section 6 of this Act but not less than 50 per centum of such wage and which are commensurate with those paid nonhandicapped workers in industry in the vicinity for essentially the same type, quality, and quantity of work.

(2) The Secretary, pursuant to such regulations as he shall prescribe and upon certification of the State agency administering or supervising the administration of vocational rehabilitation services, may issue special certificates for the employment of—

(A) handicapped workers engaged in work which is incidental to training or evaluation programs, and

(B) multihandicapped individuals and other individuals whose earning capacity is so severely impaired that they are unable to engage in competitive employment, at wages which are less than those required by this subsection and which are related to the worker's productivity.

(3)(A) The Secretary may by regulation or order provide for the employment of handicapped clients in work activities centers under special certificates at wages which are less than the minimums applicable under section 6 of this Act or prescribed by paragraph (1) of this subsection and which constitute equitable compensation for such clients in work activities centers.

(B) For purposes of this section, the term "work activities centers" shall mean centers planned and designed exclusively to provide therapeutic activities for handicapped clients whose physical or mental impairment is so severe as to make their productive capacity inconsequential.

1966 Amendment.—Sec. 14(d) was added by Sec. 501 of the FLS Amendments of 1966.

[¶ 731] [Unlawful Activities]

Sec. 15. (a) After the expiration of one hundred and twenty days from the date of enactment of this [original] Act, it shall be unlawful for any person—

(1) to transport, offer for transportation, ship, deliver, or sell in commerce, or to ship, deliver, or sell with knowledge that shipment or delivery or sale thereof in commerce is intended, any goods in the production of which any employee was employed in violation of section 6 or section 7, or in violation of any regulation or order of the Secretary issued under section 14; except that no provision of this Act shall impose any liability upon any common carrier for the transportation in commerce in the regular course of its business of any goods not produced by such common carrier, and no provision of this Act shall excuse any common carrier from its obligation to accept any goods for transportation; and except that any such transportation, offer, shipment, delivery, or sale of such goods by a purchaser who acquired them in good faith in reliance on written assurance from the producer that the goods were produced in compliance with the requirements of the Act, and who acquired such goods for value without notice of any such violation, shall not be deemed unlawful;

(2) to violate any of the provisions of section 6 or section 7, or any of the provisions of any regulation or order by the Secretary issued under section 14;

(3) to discharge or in any other manner discriminate against any employee because such employee has filed any complaint or instituted or caused to be instituted any proceeding under or related to this Act, or has testified or is about to testify in any such proceeding, or has served or is about to serve on an industry committee;

(4) to violate any of the provisions of section 12;

(5) to violate any of the provisions of section 11(c) or any regulation or order made or continued in effect under the provisions of section 11(d), or to make any statement, report, or record filed or kept pursuant to the provisions of such section or of any regulation or order thereunder, knowing such statement, report, or record to be false in a material respect.

[¶ 732] [Employment as Prima Facie Evidence]

(b) For the purposes of subsection (a)(1) proof that any employee was employed in any place of employment where goods shipped or sold in commerce were produced, within ninety days prior to the removal of the goods from such place of employment shall be prima facie evidence that such employee was engaged in the production of such goods.

[¶ 740] PENALTIES; CIVIL AND CRIMINAL LIABILITY; WAIVER OF CLAIMS; ACTIONS BY SECRETARY; LIMITATION OF ACTIONS

[¶ 741] [Criminal Actions]

Sec. 16. (a) Any person who willfully violates any of the provisions of section 15 shall upon conviction thereof be subject to a fine of not more than $10,000, or to imprisonment for not more than six months, or both. No person shall be imprisoned under this subsection except for an offense committed after the conviction of such person for a prior offense under this subsection.

[¶ 742] [Wage Suits by Employees]

(b) Any employer who violates the provisions of section 6 or section 7 of this Act shall be liable to the employee or employees affected in the amount of their unpaid minimum wages, or their unpaid overtime compensation, as the case may be, and in an additional equal amount as liquidated damages. Action to recover such liability may be maintained in any court of competent jurisdiction by any one or more employees for and in behalf of himself or themselves and other employees similarly situated. No employee shall be a party plaintiff to any such action unless he gives his consent in writing to become such a party and such consent is filed in the court in which such action is brought. The court in such action shall, in addition to any judgment awarded to the plaintiff or plaintiffs, allow a reasonable attorney's fee to be paid by the defendant, and costs of the action. The right provided by this subsection to bring an action by or on behalf of any employee, and the right of any employee to become a party plaintiff to any such action, shall terminate upon the filing of a complaint by the Secretary of Labor in an action under section 17 in which restraint is sought of any further delay in the payment of unpaid minimum wages, or the amount of unpaid overtime compensation, as the case may be, owing to such employee under section 6 or section 7 of this Act by an employer liable therefor under the provisions of this subsection.

(c) The Secretary is authorized to supervise the payment of the unpaid minimum wages or the unpaid overtime compensation owing to any employee or employees under section 6 or section 7 of this Act, and the agreement of any employee to accept such payment shall upon payment in full constitute a waiver by such employee of any right he may have under subsection (b) of this section to such unpaid minimum wages or unpaid overtime compensation and an additional equal amount as liquidated damages. When a written request is filed by any employee with the Secretary claiming unpaid minimum wages or unpaid overtime compensation under section 6 or section 7 of this Act, the Secretary may bring an action in any court of competent jurisdiction to recover the amount of such claim: Provided, That this authority to sue shall not be used by the Secretary in any case involving an issue of law which has not been settled finally by the courts, and in any such case no court shall have jurisdiction over such action or proceeding initiated or brought by the Secretary if it does involve any issue of law not so finally settled. The consent of any employee to the bringing of any such action by the Secretary, unless such action is dismissed without prejudice on motion of the Secretary, shall constitute a waiver by such employee of any right of action he may have under subsection (b) of this section for such unpaid minimum wages or unpaid overtime compensation and an additional equal amount as liquidated damages. Any sums thus recovered by the Secretary on behalf of an employee pursuant to this subsection shall be held in a special deposit account and shall be paid, on order of the Secretary, directly to the employee or employees affected. Any such sums not paid to an employee because of inability to do so within a period of three years shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts. In determining when an action is commenced by the Secretary under this subsection for the purposes of the statutes of limitations provided in section 6(a) of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947, it shall be considered to be commenced in the case of any individual claimant on the date when the complaint is filed if he is specifically named as a party plaintiff in the complaint, or if his name did not so appear, on the subsequent date on which his name is added as a party plaintiff in such action.

1966 Amendment. — Sec. 16(c) was amended by Sec. 601(a) to insert the word "statutes" in lieu of "two-year statute".

[¶ 744] [Relief from Liability for Employers in American Samoa and Other Overseas Areas]

(d) In any action or proceeding commenced prior to, on, or after the date of enactment of this subsection [ch. 1035, 70 Stat. 1118, effective August 8, 1956], no employer shall be subject to any liability or punishment under this Act or the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947 on account of his failure to comply with any provision or provisions of such Acts (1) with respect to work heretofore or hereafter performed in a workplace to which the exemption in section 13(f) is applicable, (2) with respect to work performed in Guam, the Canal Zone, or Wake Island before the effective date of this amendment of subsection (d), or (3) with respect to work performed in a possession named in section 6(a)(3) at any time prior to the establishment by the Secretary, as provided therein, of a minimum wage rate applicable to such work.

[¶ 750] INJUNCTION PROCEEDINGS

Sec. 17. The district courts, together with the United States District Court for the District of the Canal Zone, the District Court of the Virgin Islands, and the District Court of Guam shall have jurisdiction, for cause shown, to restrain violations of section 15, including in the case of violations of section 15(a)(2) the restraint of any withholding of payment of minimum wages or overtime compensation found by the court to be due to employees under this Act (except sums which employees are barred from recovering, at the time of the commencement of the action to restrain the violations, by virtue of the provisions of section 6 of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947).

[¶ 760] RELATION TO OTHER LAWS

[¶ 761] [Compliance with Stricter Laws]

Sec. 18. (a) No provision of this Act or of any order thereunder shall excuse noncompliance with any Federal or State law or municipal ordinance establishing a minimum wage higher than the minimum wage established under this Act or a maximum workweek lower than the maximum workweek established under this Act, and no provision of this Act relating to the employment of child labor shall justify noncompliance with any Federal or State law or municipal ordinance establishing a higher standard than the standard established under this Act. No provision of this Act shall justify any employer in reducing a wage paid by him which is in excess of the applicable minimum wage under this Act, or justify any employer in increasing hours of employment maintained by him which are shorter than the maximum hours applicable under this Act.

(b) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act (other than section 13(f)) or any other law, any employee—

(1) described in paragraph (7) of section 202 of the Classification Act of 1949 (5 U. S. C. 1082(7)) whose compensation is required to be fixed and adjusted from time to time as nearly as is consistent with the public interest in accordance with prevailing rates, and any Federal employee in the Canal Zone engaged in employment of the kind described in such paragraph (7), or

(2) described in section 7474 of title 10, United States Code, whose rates of wages are established to conform, as nearly as is consistent with the public interest, with those of private establishments in the immediate vicinity, or shall have his basic compensation fixed or adjusted at a wage rate which is not less than the appropriate wage rate provided for in section 6(a)(1) of this Act (except that the wage rate provided for in section 6(b) shall apply to any employee who performed services during the workweek in a work place within the Canal Zone), and shall have his overtime compensation set at an hourly rate not less than the overtime rate provided for in section 7(a)(1) of this Act.

(3) employed in a nonappropriated fund instrumentality under the jurisdiction of the Armed Forces,

1966 Amendment.—Sec. 18(b) was added by Sec. 306 of the FLS Amendments of 1966.

[¶ 770] SEPARABILITY OF PROVISIONS

Sec. 19. If any provision of this Act or the application of such provision to any person or circumstance is held invalid, the remainder of the Act and the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

FOR RELEASE
WEDNESDAY
DECEMBER 14, 1966

WHAT HAPPENED IN THE SOUTH, 1966

Despite the much-publicized evidence of "white backlash" in the 1966 November elections, the growing Negro vote proved itself a major factor in elections across the South.

This was the finding in a post-election survey conducted during November by the Voter Education Project of the Southern Regional Council.

Election results gathered by VEP in 11 Southern states show that Negroes supplied the winning margin for a U. S. senator, one and probably two governors, and at least two U. S. House members.

In addition, Negro voters helped throw the two party nominees in the Georgia governor's race into a deadlock. And they helped a Senate newcomer to outpoll an established political name in separate Senate races in Virginia.

Twenty Negroes were elected to state legislatures in the South---an increase of nine. And Negroes were elected to county-level posts---in one case, to the office of sheriff---in such Deep South states as Georgia, Louisiana, Alabama and Mississippi.

The Negro vote clearly provided the margin for Winthrop Rockefeller's election as governor of Arkansas. The Republican candidate received approximately 300,000 votes. The Democratic candidate, ardent segregationist Jim Johnson, got about 255,000 votes.

An estimated 80,000 to 90,000 Negroes voted, more than 90 per cent of them for Rockefeller. Thus Negroes supplied Rockefeller's margin of 45,000, with plenty to spare.

Negro registration in Arkansas is estimated at between 115,000 and 120,000. If the turnout is put at 80,000, which VEP sources say would be a conservative figure, this would be two thirds of the registration.

Negro voters in South Carolina plainly provided the margin for a U. S. senator and probably for a governor.

Ernest F. (Fritz) Hollings was elected to the Senate over Republican candidate Marshall J. Parker by a mere 12,000 votes. Gov. Robert E. McNair defeated Republican challenger Joseph O. Rogers, Jr. by a more comfortable 72,000 votes.

The Negro turnout was estimated at 100,000---just over half the Negro registration of 191,000. The Negro vote went almost totally Democratic.

Bucking the tide was Sen. Strom Thurmond, a Republican who won reelection by over 100,000 votes despite the solidly Democratic Negro vote.

All the same, wrote one Carolina newsman: "One, and only one, general conclusion appears possible: Neither party can win statewide or congressional races in South Carolina without Negro voting support."

Commenting on his race, Hollings said Parker "generated the Negro bloc vote, insulted them on the basis that they could be bought" and thus "corralled them into my corner."

In North Carolina's Fifth Congressional District, Negroes provided the victory margin for Democrat Nick Galifianakis over Republican G. Fred Steele, Jr. Returns from eight predominantly Negro precincts in Forsyth County gave Galifianakis 5,156 votes to Steele's 284. Four predominantly Negro precincts in Durham County gave Galifianakis 2,400 and Steele 163. Galifianakis won by 5,300 votes.

WHAT HAPPENED IN THE SOUTH, 1966 -- 3.

In the Sixth Congressional District, Rep. Horace R. Kornegay found himself in a tight race as Greensboro Negroes switched their support on election eve to Republican Richard B. Barnwell. Kornegay, considered a solid favorite, had his victory margin trimmed to fewer than 2,700 votes. Kornegay has voted consistently against civil rights and Great Society programs.

Negroes provided the margin for Democrat Ray Blanton over Republican Julius Hurst in West Tennessee's Seventh Congressional District. Blanton won by about 2,700 votes, despite the fact that the district went for Republican Howard Baker in the U. S. Senate race by 3,000 votes. Nine predominantly Negro precincts in Memphis gave Blanton 7,824 votes to Hurst's 353.

Baker sought Negro support in his race against Democrat Frank Clement and thus cut into the latter's vote total across the state. Baker won decisively by 100,000 votes. Clement had edged Sen. Ross Bass in the Democratic primary by drawing away some Negro support from Bass in a close contest.

In Memphis, in the Ninth Congressional District, redistricting and a non-presidential year drop-off in the Negro turnout caused Rep. George W. Grider to lose to conservative Republican Dan Kuykendall. Grider lost by 4,000 votes.

Six Negroes were elected to the Tennessee Legislature ---an increase of five. Three are from Memphis, two from Nashville, and one from Knoxville. The latter was the only Democrat elected to Knox County's eight-man legislative delegation.

Returns from selected precincts indicated that about half of Georgia's 300,000 registered Negroes voted. Their votes were split about evenly between Republican Howard (Bo) Callaway and write-in candidate Ellis Arnall. Reports indicate that thousands of write-in votes were not counted because of misspellings and other technicalities.

Arch-segregationist Democrat Lester Maddox received a scattering of Negro votes. In some areas he was the beneficiary of straight-party voting, as was Mrs. Wallace in Alabama.

Neither Callaway nor Maddox received the required majority, and the whole issue immediately landed in the courts. Callaway got 451,032 votes and Maddox 448,598, with the Arnall write-in campaign receiving 57,832. However, Arnall leaders contended that only about half the write-in votes actually got counted and reported.

Negroes won 11 seats in the Georgia Legislature---an increase of one. The new legislator is from Augusta. The total includes Julian Bond of Atlanta, who again was elected to the seat that had been denied him by the Georgia House.

Negro county commission candidates were elected in Liberty, McIntosh and Hancock counties. In addition, a Negro was elected to the school board in Hancock County, which in the general election became the first Georgia county to have federal poll watchers.

Three Negroes were elected to the Legislature in Texas ---two in Houston and one in Dallas. One, Miss Barbara Jordan, a Houston attorney, was elected to the Senate. They are the first Negroes to be elected to the Texas Legislature in this century.

Alabama Negroes, faced with choosing between two segregationists who were the major candidates in the governor's race, did not turn out as heavily as they did in the May primaries. Returns from selected precincts and counties indicate that, in most cases, the Negro turnout was less than half the registration. The May 3 turnout was estimated at 74 per cent. Negro registration in Alabama stands at just under 250,000.

With no clear choice to make between the two major candidates, Negroes divided their votes between Democrat Lurleen Wallace, Republican Jim Martin, and independent Carl Robinson. Mrs. Wallace, wife of Alabama's stormy outgoing governor, was an easy winner with more than 500,000 votes. Martin polled 252,000 votes and Robinson 46,000. In some areas Martin ran ahead in predominantly Negro boxes and in others Mrs. Wallace did. But in many cases, the front-runner among Negroes was the third candidate, Robinson.

In the Senate race, Negroes voted heavily for Sen. John Sparkman over Republican John Grenier. Sparkman won handily, 482,000 to 313,000.

Five Negroes were elected to office in Black Belt counties. Among them was Lucius Amerson, who turned back a write-in effort to be elected sheriff of Macon County.

In Dallas County, meanwhile, Sheriff Jim Clark's write-in campaign also failed. Clark, one of the nation's better-known segregationists, had been defeated in the May primaries by Wilson Baker, who had the help of Negro votes. Baker narrowly defeated Clark's general election write-in try.

In Lowndes County, an outnumbered but unified white vote prevailed over the independent Lowndes County Freedom Party ("Black Panther") slate. A light Negro turn-out and the fact that some Negroes voted for white candidates contributed to the defeat of the "Black Panther" slate. A 53-year-old Negro was assaulted in Lowndes, it was reported, as he waited to pick up an election clerk. There were charges that intimidation kept some Negroes from voting.

State Senator William B. Spong coasted to an easy victory in one of two Virginia contests for the U. S. Senate. Spong amassed about 425,000 votes, against some 243,000 for his Republican challenger and 58,000 for the Conservative candidate.

In Virginia's other U. S. Senate race Harry F. Byrd, Jr. won. However, Byrd ran considerably behind Spong with 383,000 votes. Spong had more than 58 per cent of the vote in his race, whereas Byrd had 54 per cent in his.

At least part of the difference is explained by the Negro support Spong received. Many Negroes who supported Spong voted for Byrd's Republican opponent, Lawrence M. Traylor.

With Negro support, Spong narrowly defeated Sen. Willis Robertson during the summer for the Democratic nomination.

However, George C. Rawlings, Jr., who last summer unseated congressional powerhouse Howard W. Smith with the help of Negro votes, was defeated in the general election by Republican William L. Scott in Virginia's Eighth District. Smith supporters teamed with Republicans to down Rawlings. Scott called it a "bipartisan victory," but he added that "many factors" were involved.

Similarly, Republican Claude Kirk was elected governor of Florida with the help of Gov. Haydon Burns, the incumbent Democrat who was defeated in the primary. Kirk rolled up 821,000 votes against Robert King High's 668,000.

"White backlash" undoubtedly helped Kirk. Florida voters last May rejected Burns' suggestion that they "follow the lead of the people of Alabama" after the big Wallace landslide. However, they proved more receptive to Kirk's somewhat more subtle position that "a man's home is his castle."

An estimated 50,000 to 55,000 Mississippi Negroes voted, out of approximately 170,000 registered. Their votes in the U. S. Senate race were split among Freedom Democratic Party-backed Clifton Whitley, Republican Prentiss Walker, and Democratic incumbent James O. Eastland. Sen. Eastland was reelected with about 230,000 votes, against Walker's 94,000 and Whitley's 28,000.

A Negro was elected to the school board in Jefferson County, becoming the first of his race to be elected to a county office in Mississippi since Reconstruction. A member of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, he downed a white candidate by a vote of 225 to 133. Negro candidates running in another half-dozen counties were defeated. A Negro led a field of six in a race for supervisor in Leflore County, but he lost a runoff election in late November.

Louisiana Negroes gave heavy support---as did the state generally---to a proposal to permit Gov. John J. McKeithen to run for reelection in the 1967 campaigns. The amendment won by a vote of 436,761 to 192,819. Despite the lack of major statewide contests, a sampling of several Negro precincts indicated turnouts in the 50-60 per cent range.

A Negro was elected to the school board in West Feliciana Parish. However, a white write-in campaign defeated a Negro nominee for the school board in Madison Parish. Negroes had been elected during the summer to school boards in East Carroll and Iberville parishes. A Negro candidate also had been elected during the summer in West Feliciana.

Here and there across the South, racially conservative Republicans continued to nudge out moderate and liberal Democrats in congressional races. However, of seven Deep South Republicans who rode the Goldwater tide to victory in 1964, only three were reelected, all in Alabama. Three of the GOP congressmen---Callaway in Georgia, Martin in Alabama, and Walker in Mississippi---sought higher office, and one Republican incumbent in Alabama was defeated. The Callaway race is still undecided, and the Martin and Walker bids were unsuccessful.

Negro registration in 11 Southern states now stands at 2.7 million. In 1962 it was 1.5 million; in 1964, 2.2 million. Current white registration in the South is approximately 14.4 million.

In the 1964 presidential election, four of the six Southern states carried by Mr. Johnson would have gone to Sen. Goldwater if it had not been for the Negro vote. The five Southern states carried by Sen. Goldwater were those in which Negro registration was at or below the regional level.

Said Vernon E. Jordan, Jr., director of the Voter Education Project:

"The results of the 1966 elections plainly indicate the strength and influence of the Negro vote in the South. Yet this strength is far from what it ought to be. Only about half of the Negroes of voting age are registered in the South, whereas 70 per cent of the white adults are registered to vote. This is a gap that must be closed if Negroes are to have a fair share of the voice in Southern politics.

"The results also reflect, in several states, the impact of the Voting Rights Act of 1965. As we stated on the first anniversary of the Act last August, the registration increases of the past year demonstrate the need for more federal examiners. This applies to the three affected states to which examiners have not been sent and to many counties in the four states to which examiners have been sent.

"The results also indicate the value of countless private efforts to stimulate registration and voting in the South. In that connection, the Voter Education Project is pleased to report that programs with which it had been associated have registered 100,000 voters during the year now ending."

The Voter Education Project, a program of the Southern Regional Council, Inc., supports projects of voter registration, citizenship education and leadership training in the 11 Southern states.

The Voter Education Project is nonpartisan and endorses no parties or candidates. Mr. Jordan pointed out that voting in the South often crosses racial lines, with Negroes supporting white candidates in some races and whites supporting Negroes in others. He also pointed out that the 1966 elections again demonstrated that Negroes will vote freely across party lines, basing their choices on the stands of candidates rather than on party affiliation.

GROUP INSURANCE BENEFITS

SOUTHERN REGIONAL COUNCIL, INC.

TO OUR EMPLOYEES:

It gives us considerable pleasure to announce to you that we have completed arrangements for a plan of Group Insurance offering benefits for you and your dependents.

Our Plan is being underwritten by Mutual Of New York, one of the oldest and strongest insurance companies in America.

The principal features of our Plan are described on the following pages, and we suggest that you read this description carefully so you will have a full understanding of the benefits provided.

You will be pleased to know that we will pay the entire cost of this additional security for you and your family.

We sincerely believe that the benefits offered are liberal and should be of great value to you and your dependents.

SOUTHERN REGIONAL COUNCIL, INC.
GEORGIA COUNCIL ON HUMAN RELATIONS

SCHEDULE OF INSURANCE AMOUNTS

Classification	Life Insurance*	Accidental Death, Dismemberment & Loss of Sight*	Major Medical (Maximum)
Associate Director, Editorial Assistant, and Employees earning $6,500 or more	$10,000	$10,000	$10,000
All Other Employees	4,000	4,000	10,000
Dependents	–	–	10,000

*The amounts shown apply before the Plan Anniversary nearest your 65th birthday. Thereafter, the insurance shall be one-half of the schedule amount.

DESCRIPTION OF THE PLAN

* * * * * * * * * * * * * * * *

PLAN DATE

The Plan became effective on May 1, 1966.

ELIGIBLE EMPLOYEES

You were eligible on the Plan Date if you were a full-time employee.

Full-time employees hired after the Plan Date become eligible on completion of 1 month of continuous service.

You become insured on the date you are eligible if you are actively at work. Otherwise, your insurance will be deferred until the day after you return to active work.

ELIGIBLE DEPENDENTS

The following dependents of an insured employee are considered eligible dependents under the Plan, unless they are entitled to benefits as employees:

(1) Wives and Husbands

(2) Unmarried children who have not reached their 23rd birthday. A child who has attained his 19th birthday shall not be considered an eligible dependent of an employee unless he is primarily dependent on the employee and is attending an accredited school or college.

LIFE INSURANCE

The life insurance is payable in event of your death from any cause anywhere while you are insured.

You designate the person to receive payment, and you may change this beneficiary at any time by written notice to the Insurance Company through us.

When you terminate employment, your life insurance remains in force for 31 days. During this 31 day period you may obtain an individual policy for the same amount by applying to the Insurance Company for one of its permanent plans – without taking a medical examination.

Should you become totally disabled while insured and before your 60th birthday, and continue so disabled until death, your life insurance will be payable – even if you die after the 31 day period – provided you have submitted to the Insurance Company the required proofs of disability and its continuance each year. Similarly, should you become totally disabled after your 60th birthday but before your 65th birthday, your life insurance will be payable in event of your death within one year after you terminate employment.

ACCIDENTAL DEATH, DISMEMBERMENT AND LOSS OF SIGHT

A benefit is payable in event of the loss of your life, limb or sight as a direct result of an accidental bodily injury sustained while you are insured, provided the loss occurs within 90 days of the accident – including losses resulting from occupational accidents.

The full amount for which you are insured will be paid for the loss of:

Life
Both Hands or Both Feet or Sight of Both Eyes
One Hand and One Foot
One Hand or Foot and Sight of One Eye

One-half the amount will be paid for the loss of one eye, one hand, or one foot.

A benefit is payable for each covered loss, but the total payments for any one accident may not exceed the full amount for which you are insured.

However, twice the benefit amount defined above will be payable if such loss results from riding as a passenger in an aircraft or other public conveyance being operated commercially to transport passengers for hire.

Losses resulting from suicide, war, certain aviation activities, and those attributable wholly or partly to disease are not covered under this benefit.

MAJOR MEDICAL BENEFITS

for Employees and Dependents

You will be paid a benefit for medical expenses incurred as a result of a non-occupational accident or a sickness for which benefits are not payable under any workmen's compensation law, as outlined below and on the following pages.

The Benefit

For benefit purposes each insured individual's eligible medical expenses are divided into Hospital Expenses, Surgical Expenses and Other Eligible Expenses. The benefit for each type of expense is as follows:

Hospital Expenses – The plan pays 100% of the first $500 of Hospital Expenses an individual incurs during each calendar year plus 80%* of any balance he incurs during the year.

"Hospital Expenses" means hospital charges for room and board (up to the daily limit provided by the plan), hospital charges for medical care and treatment while confined as a bed patient, hospital charges for out-patient medical care and treatment of an accidental bodily injury within 24 hours of an accident, physician's fees for anesthesia and its administration in a hospital while confined as a bed patient or during the 24 hour emergency, accident period, and charges by a professional ambulance service for transportation to a local hospital.

Surgical Expenses – The Plan pays 80%* of the Surgical Expenses an individual incurs each calendar year.

"Surgical Expenses" means surgeons fees in connection with a surgical operation (other than an obstetrical procedure).

Other Eligible Expenses – When an individual has incurred enough of these expenses within a calendar year to satisfy his Deductible, the plan pays 80%* of those he subsequently incurs during that year.

*100% after the first $2,000 of reimbursed expenses each year.

The total benefit payable for any person during his lifetime will not exceed his Maximum amount. However, a person may reinstate his full Maximum – after he has received benefits totalling more than $1,000 – by furnishing the Insurance Company with satisfactory evidence of his good health. In addition, up to $1,000 of the used portion of his Maximum will be automatically restored each January 1 regardless of his health.

Payment of the maximum benefit for yourself does not affect payment of benefits for any of your dependents.

The Deductible

The Deductible amount each calendar year is $100.

It is not necessary to satisfy the Deductible for each illness or accident – it is applied only once each calendar year against an individual's eligible expenses for all illnesses and accidents during the year.

The Deductible requirement is liberalized in the following instances, although the Deductible amount must nevertheless be satisfied by expenses incurred within 12 consecutive months:

Eligible medical expenses incurred and applied toward the Deductible in the last 3 months of a year may be used in satisfying the Deductible for the next year.

When two or more insured members of a family are injured in the same accident, only one Deductible applies to all eligible expenses resulting from the accident in that and the next year.

For those becoming insured during the first 31 days of the plan, expenses incurred from the preceding January 1 may be used in satisfying the Deductible for the first calendar year provided they would otherwise be eligible expenses.

Eligible Medical Expenses

Medical expenses eligible for benefits include charges for the following medical care and services, except as stated below, incurred while insured on the recommendation of a legally qualified physician as necessary for treatment of a sickness or injury:

1. Charges made by a hospital for room and board (including general or floor nursing care) up to the hospital's standard daily rate for a semi-private room.

2. Other charges made by a hospital for medical care and treatment.

3. Charges made by a legally qualified physician for diagnosis, treatment and surgery.

4. Charges made by a registered graduate nurse or physical therapist for nursing care or treatment.

5. Charges made for professional ambulance transportation to a local hospital, or for transportation within the United States and Canada by professional ambulance, railroad or regular commercial passenger aircraft flight to the nearest hospital equipped to furnish special treatment not available in a local hospital.

6. Charges for the following services and supplies:

   (a) X-ray examinations, and microscopic or laboratory tests;

   (b) Anesthesia, oxygen, and their administration;

   (c) X-ray and radioactive isotope therapy;

   (d) Drugs and medicines dispensed by a drug store and prescribed in writing by a legally qualified physician;

   (e) Blood, blood derivatives, and their administration;

   (f) Casts, splints, trusses, braces, crutches, surgical dressings, and artificial limbs or eyes;

   (g) Rental of iron lung or other mechanical equipment for treatment of respiratory paralysis, wheelchair, hospital-type bed, and equipment for the administration of oxygen.

The maximum amount of charges for professional medical services (other than charges made by a hospital on its own behalf for x-ray examinations, allergy testing, pathology and radio-therapy) that will be considered as eligible medical expenses is based on a comprehensive Schedule of Allowances in the group policy – see partial schedule at end of this booklet. In determining any benefit for out-of-hospital expenses for mental and nervous conditions, the benefit percentage will be 50%.

Of course, charges which the individual is not legally obligated to pay or those in excess of what is customary and reasonable are not eligible. Nor are benefits payable for expenses in connection with the following:

1. Occupational injury or sickness, or an injury or disease resulting from war.

2. Pregnancy, except in connection with a Caesarean section or other specified complications of pregnancy.

3. Health or check-up examinations – unless necessary for treatment of a sickness or injury.

4. Dental work or treatment, eye examinations, eye glasses, hearing aids and cosmetic surgery – except for charges to treat an accidental injury which are incurred within 24 months after the accident, if the treatment giving rise to them begins within 90 days after the accident.

5. Alcoholism or narcotism – except for charges incurred while a bed patient in a hospital.

"Hospital" means an institution (other than federal or state) with 24-hour nursing, diagnostic and major surgical facilities. It does not include any institution or part thereof, used principally as a facility for rest, nursing, convalescence or the aged.

Records

To avoid delays in payment of claims, be sure to keep expense records and bills and submit your claim as explained in the "How to Present a Claim" instructions furnished you.

MATERNITY BENEFIT

for Female Employees and Dependent Wives

This benefit is available for expenses incurred in connection with a pregnancy while you and your spouse are insured or during the 9 months after your spouse's insurance terminates, provided the pregnancy began while your spouse was insured. (The requirement as to when pregnancy began does not apply, however, if your spouse became insured on the Plan Date or during the next 31 days.)

The benefit for each pregnancy is the amount of actual medical care expenses incurred on the recommendation of a legally qualified doctor – up to $200.

Medical care expenses are customary and reasonable charges for hospital room and board, hospital treatment while confined as a bed patient, doctor's charges for an obstetrical procedure, and anesthesia and its administration. "Hospital" means an institution (other than federal or state) with 24 hour nursing, diagnostic and major surgical facilities.

This benefit is not payable for expenses incurred after termination of the Plan or of this Maternity Benefit Coverage within 3 years of the Plan Date, unless your spouse's insurance terminated because of your termination of employment, nor is this payable with respect to a pregnancy for which Major Medical benefits are payable.

COORDINATION WITH OTHER COVERAGE

Our plan contains a provision coordinating its medical care benefits with medical care benefits provided by other plans. Other plan means (1) any group or franchise insurance, employee benefit, Blue Cross/Blue Shield or other group plan arranged through any employer, trustee, union or employee benefit association or (2) any program created by a national government or any agency thereof.

If any individual is also covered under another plan, medical care benefits under our plan will be payable as follows:

a. Full benefit amount if our plan is the "primary" plan. (Ours is the primary plan if the other plan also contains a coordination provision and ours insures the individual as an employee.)

b. Adjusted amount if our plan is not the "primary" plan. The adjusted amount is the full benefit reduced, when necessary, so that the total benefit from both plans does not exceed the total allowable expenses. Allowable expense means any necessary, reasonable and customary item of expense at least a portion of which is covered under one of the plans.

MEDICAL EXPENSE CONVERSION PRIVILEGE

When you terminate employment after being insured for at least 3 months, you may obtain an individual premium – paying policy providing medical care coverage for yourself only or, if you had dependents coverage under the Plan, for yourself and your dependents. To obtain this policy you must apply to the Insurance Company and pay the first premium within 31 days after your insurance under the Plan terminates.

The type, amount, duration and terms of the benefits available will depend on the policy form being offered by the Insurance Company for conversion purposes at the time you apply.

No evidence of insurability is required for the individual policy, but the Insurance Company reserves the right not to cover any person whose other medical care coverage together with that under the individual policy would result in overinsurance or duplication of benefits under its standards.

If your dependents are insured under the Plan, this privilege is also available to (a) your surviving spouse, with respect to such of your dependents as are insured, at your death and (b) a dependent child, with respect to himself, upon attaining the limiting age for dependents eligibility.

GENERAL PROVISIONS

Application for Insurance

All eligible employees will be asked to fill out a simple enrollment card. Please complete all questions carefully as this card will be used in preparing your certificate.

No Medical Examination

No medical examination is required for your insurance unless you were previously insured under the Plan.

Policy and Certificate

This booklet is a brief summary of the principal features of the Plan and is not a contract. Operation of the Plan is governed by the terms of the contract issued by Mutual Of New York.

When you become insured, you will receive an individual certificate outlining the details of your coverages.

Termination

If you leave our employ, your insurance will terminate except as otherwise stated in your certificate.

Important

Please notify us at once when you acquire an additional eligible dependent - or when one of your dependents is no longer eligible.

SCHEDULE OF ALLOWANCES

The maximum amount for which Major Medical benefits are payable is determined by multiplying the schedule unit value by the dollar conversion factor in the following table for your basic annual earnings at the beginning of the calendar year. Some services and procedures, with their unit values, are set forth below. A more complete list will be included in your certificate of insurance.

Basic Annual Earnings	Dollar Conversion Factor
Under $7,500	$5.00
$7,500 but under $15,000	6.25

In last year's report, a brief assessment of conditions in the region concluded with the following:

> "The year ended with an important question still unanswered. Given the commendable new awareness and the higher standards, were these conditions yet of sufficient quality and depth to meet the old need and the new promise? We will know much of the answer in 1966."

As the year ended we did, indeed, know much of the answer and such as we knew was not encouraging.

To be sure a few more jobs opened up, a few more Negro children transferred to "white" schools, and in some instances real and identifiable progress took place in communities. But the title of our school desegregation report for the year might summarize our evaluation of things generally. The report was entitled, School Desegregation 1966; The Slow Undoing.

As in years past statistics changed and generally for the better. But in years past we have cautioned that statistics did not tell the whole story and implied that more change was taking place than was statistically evident. And, so I believe, it was, especially in understanding. White Southerners and, to a lesser but still an important degree, Negro Southerners have gone through an incredible educational experience during the past decade.

During 1966 there was at least a slowing and perhaps a retrogression in this process of understanding and the benefits which came from it. For fifteen years we have had in the region a formula for working slowly out of a terrible dilemma. Always delicately, sometimes with success, sometimes without, the scales which balanced order have painfully sought and found that position between what Negroes would demand and what whites would accept. And, the balance, as inadequate as it was, has gone slowly upward, quicker and quicker. More importantly, this formula worked -- achieving both progress and stability.

Essential to the formula was at least partial good will and some understanding on the part of many white Southerners, good leadership and phenomenal patience on the part of many Negro Southerners. Essential, too, was the substantial measure of self-interest to which whites particularly, but again both groups, responded.

Understanding, patience, sensible response to self-interest, these were all placed in jeopardy during 1966.

White Southerners have gone through an incredible revolution. It is not just that they believe it, it is so. Their whole society and all of its patterns have changed. With considerable justification many are proud of the way in which they have accommodated this change. They have changed structures, accepted laws, and become accustomed to radical tokenism. Now they are impatient, embittered, defiant, and confused that more would be demanded. This is because the typical white Southerner (and undoubtedly the typical white American) believes the Negro now has an equal chance, that this is the essence of American society -- as indeed it is -- and enough is enough.

1966 was the year when the white South decided it was going fast enough and perhaps much too fast. This is, of course, serious. And if, as seems to be the case from here, much of the nation agreed, then it is critical.

Negro Southerners are aware of this and to a degree which I have not heretofore witnessed, there is a growing question among this part of our citizenry as to whether or not integration and the democratic society can ever be achieved.

To be sure such instances as the recent Georgia gubernatorial election -- or non-election -- may be too heavy an influence on our judgment. (The wags of the office say SRC may move its offices to Birmingham where there is "a more favorable climate.") The growing retreat into Negro society for Negro Southerners may be only the prelude to healthy independence. But, I think not.

We are not, of course, without a fundamental hope and optimism. Indeed, I trust that every working hour of the SRC staff and every function of the Council is, itself, an expression of hope, confidence, and optimism. The remainder of this report has as its purpose a summary documentation of that hope and our expressions of it.

However, as we review the events of 1966 it is difficult for me to conclude other than the sad analysis that we have yet many years of an essentially segregated society. One must wonder if we can stand that costly, costly moral burden.

THE SOUTHERN REGIONAL COUNCIL

Council Affairs

On recommendation of the Nominating Committee, the Members of the Council during the Annual Meeting in November unanimously reelected Mr. John H. Wheeler as President of the Council. The Members expressed their appreciation to Mr. Wheeler and to Dr. Raymond M. Wheeler who served as Chairman of the Executive Committee during 1966. A new chairman of the Executive Committee will be selected when that group holds its first meeting in 1967. To these expressions of the Members I should like to add my own word of deep gratitude. The year was a busy one, hectic in detail and most important in policy. It was also a good year, but it would not have been without the leadership of these two outstanding men and the thorough participation of all of the Members of the Executive Committee.

Elected as Vice-Presidents for the coming year were Miss Josephine Wilkins, Atlanta; Dr. Rufus E. Clement of Atlanta; Mr. Paul R. Christopher of Knoxville; and Mr. Thomas W. Young of Norfolk. Mr. Joseph F. Haas of Atlanta was reelected Counsel.

Elected to the Executive Committee were Dr. Lucius Pitts of Birmingham; Dr. James McBride Dabbs of Mayesville; Dr. Albert W. Dent of New Orleans; Dr. C. G. Gomillion of Tuskegee Institute (Ala.); Mrs. Martin Harvey of Jackson (Miss.); Mr. McNeill Smith of Greensboro; Dr. H. Franklin Williams of Coral Gables; and Mr. Marion A. Wright of Linville Falls.

The officers of the Council also serve as ex-officio members of the Executive Committee.

During the year the Council lost the leadership of Vice-President Stephen J. Wright who left the region to head the United Negro College Fund in New York, and two Members, Dr. James A. Colston who became President of Bronx Community College, New York, and Mr. Henry Lehmann who was transferred by his company, General Electric, from the region.

To fill these vacancies Mr. George Owens of Tougaloo was elected to the Class of 1967 and Mr. Brooks Hays of Little Rock was elected to the Class of 1968.

New Members elected to the Class of 1970 were: Mr. Brad Ansley, Sarasota, Florida; Mr. Edward Elson, Atlanta, Georgia; Dr. Jerome H. Holland, Hampton Institute (Va.); Dr. Vivian Henderson, Atlanta, Georgia; Mrs. Glen E. Laskey, Ruston, Louisiana; Mr. Alan Parker, Tuskegee, Alabama; Dr. Vascoe Smith, Memphis, Tennessee; and, Mr. Julius Chambers, Charlotte, North Carolina.

On recommendation of the Executive Committee the Council elected three Life Fellows: Father Theodore Gibson of Miami, Florida; Colonel Francis Pickens Miller of Charlottesville, Virginia, and Dr. Riley B. Montgomery of Lexington, Kentucky.

Sadly, the Council lost one of its Life Fellows -- and as one of its great spirits -- Miss Lillian Smith. The Members adopted a tribute to Miss Smith from which the following is excerpted:

> "Lillian Smith, Georgia author whose books on the South are acclaimed around the world, died September 28 in an Atlanta hospital in her last struggle of a 13-year-illness, concluding the career of a Southerner 'who never wanted to write about race, but just about people.'
> "In her later years, Miss Smith studied, mused and wrote about vast and troubling changes in human life leading to 'the tremendous future' of man, and this year regretted, and withdrew her support from the new disciples of 'black power.' 'What we want,' she said shortly before her death, is 'human power.'

"Lillian Smith's friendships and influence reached to the powerful people of the earth and to humble neighbors on a Georgia mountainside. Students, politicians, writers from Europe, Asia and Africa visited her home on Old Screamer Mountain, as did American intellectuals, literary people, old friends and plain book-readers on pilgrimages to a brave thinker.

"Lillian Smith paid the price it costs a prophet to tell the truth to his own country. STRANGE FRUIT brought her fame and money, and persecution and insult such as few women have sustained. Other books of importance were, she felt, killed by silent censorship North and South. And up from Clayton beneath Old Screamer Mountain, three times came enemies to burn down buildings, so that she lost a novel and other manuscripts and treasured notes, documents and household goods.

"The author summoned equal valor in her long fight with recurrent cancer, a trial she turned into a source of hope and courage for thousands with fatal illness and other ordeals.

"It is fitting that the Council honor the brave intelligence, the righteous judgments and the penetrating work of this Southern Regional Council life member."

Programs and Projects

1966 was the year of substantial expansion for the Council. Late in 1965 we began recruitment of staff for a second Voter Education Project and for a number of specialists in such fields as urban planning, labor education, community organization, prison reform and criminal rehabilitation, and research and editing.

In addition to normal staff turnover, we have grown by some 60% during the year. Recruiting staff, working with them as programs are developed and incorporating individuals and projects into the SRC structure have been the demanding and priority responsibilities of the year.

While all of this has by no means been completed, we have made a reasonable amount of progress and the results are satisfying. This is particularly true in the caliber of people we have found and the degree to which they have been able to conceive of this agency's philosophy and method of work.

To those familiar with the Council, our growth in staff and funds is impressive. But, in this growth we have, I think, been able to preserve the idea of attempting to accomplish significant results with modest resources. For example, expenditures in excess of a million dollars is certainly substantial by SRC standards. Broken into its parts, however, puts the resources into better perspective: $33,000 for urban planning, $22,000 for community organization and $34,000 for prison reform, for instance. Given talented individuals, we believe these relatively limited funds for serious program areas are a challenge and sufficient to be effective; certainly, these relatively small amounts are not a liability.

The following program reports will attempt to describe -- by department and project -- the major interests and efforts of 1966. While space is too limited to do any of them justice, I trust this accounting will reflect the overlapping and cooperation of the various programs, the cooperation and support to sister agencies and others who share our concerns, and the integrity and skill of these SRC staff persons for whom I have sincere admiration and to whom I am grateful for that which has been accomplished during the year.

Service and assistance to the state Councils on Human Relations continues as the primary interest and responsibility of this department. During 1966, our grant-in-aid program for the state Councils increased significantly to $150,000. In addition, approximately $50,000 was provided for an additional staff person for each of four state Councils to work exclusively in rural areas (The Rural Advancement Project, developed in cooperation with the National Sharecroppers Fund). This support, along with modest grants in a number of program areas brought our total aid to state Councils to well above $225,000 for the year.

We continue to hope and work toward the goal of having the state Councils self-sustaining in their basic operations, and substantial progress is being made toward that goal. Dues-paid membership now stands at about 11,500; an increase of 23% over last year. (The George S. Mitchell Award for the greatest percentage increase in membership went to the Arkansas Council, which grew by 95%.) The state Councils had 26 full-time, professional employees and we hope for a continued modest increase in this number. The Councils raised about $120,000 from local sources, an increase of 20%, and their operating budgets increased by about 25%, exceeding $400,000.

We continue to define and develop the relationship between SRC and the independent state Councils on Human Relations which we organized more than a decade ago. In programs we have made considerable progress in cooperation and support. In areas such as school integration, court reform, welfare, and voter education we have been able to conduct joint programs and/or to offer each other support that has definitely enhanced the value and effectiveness of each agency. Many of these will be referred to throughout the remainder of this report.

(Ironically, much work has been required to make use of the resources available in the subject areas referred to above. We had been so many years without such resources that we had to work hard to get state and local Councils adjusted to the idea that relatively substantial staff and financial resources were available for local program development.)

In response to overtures from state Council directors and presidents, a special committee of SRC members and Council presidents was set up to consider the continuing relationship between the two groups. The committee has met twice and considerable thinking and discussion has gone into this work.

It is impossible within a brief report to do more than suggest the difference that increased growth and support of the state Councils has made in the lives of people. In Virginia, 1,075 religious leaders gathered in Richmond under the sponsorship of all major religious groups for a conference on "People, Religion, and A Changing Virginia." As one of the speakers put it, "We have never been here before." In Georgia, more than 30,000 copies of a booklet titled, Know Your Rights have been distributed to help poor people in dealing with the police; and, surprisingly, police departments from several cities and counties asked for copies to give to policemen. In Houston, 1,500 people have had a chance to air their complaints and discuss city problems with the mayor as a part of the Houston Council's "Meet the Mayor" program. In Arkansas, citizens' groups have been organized to secure fair and integrated housing and to work for better conditions and practices in the state's penal system. In Huntsville, Alabama, 120 maids have been helped to organize a union to secure fairer wages and working conditions and to form a credit union. Also in Alabama, hundreds of Negro farmers have been taught how to participate in Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service elections, which means participation in determining their crop allotments -- and a few have for the first time been elected to community and county committees. And, in South Carolina, rural people from 30 of the state's 46 counties meet in ten Rural Advancement Project groups to work for economic improvement; and they are backed by 1,178 state Council members from 153 communities.

In the spring and early summer we cooperated with other private agencies and the United States Commission on Civil Rights in a series of conferences on school desegregation in each of the Southern states. This was a model of the potential of cooperation among private agencies and between private agencies and a public agency. In consultation with the private agencies the Commission set up programs to describe the laws and procedures of school desegregation. Private agencies saw to it that specialists and consultants were available and, more importantly, such groups as the state Councils, the American Friends Service Committee, the NAACP and others saw to it that concerned Negro parents got to these meetings where school superintendents, board members, and state officials were in attendance. SRC coordinated much of this and administered a special grant to provide modest travel funds for those who could not otherwise attend. This program brought together more than 7,000 people for these deliberations.

The field department, the state Councils, and the project on Crime and Corrections assisted a program on court reform developed by Mrs. M. E. Tilly, Director of Women's Work. In the spring, Mrs. Tilly called together the leaders of some twenty national women's organizations asking for their support for such a program. The support was enthusiastically given and thereafter meetings were held in each of the states describing courts, prisons and procedures of justice, or the lack of it,to concerned women. We hope for considerable followup on these meetings and that from it will come a substantial program of court visitation, concern with such matters as jury selection and arrest procedures, and several statewide programs for prison reform.

We received during 1966 a grant of $25,000 for an experimental program in the distribution of paperback books. Conducted for SRC by Miss Louise Cole, special assistant to the director, more than 58,000 volumes have been distributed to community centers, school libraries, tutorial projects, study halls in slum communities, and the like. The project, slow in developing, eventually provided books to more than 50 community programs and half-again that number had to be rejected for lack of funds.

Again in 1966 SRC was asked to serve as secretariat to the Southern Interagency Conference, the informal gathering four times each year of some forty agencies, church groups, and others with programs of race relations in the region. We consider this a highly valuable service of the Council and were happy that we were again asked to provide it.

Throughout much of the remainder of this report the involvement of this department and the work of the state Councils will be reflected. Were this not true much additional attention would have to be given to the cooperation among agencies, the considerable accomplishments of the several state Councils and, certainly, the excellence of the work of Edwin Stanfield, the SRC director of Field Activities.

We have continued the progress of merging these two departments into a single operation.

A major research and information effort has been reflected in the quarterly New South, first printed in this form with the Winter 1966 issue. Each issue has reflected a range of our several program interests and has been planned with this in mind. We have been particularly gratified at the quality of authors we have been able to attract. In addition to material prepared by the staff (most notably that of Pat Watters and Margaret Long) we have published works by persons such as James Silver, Vincent Harding, Leslie Dunbar, Robert Coles, Jack Patterson, Jack Nelson, August Meier, Robert Sherrill, Paul Good, Eric Lincoln and Frank Smith.

We have been pleased, too, at the critical reaction and the quality of subscribers. ("An impressive magazine," Granville Hicks) The number of subscribers is not as important to us as the nature of the reader, but we do have as a goal that paid subscriptions will cover the cost of printing and distribution by the end of 1968.

Most of the publications prepared and issued during the year are referred to elsewhere. Two, however, should be commented on. In the spring SRC, in cooperation with the American Jewish Committee, issued The Continuing Crisis - May 1966. This was an assessment and documentation of the new racial tensions in the South and our expression of concern that these tensions were being overlooked and misunderstood. The report was well received and we believe of value. (The Washington Post referred to it editorially as "thoughtful" and a "useful jar to complacency.")

Again in 1966 we attempted to issue a report on school desegregation in the region. Initially, we had planned to issue this report in late September or early October. We commissioned a group of reporters -- one in each state -- to assist us in collecting statistics on school desegregation and hoped for a prompt and factual report. This schedule was completely disrupted because of the difficulty we encountered in obtaining statistical information from school authorities. Eventually, we were able to collect much of this information and the delay proved fortunate. Our report, issued in December, coincided with a peak of national interest in the Office of Education and it contributed, we believe, some measure of understanding and perhaps even sanity to a complicated and greatly misunderstood situation.

Late in the year a number of manuscripts and studies were completed that are being held for orderly and adequate distribution. These include: The Hidden Jobless in Unemployment Statistics (a study by Mrs. Sue Rusche); Mr. Mayor, Can We Solve Our Housing Dilemma? (a memorandum for municipal leadership, prepared by the research firm Candeub, Fleissig and Associates); In Their Own Words (a study of school desegregation in Alabama, by Dr. Mark Chesler, University of Michigan); Neighbors, Inc. (a study of voluntary neighborhood programs in three cities, by Mrs. Margaret Price -- no title); a study of the Atlanta riots (by Wayne Kelly -- no title); and, a study of the Ku Klux Klan and the National States Rights Party (by Robert Sherrill -- no title.)

Our information gathering service, headed by Mrs. Glenda Bartley, Senior Research Associate, has had an extremely busy year with an increase in the number of requests for assistance and some change from past years in their nature. Requests for information from the department have increased by about one-third during the past year, with telephone requests (especially from outside the South and from sources such as news media and law firms rather than students) accounting for most of the growth. The types of requests have changed too. More and more, people want information that cannot be obtained from newspaper clippings, though requests for specific news items or accounts of incidents have not diminished. The trend is toward statistical data, economics, and employment information, that must be gathered from government and federal reserve sources and other statistical sources in our library. Too, the nature of the research requests shows some shifting from "what do you know?" to "what do you think?" or "how do you interpret?" (Based on the fact that newspaper reporting is necessarily selective and evaluative, the new requests require evaluation and judgment by the researcher.) In general, the staff has been able to change to meet new requirements.

We have been able to cut down the number of daily newspapers to about twenty, but have increased the number of magazines and journals as well as the number of pamphlets and other publications dealing with specifics. Again, the trend during the past year has been toward expanding interests and coverage to respond adequately to increasingly sophisticated requests.

In preparation of this report, I asked Pat Watters, Director of Information and senior person in this department, to give me his comments on the year's work and the major needs for 1967. His memorandum seemed to me to be such an excellent summary and critique as well as an indication of the integrity and quality of the leadership of this important function of the Council, that it is reproduced here:

> "Much energy during the past year has gone into setting the new character of New South. That seems generally established now; the effort will be to keep it abreast of current trends, and sophisticated in approach to them.
> "Special reports and publications have been of a high quality and something less probably than anticipated quantity. Part of this is explainable by the New South's using matter that in previous years would have gone into the report form. Part of it, too, reflects the time and energy put into the VEP book which will be published by Harcourt, Brace and World in the fall of 1967. And part of it reflects a firm resistance to the temptation to publish for the sake of publishing, the publish or perish syndrome. If there has been in the past year a serious neglect, it seems to me to be in our ability to be flexible, to react to the unexpected acts and events that are always part of the fundamental change and reality of the area. We should have by now published balanced and perspicacious interpretations of black power and of the drastic diminishing of national-organization movement activity in the South. Both subjects should be dealt with early in the coming year. New South has dealt with them adequately in a current sense, but not in the depth required.

"The tone and thrust of publications may be somewhat altered by the schizophrenic situation now in the South -- the split between the ongoing efforts to build on the new law and opportunities, and the continuing, if not increasing racial hostility reflecting at its roots worsening economic, social and cultural deficiencies that are in a sense of the word, at crisis point. We must continue to emphasize "how to" build, while at the same time pointing to destructive forces, and forcefully fighting racism. In all of this, the demand on us is for a grasp of the fundamentals of a complex and still shifting set of social phenomena, and for more and more sophisticated knowledge and insight into them. The research department reflects and has responded admirably to these demands. There will be continuing effort to keep abreast of intelligent research and all the facts.

"Accuracy and balance remain the first responsibility. The success of our 'press relations' depends only on living up to that responsibility; to do so must remain our only 'public relations' program."

The Voter Education Project

During 1966 VEP was the single largest operation within SRC. The project operated on a budget slightly in excess of $350,000, and we hope for a similar operation during 1967. The project, directed by Vernon E. Jordan, Jr., has an excellent staff of six persons.

While initially the Project planned major emphasis on programs of citizenship education and leadership training, about 66 per cent of the programs funded during the year were voter registration programs. This fact does not reflect any failure on the part of the Project to stress citizenship education and leadership training; rather it evidences the Project's response to a tremendous volume of requests from communities throughout the region for funds with which to conduct registration programs. More than 400 requests for funds were submitted to the Project during 1966. In all but a few cases, the requests were for programs aimed principally at voter registration.

Two factors were largely responsible for the intense interest during 1966 in registration projects:

(1) the presence of federal examiners in some 40 southern counties to lend federal assistance for the first time to Negro registration; and (2) statewide primaries and elections, hotly contested local races, and a large field of Negro candidates, running in many communities for the first time, throughout the region.

The registration programs accounted for more than 100,000 newly registered voters in 11 states. By category, the number of projects funded was as follows:

Citizenship Education	6
Citizenship Education and Voter Registration	21
Leadership Training	7
Program Development and Technical Assistance	1
Program Development T/A and Statewide Program Coordination	1
Voter Registration	70
Total	106

The programs of citizenship education and leadership training funded during the past year leave the Project with valuable experience and "know-how" which can be applied on a broader basis in 1967. Our most striking finding was not the need for these programs

(we knew that) but the great interest in them and desire for them. In virtually every funded registration project, there has been a subsequent request for funds for citizenship education.

The most successful citizenship education programs have been the demonstrative type in which newly registered persons were given the opportunity to actually practice voting on a voting machine set up for use in a forthcoming election. Projects of this nature in Lee County, Alabama, sponsored by the Auburn League of Women Voters, and in Knox County, Tennessee, conducted by the Greater Knoxville Council on Human Relations, provided VEP -- through research reports and field trips -- with proven techniques for this kind of project.

Projects conducted by the Tuskegee Civic Association in Alabama and by the Southern Consumers Cooperative in Louisiana provide good examples of classroom-type citizenship education. Classes on citizenship responsibilities and governmental structure were welcomed by voters in those communities. The Voter Education Project, working with the Georgia chapter of the American Civil Liberties Union, has completed the first in a series of pamphlets to be used as teaching aids in citizenship education classes. The illustrated booklet entitled "Know Your Rights," will be distributed throughout the region. Several leaders of VEP-affiliated projects in Georgia attended a presentation of the booklet at a community meeting in the Vine City area of Atlanta. They later carried supplies of the booklet back home to their rural communities.

The second VEP teaching aid called "Know Your Local Government in Georgia," is nearing completion and soon will go to the printer. A similar booklet will be prepared for each state in the region. These booklets will be put into use in the spring and summer when registration and voting activities resume.

In Alabama and Georgia, VEP is testing techniques of citizenship education through use of the mass media. The Auburn League of Women Voters is writing, producing and distributing a series of three television programs on registration and voting in Alabama. The first show was carried October 29 by NBC stations in Montgomery and Decatur and was seen by an estimated 33,000 Alabama viewers. The second in the series soon will be ready for showing. Talent and advice from the Auburn-Tuskegee area is used in producing the shows.

Another VEP grant made it possible for the Georgia League of Women Voters to produce and distribute a television spot on how to cast a ballot in the Georgia general election. The film demonstrated how to vote a straight ticket, how to vote a split ticket, and how to write-in. As in Alabama, stations provided free public-service time and talent was volunteered. Again, therefore, expenses were minimal. Seven stations with nearly a million viewers used the Georgia tape. The League also sent out radio spots which were used by several dozen stations with more than five million listeners.

The leadership training programs have been among the most useful and memorable efforts. Outstanding among these was a two-day seminar at the end of the year for Negro legislators from three states -- Georgia, Tennessee, and Texas. Of 20 Negro legislators now serving in the South, 19 attended some portion of the seminar. Authorities in such fields as welfare, corrections, economics, unemployment and individual rights addressed the seminar, which was held in Atlanta.

The occasion was historic; it was the first such meeting of Southern Negro legislators (none previously had been elected during modern times in Texas, and only one had in Tennessee). At the conclusion of the seminar, the legislators voted unanimously to ask VEP to hold another such meeting prior to the next legislative season. VEP chose not to publicize the Seminar, so that all discussions could be off-the-record and frank.

Other notable leadership training programs were conducted during the spring in Alabama and South Carolina. These were one-day institutes for Negro candidates and poll-watchers. Held in cooperation with the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund, the institutes dealt with election laws and procedures and the duties and responsibilities of poll-watchers and candidates. Those who attended the institutes were in a position later to file several lawsuits charging election irregularities.

The first venture with a statewide leadership conference proved well worth the time, effort and money invested. This was a day-long conference held in cooperation with the South Carolina Voter Education Project at the Wade Hampton Hotel in Columbia. More than 400 South Carolina Negro leaders and civil rights workers attended sessions on effective registration campaigns, state and federal election laws, the politics of poverty programs, and getting out the vote.

VEP supported a regional leadership training workshop which was sponsored by the Scholarship, Education and Defense Fund for Racial Equality, Inc., and held July 20 - 24 at Frogmore, South Carolina. A recent grant to the regional office of the Urban League is providing leadership training in rural and urban settings. The grant was for pilot programs in Calhoun County, Alabama, and Jacksonville, Florida.

Student involvement through stipends and part-time employment in community organizations is a major effort of the Voter Education Project. Numerous projects used students as task force workers in registration campaigns. VEP supported student activities through such organizations as the Young Women's Christian Association, the American Friends Service Committee, and the Virginia Students Civil Rights Committee. The latter organization has been engaged in impressive citizenship education work in Southside Virginia. The Friends Service Committee likewise engaged in some citizenship education in Sumter, South Carolina.

Mayor Ivan Allen of Atlanta has agreed to employ the first VEP intern for part-time work at City Hall, beginning with the second semester of the current academic year. Arrangements are being made with the National YWCA for use of college students in registration campaigns during spring holidays in 1967. And discussions are underway with certain Peace Corps officials regarding the possible use of Peace Corps returnees as teachers for citizenship education classes in the South this summer.

Finally, the Project has been the main source of support for the South Carolina Voter Education Project, the only statewide organization of its kind in the South. Through the Arkansas Council on Human Relations, the ground has been prepared for formation of an organization in Arkansas patterned after SCVEP. A Little Rock office with a full-time director already is being financed by VEP. It is expected that the statewide organization will be in operation by early spring. There is interest in such statewide organizations in North Carolina and Florida. In the latter state, the Florida Council on Human Relations has agreed to coordinate the initial organizational work.

The VEP office in Atlanta supervised field activities, maintained financial records and provided vital election-year data to the news media. Numerous requests for information were answered throughout the year for the major networks, news magazines and the nation's leading newspapers. In addition to the election analysis, a booklet of registration statistics was published and a study was made on the effects of federal registrars.

Vernon Jordan, the project director, has been quite busy in a number of other activities as well; including serving on two Presidential commissions (the Planning Council of The White House Conference, "To Fulfill These Rights," and the National Advisory Commission on Selective Service). He and the project staff have done an outstanding job, and they cannot be too highly commended.

Community Organization Project

This project, directed by Al Ulmer, has as its purpose to become informed of the interests and needs of the innumerable urban and rural self-help and cooperative programs in the region sponsored by the poor, to share this information, to offer technical assistance and to attempt to bring together the interests and resources of private and public agencies and these self-help programs.

Early in the year an extensive survey -- largely through the travel of the project director -- was made of community organization efforts in the South. From this developed the first technical assistance offered and two publications: Poor People and Problems and Co-Ops, Credit Unions and Poor People.

Technical Assistance was offered to:

Wilcox County, Ala. (Farm cooperative effort)
Thomas County, Ga. (Self-help housing project, proposal to OEO for $56,000)
Baker County, Ga. (Credit Union - community group)
Huntsville, Ala. (Credit Union - Maids' union)
Reserve, La. (Credit Union - sugar cane workers)
Hale County, Ala. (Credit Union - three community groups)
Pinellas County, Fla. (Tenants' association)
Wilcox and Lowndes County, Ala. (Provided manager of Freedom Quilting Bee Co-Op for summer)
Hines County, Miss. (Co-Op education and managerial assistance for Poor people's Co-Op)

Opelousas, La. (Grand Marie Vegetable Co-Op)
YWCA Summer Project (Community involvement program)
North Carolina Fund (Community Action Program evaluation)
VISTA (Four training programs and two area-wide conferences)

The project provided work-scholarships for students working with groups in the slums of Atlanta and Nashville and for rural programs in Amelia County, Virginia, and Auburn, Alabama. There was tri-sponsorship of a conference on self-help housing in Florida with the American Friends Service Committee and the Florida Migrant Ministry. Under the project, SRC co-sponsored, with the Encampment for Citizenship, a program for high-school age young people in Barbourville, Kentucky. In Atlanta, the project encouraged and provided assistance to and experiment between a large Negro church and a large white church to determine if the two institutions, together, could develop a significantly funded and staffed program for work in a slum area.

Two other extremely important programs were developed during the year. Jointly with the Cooperative League of the U.S.A., we have called five meetings of members of low-income cooperatives, organizers and co-op education experts to develop a program of cooperative education for self-help groups. The results are that a program has been developed and a grant of $850,000 is now being sought for this purpose under the sponsorship of the Southern Consumers' Education Foundation. Secondly, and partially as an outgrowth of these meetings, SRC is supporting an effort for a southwide "federation" of low income cooperatives.

Urban Planning Project

The Urban Planning Project has as its purposes to assess urban planning in the region, to encourage involvement of all the community in progressive programs, to encourage local governments to make all services available on an equal basis, and to evaluate the policies of and cooperate with the several federal agencies. The project is directed by Moreland Griffith Smith, FAIA, and assisted by Susan Bresler.

Publications during the year were: Neighborhood Stabilization (a guide to a changing neighborhood); A Home of Our Own (a guide for the new home buyer); Mr. Mayor, Can We Solve Our Housing Dilemma? (a guide for civic leadership); and, yet-to-be-published, studies of housing in Atlanta and of neighborhood housing and community improvement volunteer efforts.

The project staff has been heavily involved in professional consultations with the leadership, official and unofficial, of a number of communities and with several of the local and state Councils on Human Relations. They have been requested and are giving professional analyses to the overall urban planning efforts of six southern cities. There have been a number of consultations with persons in the regional and national office of the Department of Housing and Urban Development, as well as a meeting with Secretary Weaver. The staff and the Executive Director have worked with the staff of Doxiadis and Associates and have conferred with Dr. Doxiadis. From the conferences may come a proposal for an experimental metropolitan regional study.

In the hopes of encouraging a more realistic curriculum for students of architecture and urban planning, there have been several meetings with university faculties, particularly those of the Universities of Pennsylvania and North Carolina. We hope to continue and expand this work.

The Urban Planning Project epitomizes the SRC dilemma and opportunity: how, with very limited staff and resources, to develop programs that make a difference. We are encouraged with the first year's experimentation.

Labor Education Project

The project has as its purpose to develop educational materials for and offer professional services to the intermediate labor leadership in the region. Fortunately, we were able to persuade Dr. Emory Via to obtain a second year's leave of absence to continue directing this program.

Work has ranged from participation in single meetings through participation in weekend and one week institutes, to the direction of the one month National Institute of Labor Education Southern Union Staff Training Institute. This has included three institutes with the Steelworkers in Florida, Louisiana, and Kentucky; three weekend institutes in cooperation with the Alabama State AFL-CIO; two institutes with the ILGWU; and participation in the Tri-State Labor School, the Rubber Workers' School and the Kentucky Labor School.

Throughout the year the project director has had repeated occasion to have successful and detailed collaborative undertakings with the Southern Office of the AFL-CIO Civil Rights Department. This relationship has proved valuable to both parties.

The project director also served as a member of the Task Force of The White House Conference, "To Fulfill These Rights." Thereafter, Dr. Via was selected as the spokesman for a panel which appeared before four sessions of The White House Conference itself.

Project on Crime and Corrections

This project is concerned with prison reform, criminal rehabilitation, crime prevention and juvenile delinquency. Because of the unique qualifications required for the project director, we were not able to fill this position until mid-year when John Boone and his assistant, William Farmar, joined the staff.

Shortly thereafter we asked a number of persons to attend a one-day meeting in Atlanta to review plans for the project and advise us on them. Among those attending were the directors of the prison systems of North Carolina, South Carolina and Oregon, the general secretary of the American Correctional Association, and the Director of the Federal Bureau of Prisons. This was an excellent start for the project and we are deeply grateful for the contribution of all the advisory committee members, and hope for continuing cooperation with them.

The project has commissioned a study of prison systems of the Southern states, and the first draft is completed. We hope to publish in the spring this guide for interested professionals and lay persons. A second study on the culture of slum-dwelling teen-agers has also been commissioned.

In cooperation with the Arkansas Council, the project staff has prepared information on state prisons in Arkansas, one of the worst in the region. In October, a statewide group was convened to pursue this situation. Governor Rockefeller has expressed interest in reforming the entire system, and despite resistance reform appears likely.

In Alabama, the ACLU used data previously collected by the project in a brief seeking prison desegregation, and the project director was called as a witness for the plaintiff. The material and testimony were said to have been instrumental in securing the broad desegregation order issued by the Federal Court.

In Georgia, at the request of The United Churchwomen, a position paper was prepared by the project staff on the state prison system with particular attention given to the Boys' School at Alto. Presumably,

The United Churchwomen and others will use this information in seeking reform. A similar request has come from The United Churchwomen of Florida and is being processed.

The project director has been engaged as a consultant by a number of agencies and groups, and is a member of the Atlanta Police Training Advisory Committee. He is assisting in the development of a pilot project, sponsored by the YMCA, designed to help boys and young adults who have been prison inmates.

While we were anxious to have this project, the first six months of the program has demonstrated to us a potential substantially greater than we had hoped.

OTHER PROGRAMS IN BRIEF

Relationships with Federal Agencies

During the year there was a heavy involvement with federal agencies ranging from the Commission on Civil Rights to the Department of Health, Education and Welfare. Consultants for employee training were provided to HEW for hospital and school desegregation personnel, to VISTA for volunteers and supervisory persons and to the Post Office Department. We have cooperated with HUD in a study of federal housing policies, developed materials describing federal assistance available and assisted local groups in applying for such assistance. Modest grants have been made to the Councils on Human Relations in Mississippi, South Carolina, Tennessee and Atlanta for analyses of anti-poverty programs in their areas. We have cooperated with the Citizens' Crusade Against Poverty in establishing their Southern program and the Director served on the CCAP Board of Inquiry to investigate charges against the Child Development Group of Mississippi.

School Desegregation

The special report on school desegregation and the state-by-state conferences, in cooperation with the Civil Rights Commission, have been referred to. Again, during the year we enjoyed close cooperation with the American Friends Service Committee and their school desegregation task force. We helped finance and plan a statewide, six-month, staffed program of school desegregation in South Carolina sponsored by Penn Community Services. Dr. Mark Chesler, University of Michigan,completed research on the experiences of Negro children in initial school desegregation in Alabama.

The report will be published in January, 1967. Financial support was given to the Virginia Council for a statewide program on providing adequate and accurate textbooks and the materials developed by VCHR were made available to other states. School desegregation programs were developed and financially supported with Councils on Human Relations in North Carolina, Alabama, and Arkansas. Instructors and speakers were provided for teacher and supervisor training programs sponsored by five universities.

Welfare Programs

A study was made of welfare programs and expenditures in the Southern states and issued under the title of Public Assistance in the South. Follow-up is being given to encourage state and local councils and others to develop an interest in this area. Financial support was provided the Georgia Council for an excellent program developed by them in cooperation with the Columbia University School of Social Work. Program and financial assistance was also provided the Atlanta Council and the state Councils in Virginia, Tennessee and Alabama.

Technological Unemployment

Under the direction of Mrs. Sue Rusche a close relationship has been established with the U. S. Department of Labor. Fortunately for us, it was necessary for Mrs. Rusche to spend some months in Washington. Thus, we have had a liaison person with the Department at minimum cost to us. Mrs. Rusche has prepared the study The Hidden Jobless in Unemployment Statistics, to be issued in February, 1967. A follow-up study, of more detail and suggested re-training procedures, is now being developed.

Other

Continued cooperation with the National Student Association's Books for Equal Education, with assistance given in program, accounting, and office space. The director served on the program's advisory committee as well as that of the NSA's Southern Project.

From a special grant, financial assistance was given for work with Student Human Relations Councils through the state Councils in Alabama, Florida, South Carolina, Tennessee and with the YWCA.

Approximately $2,000 was provided for consultants in housing in local communities.

In addition to those referred to elsewhere, seminars were sponsored and/or jointly sponsored and financed on SRC-state Councils relations; state Council staff and presidents' program seminars; a special conference of media leadership with the Southern Education Foundation; and, a meeting of the staffs of SRC and the North Carolina Fund.

There was heavy involvement of SRC staff and policy people in planning and participating in The White House Conference, "To Fulfill These Rights."

We assisted in the recruitment of Negro students in the eighth grade who would be apt candidates for attendance with substantial scholarships to six top Southern "prep" schools in 1967.

There has been developed, in cooperation with the American Jewish Committee, a six-point study on Southern white opinion, and efforts being made to influence opinion. Three parts have been commissioned. A series of studies will be issued and the full report may be published in hard-cover.

SRC sponsored in Atlanta a luncheon for approximately 250 persons from throughout the region interested in voter registration at which Attorney General Nicholas deB. Katzenbach was the speaker.

Work has begun with the Trevor Arnett Library, Atlanta University, on preserving the records of the Commission on Interracial Cooperation, SRC, and other documents of historical value. We began with Mrs. Jessie Daniel Ames, the taping of reports of SRC founders and other pioneers in race relations work.

Through a special grant for that purpose, Joan Titus has been commissioned to do a biography of Lillian Smith.

The first few pages of this report attempted to analyze the region and its posture at the end of the year. The remainder has been a report of our work and hopes.

Yet, I remain unsatisfied with it. It may be adequate for recording our efforts during the year. It does not do justice to the Southern Regional Council. Perhaps no limited set of words can; certainly I do not have them.

This report -- given reality -- pays little enough respect to the 40 people in Atlanta who are the SRC staff; to their talents, their dedication, their life-time-built (young and old) experience, their determination. It doesn't even mention humanly the jockeying for office space or the status of a window, the demand for wages and hours, the chucking of it all as the whole staff stuffs envelopes long after hours during a mail room crisis. It has none of the frustrations of those who travel and miss home at nights and on weekends, or of the madness of being trapped on an airplane with a seatmate who tells of the good schools the "colored" of his community have. It tells nothing of late night and weekend phone calls that remind you a staff is not working at but living a job. It tells nothing of the confused, frantic, excessive, varied traffic through an office, the mountain of paper which cannot be shuffled fast enough, the satisfaction -- seldom but just often enough -- of knowing it makes a difference.

And, if the staff was not fully in focus, the Council leadership was more grievously ignored. The staff of SRC has great responsibility, but in the eleven years I have been with this agency there has been no time, to my knowledge, when the Council's leadership was not essential; when it did not indeed lead and guide this agency. (In fact, the staff, as we all agree, is fortunate. We are paid to do what we want an opportunity to do. Our policy leadership gives without remuneration; at least without monetary remuneration.)

Therefore, this report does not to any degree reflect the life of the busy banker, incredibly overworked, who leads this agency and works seriously at it. It does not reflect the willingness of the time given -- the phone calls and the days away from home and practice -- of the busy physician. There is no mention of the lady who might be traveling extensively -- and wants to -- but instead worries about whether or not this Council can be supported. There is the gentleman from Tuskegee who comes repeatedly to Atlanta leaving job and family complications to serve. And these are but examples of the many.

Beyond this of course there are our friends. The good people who send us small personal -- and deeply valuable -- contributions even though we never solicit them. The foundation officials who know we are not givers and receivers but partners in a common cause; they responsible to see that we do it right and we careful to prove it -- but partners nevertheless.

There are, finally, not only staff and members and friends, but basic policy as we see it, which is a part of the inadequately reported section of this report. These include the concern that we not become bureaucratic, that we help others find resources rather than attract them for ourselves (while still hoping to pay the rent), the determination that we preserve the skills and approaches we have developed over more than twenty years, and that we not succumb to the temptation, if we could, of becoming grandiose and swollen.

Every year one is tempted to fall back on the cliché of "a good year." But 1966 was a good year. And, I am sincerely grateful to those -- the Council Members, the staff, our friends and colleagues -- who made that good year possible.

I. Introduction

It's a great feeling to be a voter. Having a vote means you have power —power to help decide who is going to run your city, your county and your state. Whom you elect determines the sort of government, good or bad, you will have.

This booklet explains, as briefly as possible, how our government works. Thousands of people have been voting in this state for years and years, and they still don't know how their government works. So we hope you'll want to share your information with your neighbors and friends.

In Georgia, we have three kinds of government: city, county and state. Of course, everybody comes under the state government. It has more power than the other two.

But not everybody lives in a city under a city government. If you live on a farm or in a home outside the city's borders, or in a town too small to have its own government, your local affairs will be run by the county government.

II. Cities

Six out of ten people in Georgia live in cities. We have two kinds of city government in Georgia:

1. A mayor serving with a city council or board of aldermen. This is the most common and best-known form of city government. The mayor is elected by all the voters in the city. Sometimes the aldermen or councilmen are each elected from their own home district. Often, however, they are elected by the whole city.

2. A city manager government. The people elect commissioners (or councilmen), and the commissioners hire a city manager. The commissioners make the decisions and the city manager carries them out and also runs the everyday business of the city. The commissioners can fire the city manager any time they don't like what he is doing.

But no matter what the type of government, all Georgia cities are limited in their powers. The state Legislature gives permission for a place to form a city. As we'll see later, the state has much of the say about important things.

Here are some things that city governments can do:

- Appoint heads of departments like chief of police, fire chief, director of water supply department, director of sanitation department and so on.
- Pass local laws about city affairs—local traffic ordinances, building codes, sanitary codes, zoning rules, sewer and street maintenance.
- Regulate and run city services and properties like parks, pools, libraries, jails, airports, auditoriums and so on.
- Decide which city employees will be hired and how much they will be paid.
- Set up police courts to try people for breaking city ordinances and traffic laws.

In a few cities, the city government operates its own schools. But in most Georgia communities, education comes under the county government. And all schools are at least partly run and partly paid for—indeed, largely paid for—by the state.

Where does the money come from to pay for city government? We'll talk about this later when we look into taxes.

III. Counties

Georgia has 159 counties. The Georgia Legislature decides how counties shall be governed. The State Constitution says that all counties must be run alike, but some exceptions have been made for the big counties such as Fulton, DeKalb and Chatham.

Most counties are run by a county board of commissioners. There can be as many as eight commissioners or as few as one. Most counties have three.

These commissioners can do the following:

- Hire and fire county employees.
- Keep up county roads and public buildings.
- Name (with state okay) the people who run the county welfare system.
- Run county jails and work camps.
- Set county tax rates.

The commissioners, however, do not hire sheriffs. Unlike city police chiefs who are appointed to their jobs, sheriffs are elected by the voters in each county. Their salaries and those of their deputies are paid for out of county funds. In addition, a few counties hire a police force to work alongside the sheriff's office.

Besides the sheriff, several other important county officials—such as the tax commissioner and the coroner—are elected by the voters.

IV. State

Our state government is divided into three parts:

- The executive branch, which means the governor, the officials appointed by him, and the various elected department heads.

- The legislative branch, which means our state Legislature—called the General Assembly. This is the body which passes our state laws.

- The judicial branch, which means our courts of law, including the Supreme Court of Georgia which has the power to decide whether or not the laws passed by the General Assembly are in line with the State Constitution.

Georgia's form of state government is similar to that of the United States government. In Washington there is an executive branch headed by the President, a legislative branch which is the United States Congress, and a judicial branch headed by the United States Supreme Court.

The reason for this division of powers is that no one branch should become so strong that it runs the country—or the state—by itself. With these three branches of government, one branch can check and balance the power of the others.

Let's look now at each of these branches.

V. Governor and Executive Branch

The governor of Georgia holds the highest political office in the state. He has power to appoint people to important jobs. With the okay of the Senate, he can appoint members of:

- The State Board of Education (it oversees the public schools).

- The Board of Regents, which appoints a director called the chancellor (it supervises the state-owned colleges).

- The Board of Corrections (which runs the prisons and decides what prisoners are to be assigned to which prisons).

- The Board of Pardons and Paroles (which decides when prisoners shall be released from jail).

- The Board of Industry and Trade (to bring new business to Georgia).

He also can appoint heads of state departments without anybody's consent. Among these important jobs are:

- The director of the Family and Children Services Department (Welfare Department), which runs welfare services in Georgia.

- The supervisor of purchases. This department buys all the printing and office supplies for the state, and rents or buys all the services and property the state needs.

- The revenue commissioner. He collects the state taxes which are discussed in a later chapter.

- Director of the Department of Parks, which operates all state-owned park land.

In addition, the governor is commander of the state militia, and the State Patrol is directly under his control. The State Patrol is a state police force that is used mostly for catching traffic offenders on state roads. But the governor can have the State Patrol take over law enforcement in a county or town if a local sheriff or police chief is not doing his job.

Because the governor can make so many appointments, his power in his political party is very great. Generally he is the state leader of his party. People are willing to work for the party if they know they stand a chance of getting good jobs and power if their candidate wins.

But the power of the governor only begins with his power to appoint people to jobs. He also helps make laws with the following legislative powers:

- He can call a special session of the Legislature. If he has some matter he wants the legislators to take up that they didn't do when the regular session was going on, he can call them back to act on it. A special session is limited to ten weeks, but it can be less.

- He can end the regular session of the Legislature. If the two houses of the Legislature—the Senate and the House of Representatives—cannot agree on when to adjourn, the governor can set the time.

- He submits the state budget to the Legislature. He tells the legislators how much money he thinks the state has to spend, and what he thinks they ought to spend it on.

- He recommends bills to the Legislature. At the beginning of each legislative session, the governor makes a speech, telling the legislators what condition the state is in and what bills he thinks are needed. He can also send special messages on particular bills to the Legislature. Then, various legislators introduce the bills that the governor wants. Of course, a bill that everybody knows the governor is backing gets much more serious attention than one that is backed by just one or two legislators.

• He can veto a bill. Veto means "I forbid." Even after the Legislature passes a bill, the governor can veto, or forbid, it. Then, if the legislators still want it, they must pass it again. But this time, two-thirds of the members must vote for it—not just a simple majority.

In the judicial branch, the governor has the power to:

• Hold up a death sentence until the Pardons and Paroles Board reviews the case.

• Appoint judges to vacancies in the Supreme Court of Georgia, the Georgia Court of Appeals and the state Superior Courts until the next regular election.

• Tell the attorney general to bring law suits in the state's name. He may also ask the attorney general to give him a ruling on whether or not some action or some law is unconstitutional. The attorney general's ruling normally is followed until somebody questions it in court.

Although, as we have seen, the governor has the right to appoint many officials, not everybody in the executive branch is appointed by him. Twelve executive department heads are elected by the voters. Here are some of the most important ones:

• Commissioner of Labor. This office is important because the commissioner of labor runs the State Employment Service. If all Negroes get sent out to apply for jobs as janitors or laborers and nothing else, the commissioner of labor ought to hear about it. Remember that the State Employment Service is entirely paid for by the federal government, and under the Civil Rights Act of 1964, it is not supposed to discriminate against anybody.

• Attorney General. He is the lawyer for the state in all cases in the Supreme Court where the death penalty is involved and in many other kinds of cases, too. He can start an investigation when he hears that a state employee is dishonest or is doing something seriously wrong. He represents the state in court actions. And as we said before, he gives opinions on whether certain official actions are permissible.

• Superintendent of Schools. As already explained, the governor appoints the Board of Education. But the superintendent of schools is elected by the voters. Since the superintendent's job is full-time and the board's is not, the everyday direction of the public schools is left to the superintendent. He and the board together make the rules for running the schools, decide what shall be studied, and decide what books and materials the schools will use. The superintendent and the board also have the power to stop giving state money to a school district which does not follow standards of health, safety and the proper number of teachers, as well as other rules. Although they have this right, they hardly ever use it.

• Comptroller General. The comptroller general has many duties. He keeps records of the money appropriated to state departments. Also, he regulates insurance companies. He is the state fire safety commissioner, which means that he is in charge of fire prevention laws. And he also handles the laws for small-loan companies. If you think a small-loan company is a "loan shark"—that is, charging interest that is too high or making unfair charges—tell the comptroller general's office about it. The same goes for complaints about insurance.

• Secretary of State. The secretary of state supervises state elections and is in charge of certain chartering and licensing functions of the state.

Another important elected official is the lieutenant governor. The lieutenant governor replaces the governor if the governor dies or resigns. But the lieutenant governor's main job is to preside over the State Senate when the Legislature is in session.

VI. Legislature

The Legislature—the General Assembly—makes the laws we live under in Georgia. There are two houses in the Legislature: a House of Representatives and a smaller Senate. Both houses must pass a bill before it can become a law.

The laws these men pass must not violate the Constitution of the State of Georgia and of the United States. When a citizen feels that a law violates the State Constitution, he may sue in the state courts to have it declared unconstitutional. If he feels that a law or a part of the Georgia State Constitution violates the United States Constitution, he may sue in a federal court.

For instance, a suit in federal court changed the way we elect our Legislature. It used to be that every county, no matter how small in population, had at least one representative. A big county, even if it had 100 times as many people in it as a small one, had only three representatives. This meant that the vote of a person living in a county with very few people counted for much more than the vote of a person living in a city.

A group of Georgians felt that each person's vote, no matter where he lived, should count the same as each other person's vote. They sued in federal court to get equal representation for all citizens. The court agreed with them and ruled that every legislator must represent the same number of people. This idea is called "one man, one vote." Under the federal court's ruling, the state was divided up into new House districts and new Senate districts. This division, called reapportionment, gives city people their fair share of representatives.

VII. How Laws Are Made

Even though you are not a legislator, you—as a voter—can play a part in enacting good laws in Georgia. Let's take a look at a bill that was introduced last year into the Senate and follow its progress to see what part the legislators played and what part the citizens played in its outcome.

As our example, we shall use the bill to cut down the number of crimes which can be punished by the death penalty.

During the 1965 General Assembly, a resolution was adopted creating a special Senate committee to study the death penalty. This committee was appointed because more and more people in Georgia want to do away with the death penalty, and they told their legislators about this. Much of the feeling for getting rid of the death penalty comes from Negro groups, who know that Negroes are sentenced to death in Georgia more than four times as often as whites.

The reapportioned Legislature meant that for the first time there were two Negro senators, and they made the wishes of their voters known. So voters played an important part in having the special committee created.

When a special committee is created by the Senate, the lieutenant governor, who is the chief officer of the Senate, appoints the members to serve on it. In the House, committee members are appointed by the speaker of the House. In this case, the lieutenant governor appointed ten senators.

The special committee decided to study the death penalty by getting in touch with all the other states and finding out whether those dropping it had more crime or less, and any other facts the other states could tell them.

As a second and more important step, it held public hearings in Athens, Rome, Albany, Macon, Savannah and Atlanta. At these hearings, people for and against the death penalty got up and told how they felt and why.

If you hear or read in the paper that a public hearing on a bill that interests you is going to be held, you can write to the chairman of that committee and ask for a chance to speak. But keep in mind that it means much more if you are speaking for a whole group of people, such as a church or club or civic improvement association.

After the hearings, the special Senate committee wrote a report. As happens many times, all the members did not agree. Six of them felt that the death penalty should be kept; four felt it should not be. So the report had a section where the six—the majority—stated their opinion, and the four—the minority—stated theirs. Then they all got together and agreed on a bill which would reduce the number of crimes which can be punished by the death penalty.

The steps that a bill goes through are:

1. The bill is introduced into the Senate (or into the House; either way the procedure is the same) and only the title telling what the bill is about is read.

2. The bill is referred to a committee dealing with that subject.

3. Then public hearings may be held, such as the ones about the death penalty. But there is no law that says public hearings must be held. So if you think a particular bill ought to have public hearings, you should write to your legislator and ask him to see that they are held.

4. After a bill goes to committee, one of several things can happen to it:

- It can be sent back to the Senate (or House) floor to be passed, just as it is.
- It can be sent to the Senate (or House) floor to pass, but with some changes.
- It can be sent out with no recommendation, either to pass it or not to pass it.
- It can be sent out with a recommendation that it do not pass.
- It can be held in the committee so that no debate will take place in the Senate (or House). By holding a bill this way, the committee can kill it.

5. When the bill comes to the floor, the whole bill is read. Then the legislators debate it, make changes in it, if necessary, and finally vote on it. To pass the Senate (or House), a bill must have the votes of a majority of the members.

6. If the bill is passed in the Senate (or House), it then goes to the House (or Senate) for the same routine. Of course, if it is defeated, that is the end of it for that session of the Legislature. Any changes made by either house must be approved by the other house.

7. If the bill is passed by both houses, it goes to the governor for his signature. We have seen that he can either sign it into law or veto it.

In the case of the bill to reduce the number of crimes which could be punished by death, it was passed by both houses and signed into law by the governor.

In future sessions, bills to abolish the death penalty probably will come up again. For even though a bill may be defeated in one session, there is nothing to prevent it being introduced in the next session and the next.

VIII. The State Constitution

The constitutions of some states are short, because they are meant to be used as a guide to the people and the legislators for general policy. But Georgia's Constitution goes into great detail about a lot of different matters.

As a result, many laws cannot be passed because they do not agree with some part of the State Constitution. A constitutional amendment was necessary, for example, before action could be taken on a school lunch program, or special treatment for juvenile delinquents, or consolidating school districts.

Any legislator may bring up an amendment to the Constitution. If it is approved by two-thirds of the members of the House and the Senate, it is placed on the ballot at election time for the voters to pass on. In the 1966 election, voters had to pass on 20 statewide amendments, plus local amendments.

Some amendments affect only the people of one county, not everybody. These are voted on only by the people in the county or counties involved. These are the local amendments we mentioned above.

As a result of all the restrictions in the Constitution, it has had to be amended almost 400 times since 1945.

IX. Courts

Georgia has three kinds of courts: inferior or lower courts, superior courts, and appellate courts. Let's take them one by one.

1. Inferior Courts (lower courts)

These are courts which try small civil (non-criminal) cases and misdemeanors. A misdemeanor is a small crime like being drunk and disorderly. There are several kinds of inferior or lower courts, and the kind of court depends in part on the community. There are:

- Justices of the Peace. Georgia has 1,600 justices of the peace, most elected from rural areas. They can try civil cases where up to $200 is involved. They cannot try any criminal cases, but they can issue a warrant for a suspect's arrest. They can also question the suspect and hold him for a criminal court. Justices of the peace don't have to be lawyers or have any legal training.

- Police Courts. Most cities no longer have justices of the peace. In part they have been replaced by police courts, which are most often run by a judge or official with some kind of legal training. These courts can try traffic offenses and persons accused of breaking city laws.

- City and County Courts. These courts can rule on civil cases like contracts and suits for damages. They can also try misdemeanors.

- Courts of the Ordinary. Every county has an ordinary. Part of his job is to be in charge of issuing marriage licenses, pistol-carrying permits and other licenses. He also is in charge of county elections. The other part of his job is to be a judge and rule on wills, estates, guardianships and insanity hearings. The ordinary can also try misdemeanors and traffic cases in counties where there are no city or county courts.

- Small Claims Courts. These courts are new. They only handle civil cases up to $500. The idea is that people can come into them without having a lawyer and the judge will settle the quarrel between them.

2. Superior Courts

Superior Courts try civil cases involving more money than those in lower courts, and certain special kinds of civil cases such as land title cases and divorces.

They can try criminal cases where felonies are charged. A felony is a more serious crime than a misdemeanor, ranging from robbery to murder, or any crime where the defendant might be sent to the state prison or given the death penalty.

Superior courts also have appellate powers. This means that if you feel the decision of a lower court such as justice of the peace or police court is wrong in your case, you may take the case (appeal it) to a Superior Court, and it has the power to overrule the lower court.

Superior Court judges are elected. Almost all of them serve four-year terms.

- Juvenile Courts. Every county over 50,000 in Georgia has to have a juvenile court, and those with less people can have one if grand juries in those counties recommend it. Here are two important things to think about in our juvenile court set-up:

Many people have the idea that a juvenile must be tried in a juvenile court in a county where there is one. This is not true. A Superior Court judge can take the child out of the hands of the juvenile court and try him as though he were a grown-up. The judge can send him to a regular prison, not a juvenile home. The Georgia Supreme Court has said that a Superior Court judge may do this.

Juvenile court judges are appointed by the Superior Court judge in that district, and they do not conduct their courts in the regular way. They try to be informal, and do away with all the rules which might stop them from understanding what is best for the child. By relaxing the rules to help the child, the court often takes away his right to have a lawyer and to question witnesses, and to defend himself. However, the U. S. Supreme Court recently has said that a child has a right to have a lawyer in juvenile court, although this does not mean that the trial has to be carried out under adult rules.

3. Appellate Courts

If you feel that the decisions of the lower courts are wrong in your case, you may take the case to a higher, or appellate court. One appellate court is the Georgia Court of Appeals. The highest appellate court is the Georgia Supreme Court. Both of these courts hear appeals from all over the state.

X. Jury System

If you are being tried for overtime parking, or breaking some city law, you don't usually ask for a jury trial, although it is your right to have one. If you do, your case might be held for the Superior Court, since not all lower courts have juries. Those lower courts which do have juries have six-man juries. Superior Courts have 12-man juries.

How is a juror picked? The judge or judges of the Superior Court appoint a jury commission for each county in that area. Members of this jury commission serve six years. They make up a list of jurors from the voter registration list. Whenever a jury is called for, the names are taken from this list. A special list is taken from this larger list to be members of the grand jury. We'll talk now about the difference between a grand jury and a trial jury (petit jury).

• The grand jury is composed of from 18 to 36 people. The grand jurors have two jobs:

They hear evidence against a defendant charged with a felony and decide whether it is enough to hold him for a trial. They listen to the policeman who arrested him and the witnesses against him. They don't decide whether the defendant is guilty, just whether it is reasonable to think he might possibly be guilty. If they feel that there is enough evidence against him to bring him to trial, they indict him. This is also called returning a true bill. If they feel there isn't enough evidence against him, they return a no bill, and the defendant is let go.

The grand jurors also look into public matters. They can investigate the honesty of public officials, make recommendations about county roads, education, public morals, political events, needed laws, and a whole lot of other things. Their opinions—called presentments—are not laws and do not have to be obeyed. But they sometimes get a lot of public attention.

• The trial jury (petit jury) decides questions in the trial itself. It listens to the facts and decides the case. All twelve people on a jury must agree on the decision or verdict.

• The Solicitor General. The lawyer who prosecutes (tries) the criminal case for the state, both before the grand jury and the trial jury, is called the solicitor general. He is elected for four years, and there is one solicitor general for each Superior Court district.

XI. Education

Here are some facts to remember about Georgia's educational system:

• All public schools are under the State Board of Education and the state superintendent of schools.

• Every county is a school district. Therefore, we have 159 school districts, plus 36 more independent school districts set up for some of the cities. This means that a small county with not many school children in it has to have a grammar school and a high school in it whether it has enough pupils or not. An amendment to the Constitution voted in 1966 permits two or more counties to combine their school systems if they want to. This is called school consolidation.

• Schools are paid for by the county or city, plus the state, plus the federal government. Out of every ten dollars the state spends, six are spent on education. On the other hand, the counties put up a relatively small amount. The federal government gives increasingly large amounts of money—for school lunches, special educational programs, and anti-poverty programs. Federal money can be taken away from a school district that refuses to stop segregating its pupils.

• Despite all the local, state and federal funds provided for Georgia's public schools, the amount of money being spent on each child is a good deal less than is spent in most states.

• Our teachers are paid less than the national average salary for teachers. Many have less training than they should.

It's pretty plain that there is much to be done to improve education in Georgia. That is why it is so important to take part in local school board elections. Just as important as voting in school board elections is having people who care about education go to school board meetings. If school board members know that the voters are watching them, they are much more likely to do a good job.

XII. Welfare

The Welfare Department—now called the Department of Family and Children Services—gives the following services:

- Hospital care to the old, the blind and the disabled.
- Money to support needy old and disabled people.
- Relief money to families with small children who have no one to support them.
- Homes for children who have gotten into trouble with the law or who have been abandoned.
- Help to unmarried mothers.
- Adoption services and foster homes.
- Licensing of maternity homes, adoption agencies and day-care centers and nurseries.

Most of the money for these welfare services—seven dollars out of every ten—comes from the federal government, which gives it to the state to spend.

The State Department of Family and Children Services has the power to supervise how welfare is run. But actually, the everyday running of welfare is left in the hands of county welfare departments.

XIII. Highways

Every time you buy a gallon of gas, you pay a state gasoline tax. All of this money, under the Georgia Constitution, must be spent on highways and roads. This means that there is a great deal of money to spend for this purpose.

The State Highway Department decides where state roads shall be built. Then the department gets a road contractor to build it. The road contractor is picked among several who bid on the job, and the one who puts in the lowest bid gets the contract. Or, the individual county makes a contract with the Highway Department to build a road, and it often goes out and hires its own road contractor.

The State Highway Board has 10 members—one from each congressional district. The Highway Board members are elected by the members of the Legislature in each congressional district.

XIV. Taxes

The money to run our city, county and state governments comes from taxes. Every time you buy something—food, gasoline, a pack of cigarets, or something to wear—you are paying taxes. There are also taxes on owning property and earning money. Often you are paying taxes without even realizing it.

Most of the state's money comes from sales taxes. There is a general sales tax of three cents per dollar on almost everything you buy in Georgia. Then there are special taxes on such items as gasoline, cigarets, beer and whisky. The state government gets a relatively small amount of money from such things as corporation and personal income taxes, although the income tax is a major source of revenue for the federal government.

The major source of income for cities and counties is the property tax. This tax is supposed to be levied on an equal basis on your house, your land, your car and everything you own. If you feel that the valuation on your house or land or other property is unfair, the agency to see is your local board of tax assessors.

Cities also take in fairly large sums of money from such things as business licenses, water bills, and street and sewer assessments.

XV. Conclusion

Most of the officials we have been talking about in this booklet are elected. That means that you have a chance to vote on whether or not they hold office.

A governor, for example, is elected every four years. Most of the sheriffs, judges, county commissioners, and others, state and local, also are elected every four years. There are a few—for example, U. S. representatives—who run every two years. And U. S. senators are elected every six years.

This means some sort of election is held in the summer and fall of every even-numbered year. And other elections, such as those for mayors and city councilmen, often come in between. Then there are bond issues for borrowing money and elections on policy matters (which are called referendums).

So there are many, many elections. You should make it your business to vote in every one of them.

How do you find out about these elections? You keep your eyes and ears open. You stay interested in your government. You try to find out as much as you can—from newspapers, from radio, from television, and from people you know and trust—about when elections are held and who is running. Stay informed about issues, problems and needs.

This booklet doesn't tell you all you need to know about government. No booklet can do that.

When all is said and done, it is up to you to find out as much as you can about what is going on. It is up to you to let representatives and other officeholders know how you feel. It is up to you to register and vote.

This is the job of a citizen, and we are all citizens.

BLUEPRINT FOR SEGREGATION: A SURVEY OF ATLANTA HOUSING

BY SAMUEL L. ADAMS

Mr. Adams, former director of research for the Southern Regional Council and reporter for the St. Petersburg TIMES, is now doing research in the behaviorial sciences as a Russell Sage Fellow at the University of Wisconsin. He was a national finalist in 1965 for the Lane Bryant Volunteer Service Awards. He will return to newspaper work this summer.

In approaching the subject of Negro housing in Atlanta, I do so with a certain sense of trauma. I remember—more vividly sometimes than I wish—my family's experiences as the single Negro family on an otherwise all-white street in a Southwest Atlanta neighborhood. I remember the first night—the sound of gunshots fired above the house, the sight of cherry bombs and Molotov cocktails tossed on the lawn. I remember returning home with my wife and two children after a short trip to the city to find windows broken and streams of toilet paper decorating the front yard. I remember the sight of my trembling teenage daughter telling her mother and me of an attempt by a white teenage motorist to run her down as she walked along the road from school. I remember the words of my six-year-old son telling us of being chased by larger white boys. "I wish I was white so they wouldn't do it." It is not possible to erase such memories.

Yet I would add, too, that such things could have occurred in any city of the United States; for when it comes to housing discrimination, no city in this country can cast the first stone. The study that follows, then, is not intended to be an indictment of Atlanta, but rather a survey of the forces at work in any urban environment to produce and maintain segregation in private and public housing. Atlanta was chosen partly because it was my home, but also because of its importance as a bellweather city of the South, and its many similarities to industrial centers of the North. It was thought, too, that last year's racial clashes in Atlanta—shattering the city's carefully cultivated public image as a model of white and Negro co-existence—gave new urgency to attempts of concerned organizations to meet the city's housing crises, and that hopefully this survey could be of value to them.

When I first sought a home in Atlanta in the summer of 1965, I talked by telephone with white real estate agents, sometimes asking them about specific houses I knew were vacant. Not knowing they were talking to a Negro, some of the agents advised me against considering homes in certain so-called "fringe" areas because, as they put it, "the niggers have started moving in there." After seeing me, these realtors would either refer me to Negro real estate firms or to white firms which sold and rented property in Negro areas. Often white agents candidly told me that they did not handle property for Negroes.

The role of white realtors in promoting segregated housing is thus easily seen. The part Negro realtors play is less obvious perhaps because they are victims of the system perpetuated by whites. One Negro realtor interviewed in connection with this article said that when a group of whites attempting to maintain racial balance in their neighborhood asked him to cooperate by discouraging further Negro purchases in the area, he refused because he believes in open occupancy. But in the absence of a federal open occupancy law permitting Negroes to live wherever their financial resources permit and thus discouraging the migration of race-conscious whites seeking lily-white neighborhoods, the practical result of his refusal will be to help bring about total transition of the neighborhood, in other words, to perpetuate segregation. Asked exactly how he would proceed in handling a transaction involving the entry of a Negro family into an all-white neighborhood where no pattern of transition previously existed, he indicated that he would move with great caution. First, he said, he would impress upon the family the hazards of what it was doing, the possibility of violence, the probability of social snubs. He said if anything violent should occur the first question his friends and associates would ask him was why he let the transaction go through. They would look upon him as having exploited the Negro buyer. This, he said, could hurt his business.

All evidence indicates that segregation is increasing in Atlanta housing. According to the Atlanta Regional Metropolitan Planning Commission, one of every four housing units occupied by Atlanta Negroes in 1964 were located in census tracts in which not a single white family lived. This compares with a ratio of one in seven only four years earlier. Over half of all Negro housing units in 1964 were located in tracts which were 95 per cent or more Negro-occupied, the Commission says. In 1960, the proportion was 50.6 per cent. A recent study[1] of Negro housing in major American cities showed that the index of segregation in Atlanta increased between 1940 and 1950 from 87.4 per cent to 91.5 per cent and to 93.6 per cent in 1960.

Atlanta has one of the largest concentrations of Negro millionaires in the nation. The city also has a sizeable Negro bank, and a savings and loan association (both with neighborhood branches) as well as Negro insurance companies, a mortgage-purchasing firm and many real estate establishments. This Negro money and business acumen has influence, but it has not kept whites from controlling land inside and outside the Negro community and developing most of the Negro housing (close to 90% according to some key real estate leaders).

[1]Negroes in Cities—Residential Segregation and Neighborhood Change, by Karl E. Taeuber and Alma F. Taeuber. Aldine Publishing Company, Chicago. 1965. This was a block by block examination of Negro housing.

Other mechanisms from outside the Negro community that influence housing patterns in the city discussed in this study include the following:

- Street closures and the planning of thoroughfares that do not facilitate easy travel between Negro and white residential areas.
- Placement of cemeteries, public housing projects, and open green areas where they inhibit any spill-over of Negroes at the fringes of the crowded ghetto.
- Violence and intimidation, including some thirty bombings in recent years.
- Differential zoning and application of land clearance and condemnation regulations that combine to make Negro areas less desirable.

In the absence of federal open occupancy legislation, Atlanta Negroes are faced with extremely difficult problems of land acquisition. Despite the fact that in the past five years the Negro population of the city has increased from 38 per cent of the total to 43 per cent, Negroes still occupy less than 20 per cent of available land. What they do occupy has not come to them easily. A little historical background is instructive here.

Atlanta's origins as a railroad center established early residential patterns that persist today. Property near railroad yards was generally considered by whites to be undesirable and was thus more easily available for Negro occupancy. A look at an Atlanta map shows a heavy concentration of Negro occupancy along the Atlantic Coast Line routes on the west, the Southern routes on the south, and the Georgia Railway on the east. Railroad tracks, it should be noted, provide ready-made barriers useful as buffer zones between white and Negro sections, a fact that land developers and city planners historically have utilized.

Negro expansion from the central city until after World War I was to the east, but—meeting white resistance in the twenties—turned westward. This was a trend due primarily to the enterprising efforts of Negro businessman Herman E. Perry. Perry began a home-building program on Atlanta's west side with an original plot of some 200 acres. A Pittsburgh Courier feature story on Perry in October, 1931, said that 511 homes had been built on the land with costs ranging between $3,000 and $8,000. Nine years later in 1940, almost 40 per cent of the city's Negroes lived on the west side and the westward trend was thus firmly set.

Negro expansion into the westside white community of Mozley Park established precedents of action by Negro and white real estate interests. The section is located approximately three miles from downtown Atlanta, and is situated almost in the middle of the Negro expansion path of the twenties and thirties. As early as 1937, a Negro doctor bought some land in the community, but failed to build on it due to threats from white residents. From then until shortly after World War II, the community waged a successful cold war to remain all-white. In this resistance, they sometimes had the overt cooperation of City Hall. Longtime Negro residents of surrounding areas, for instance, recall that the streets leading from West View Drive into Negro areas were unpaved for the first one hundred yards or so. West View Drive was a main thoroughfare which white residents of Mozley Park insisted be a Negro-white demarcation line.

In 1948, a Negro war veteran who had inherited some land in Mozley Park decided to build there. Despite white threats, he refused to be intimidated and proceeded with construction plans. A Negro real estate broker meanwhile bought three nearby homes from white owners and sold one to a Negro minister. When the minister moved in, 200 or so angry whites were on hand to make their displeasure known. The minister moved shortly thereafter and the Georgia Real Estate Commission revoked the broker's license for allegedly misrepresenting to his clients that all of the houses on the block were going to be occupied by Negroes.

When the Negro veteran occupied his house in 1949, all three houses were back in white hands. Gradually, however, over the next few years some white owners—lured by the prospect of selling their homes at inflated prices—sold out to Negro buyers. It was thus obvious to most real estate men of both races that Mozley Park had become a neighborhood "in transition." City officials—deciding that this transition should come about as peacefully as possible—organized a biracial group (without, however, any official status) to act as a kind of ex-officio mediation board between white and Negro residents. Out of the committee's efforts grew an agreement between the all-Negro Empire Real Estate Board and the real estate committee of the Atlanta Chamber of Commerce, the practical result of which was that Negroes in exchange for the entire Mozley Park residential section plus a city park and city school located in the community voluntarily agreed not to expand Negro occupation beyond the limits of the western boundary of West View Drive.[2]

The agreement at the time was hailed by many as a model example of how white and Negro interests could work together for the good of both races. By comparison with the inaction of other southern cities faced with similar problems of Negro expansion, certainly the agreement was unique. Overlooked—or, more probably, deliberately ignored—was the fact that the committee operated strictly within the framework of segregation. The business of the committee was to effect "peaceful transition," not neighborhood stabilization or peaceful integration. Also it was commonly acknowledged that few white sellers failed to sell at a good profit. More important, some Negro civil rights leaders now say, was that the acceptance of an artificial demarcation line beyond which Negroes would not move, in effect, was an admission by Negro real estate interests of the inevitability of segregation. When—a few years later—Negro expansion needs again reached a critical state, the agreement was seen to have had only short-term benefits.

In the forties when expansion in the western area of the city was still held back to a considerable degree by the white settlement in Mozley Park, Negro development had already begun to by-pass and encircle the area. Negroes settled in the Bennett subdivision in 1946, the Simpson Heights subdivision in 1947, and the Porter Drive-Leathers Circle Subdivision in 1948-49. In 1949 the Fairhaven subdivision located to the west and north of Mozley Park was developed. It is instructive here to note the role of the Atlanta Transit System in protecting white interests in Mozley Park. Those who were active in bringing about the Fairhaven development recall now their impatience with the transit company in not providing a direct bus route into Fairhaven, which contained some 233 new homes. The most efficient route pattern, they point out, would have been to extend the West Hunter Street bus through the contested Mozley Park area and on into Fairhaven. Despite repeated requests for such a routing, the transit company refused and commuting Negroes living in Fairhaven were forced to walk to and from the terminal point of the Westview Drive bus line to the south and west of Mozley Park.

An effort in 1962 by a Negro doctor to move beyond the limitations set by the earlier agreement of Negro realtors into the bordering white upper middle class neighborhood of Peyton Forest resulted in the notorious Peyton Road barricade. The street was literally blocked off by the city with no pretense at any motivation other than to prevent further Negro expansion on Peyton Road. A city ordinance was passed to legalize the closing. Called everything from the Berlin Wall to the Warsaw Ghetto, the barricade was so deeply resented by Atlanta Negroes that today, five years later, many scoff at the city's national image as a paragon of fair and just race relations. The barricade, they said, convinced them that despite high-sounding public pronouncements, the city government will betray them when their needs are in conflict with white prejudices.

The Peyton Road barricade did not withstand a court test. A Fulton County Superior Court struck down the ordinance and city officials—alarmed by the reaction to the barricade within the Negro community (Negro voters were responsible for the election of moderate Mayor Ivan Allen over arch-segregationist Lester Maddox, who has since been elected governor of Georgia) did not appeal the case. Legal barriers to Negro entrance into Peyton Forest were eliminated but white residents were not prepared to give up without a fight.

Resisting an anticipated Negro invasion, the all-white Southwest Citizens Association put together a $200,000 war chest with which it hoped to purchase property from whites who were threatening to place their homes on the Negro market. The white group, however, did not have the city's big financial muscle behind it and could not match the combined resources of Negro insurance companies, banks, and real estate firms. Peyton Forest racial barriers were broken but the cost to Negro capital was high. One white owner, for instance, was able to bid up his property between the two groups from $65,000 to $105,000.

The so-called Peyton Road affair resulted in a code of ethics between a group of white and Negro realtors which made the following points:

1. All listings would be accepted regardless of color.
2. The brokers would cooperate and meet when tensions developed in transitional neighborhoods.
3. There would be no physical barriers erected to further segregation.
4. There would be no deliberate blockbusting.

Some Atlanta Negroes today believe that had major white capital really wanted to block Negro entrance into the area, it could have done so either by outbidding the Negroes or exerting enough indirect pressure on them to force them to give up. But apparently these white interests decided that keeping Peyton Forest all-white was not worth a major power play and certainly they were wise enough to see that Negro occupancy of the area represented a natural extension of Negro neighborhoods. Had Negro financial interests been attempting to buy property in Buckhead, Sandy Springs, or Paces Ferry Road—all gilt-edged white neighborhoods—the story would doubtless have been different.

It takes a great deal of capital to develop what the real estate man calls "dead land," more capital than Atlanta Negroes are able to muster independently of whites. White financial institutions, consequently, are depended upon by Negro real estate men and builders for making loans to their clients. This role obviously gives white capital a heavy hand in determining where Negroes live. An arbitrary limit was placed on the amount that would be lent to a Negro, according to a Negro attorney who moved to Atlanta in the early 1960's and sought money to build a sprawling $40,000 home. The lawyer said the limit was $20,000. But the head of a lending institution said limits are based on considerations of both the borrowing individual and the location of the house he wants to build. In other words, bankers will not lend as much to build a house adjacent to a railroad track or next to a fertilizer plant, locations in which Negro residences are more likely to be than whites, and locations which are not of their own choice.

White apologists for the locations of Negro residential areas like to say that Atlanta "just grew" and that no conscious efforts have been exerted by city planners to create a Negro ghetto. This is difficult enough to accept in view of the Peyton Road barricade just referred to, but there is other equally persuasive evidence to the contrary. Drive from downtown Atlanta six miles southwest through Atlanta's bulging westside Negro community on out into the unincorporated areas of Fulton County, and you will find exactly three streets that provide fairly direct access between the Negro area to the northwest and the white area to the southwest. In a city the size of Atlanta which always is struggling to relieve traffic congestion problems, this is a situation difficult to fathom on any sound or logical basis. Moreover, it is evident from driving through many Negro areas that land planners have also used railway tracks without under or overhead passes, parks, planting strips, and cemeteries to complicate the process of going from Negro neighborhoods to white. What strikes the observer most strongly about Atlanta street patterns, however, is that there is presently no circular route of travel and transportation. Virtually all public transportation terminates in or near the heart of the city; transfers from lines serving the Negro community to lines serving the white community generally require a walk of several blocks. At about 8 a.m. on regular work days, the downtown sidewalks are crowded with Negro domestic workers making their way to work in white homes, a trip that may take up to two or three hours each day if the waiting periods are included. The normal economic and commercial interests of the city would be served by an efficient circulation system. The city is presently constructing a circumferential highway that will permit circular travel at the edge of the city, but the benefit here is for motorists rather than public transportation.

In Atlanta, special land-use permits sometimes speed neighborhood change from white to Negro. It is not unusual for land owners to seek permits to intensify land-use in a community once a few Negroes move in. The erection of multi-units and the changing character of the area by the addition of light business and commercial buildings help speed the remaining whites on to suburban or other areas not threatened by change. But cooperation of Negroes and whites in the newly integrated West Manor community recently caused the failure of an attempt to re-zone land for more intense use in a transitional area. The land owners sought to change the zoning from single family residences so that an apartment building could be constructed. A white woman who lived in the area told the zoning committee at a hearing in July, 1966: "I don't want these apartments in; I want our neighborhood to be as nice as possible because I don't want to move out. I have a Negro family next door to me, but I will not move."

Zoning ordinances, Negro leaders say, also have had the effect of producing buffer zones and also of blocking Negro expansion. Thus, according to one Negro realtor, undeveloped land bordering so-called fringe neighborhoods has sometimes been zoned for light industry with the tacit understanding, he believes, that no industry is actually to be so located. Near Peyton Forest, he said, such a zoning took place prior to the barricade, but later when Negroes began moving into the area, the land was re-zoned for apartments and duplexes.

Whether there is differential enforcement of building code inspections between white and Negro developers is not easily documented. Many Negroes suspect that such is the case since whites do most of the developing in both Negro and white areas. The city has no Negro building inspectors, a fact that leads some observers to suspect that white developers of Negro housing are permitted certain short cuts or borderline violations more frequently than Negro builders.

Even in some agreed-upon growth directions, some affected whites have taken matters into their own hands and resisted Negro encroachment. Explosives were planted near several newly purchased fringe area homes as Negro migration threatened the Edgewood and Bankhead areas in the eastern and western portions of the city. The blasts came frequently in the first half of the 1950's, tapered off for several years and increased again in the early 1960's. Bombings have represented only part of the intimidation and harassment meted out to Negro families who jump racial barriers in Atlanta. Cross-burnings and telephone threats have also been used to keep housing boundaries intact. How effective are such methods? The answer has to be qualified. They do not stop migration altogether, but they do serve as a strong deterrant and delaying tactic. No one is anxious to subject his family to post-midnight blasts or threats.

More sophisticated whites have sometimes tried to retain the prestige of not living on the same streets as Negroes by having their street's name changed. Thus, Hunter Road becomes Mozley Drive at Chappel Road. As Negro expansion crept toward Ponce de Leon in the central northeast area a few years ago, the part of Boulevard Avenue beyond Ponce de Leon was renamed Monroe Drive and the extension of Parkway beyond the Negro residences was renamed Charles Allen Drive.

During much of the last decade, federal government activity has increased both population and housing change in Atlanta. An article in the Atlanta Journal of November 4, 1965, noted these revealing facts and figures:

> Government activities have displaced 15,500 families during the past nine-and-one-half years, statistics show. From 9,000 to 12,000 of these families were in income brackets low enough to qualify for public housing. Yet during the same period from January 1, 1956, to June 30, 1965, only slightly more than 4,000 new low-cost units of housing were made available. That leaves a housing deficit of 5,000 to 7,000 units for poorer Atlanta families.

Enforcement of the city's minimum housing code displaced approximately 2,240 additional families according to the Journal article. Actually, the deficit is probably even higher. The figures do not reflect what is generally accepted as a significant population increase among poor Atlanta Negro families.

In large measure, those forced to relocate are on the lower income rung, and that is indicative of the fact that greater economic problems are created for low income families. Extremely hard pressed are those Negroes of small means, especially those who need but are unable to qualify for the inadequate supply of public housing.[3] Private Atlanta rentals run approximately 20% higher than low-rent projects charge for comparable facilities. And developers have built few homes in the city for prices less than $10,000. In a spot check of the cost of lots in the Negro community, none sold for less than $3,000, even though some were extremely small. The high land cost tends to make construction of modest homes more expensive to buyers and less profitable to builders.

Contrasting with the increased Negro share of the total city population is the lagging growth in the number of Negro housing units. Despite a drop in the percentage of whites in the total population, white housing units increased significantly. This suggests a continuing shift of families with children to suburbia and a counter movement of childless couples and single persons into high-rise apartments in the central city. At least one of these high-rise apartments in the upper middle income brackets was built on land from which deteriorating Negro housing was removed in urban renewal projects, and some of the cleared land was converted to industrial use.

The pinch that this trend of slum removal and the concomitant restrictions against open occupancy are making on Negroes is accentuated by a variety of programs considered progressive when properly administered—i.e., highway construction, condemnations to make way for public buildings.

Evidence that highway construction and urban renewal are among factors influencing crowding of low income Negroes is reported in the 1963 annual report of the Fulton County Department of Family and Children Services. Entitled Appalachia in Atlanta, the report states that bulldozing for renewal and highways has indeed cleared away some slums, but a result has been the pushing of many slum dwellers back to the fringes of the areas cleared, making their overcrowded conditions even more crowded.

This is not reflected in the overall tract figures of census data, for the units are too large. And no block-by-block analysis was undertaken. Nevertheless, field trips to hard-core poverty pockets suggest increasing density of some of the poorest families; for example, the Welfare Department's report discloses that " . . . for five years prior to 1960, 102 welfare recipients lived on Merritts Avenue, N. E. (adjacent to an urban renewal area), while during the last five years, 192 welfare recipients have lived on the same street." That latter figure represents about a 90 per cent increase in the density of Merritts Avenue welfare recipients.

According to Appalachia in Atlanta, "the physical condition of the shelter occupied by 54 per cent of welfare recipients is classified as ranging from fair to very poor; 76.84 per cent of them are living in unsanitary conditions, and 55.08 per cent are residing in housing needing renovation or repairs." Moreover, since much of the Negro housing migration tends to be into low income white fringe areas, old, formerly white houses newly purchased by Negroes are likely to deteriorate rapidly. This is especially true of borderline homes like those Negroes are buying in Atlanta's West End and Kirkwood areas and, more recently, the Center Hill area.

While the overall quantity of Negro housing is inadequate and the Negro's proportional share of land use falls far below Negro population percentages, an equally important problem is the condition of the housing that Negroes occupy. The 1960 Census of Housing showed that three of every four units occupied by Negroes is rented compared with two of every four for whites. Of this number of rented houses, only 48 of every 100 occupied by Negroes were classified as standard. The proportion for whites was 78 per 100 units. Twenty per cent of Negro rental housing was classified as dilapidated which by Bureau of Census definition means "does not provide safe and adequate shelter in its present condition and endangers the health, safety or well being of the occupants." Only five per cent of white rental shelter was so classified. Of houses occupied by Negro owners, 29 per cent were classified as below standard, compared with six per cent for white.

Not only is the Negro disadvantaged from the standpoint of availability and quality of housing, he must pay premium prices for the inadequate facilities available to him. These prices are rising. Between 1950 and 1960, median rentals to Negro families in the Atlanta area more than doubled their cost, rising from $23.72 to $52.00. Most Negro families pay from $40.00 to $59.00 a month in rent.

In absolute terms, cost of housing does not seem to be high for Negroes in the Atlanta area, but when the costs are related to his small income, they seem to constitute a heavy drain. Average income for all families in Atlanta in 1959 was $5,758, but the average income for non-white families was only $3,033. Although the non-white family income is about half the average for all families, the non-white family pays only $15.00 less then the average rent. On a proportional basis, the non-white family pays substantially more rent than the white Atlantan.

One cannot point to slums and deteriorating housing and at the same time deny that housing renewal is desirable. But we have come close to that by indicating that urban renewal and other federal programs, as presently constituted, often create more problems than they solve because of a refusal on the local level to come to grips with causal factors. Unless precautions and programs are undertaken when slums are bulldozed and high-rise projects are erected in new areas, the already inadequate social integration that formerly existed in the slum community is replaced by complete social normlessness that may contribute to dislocation, crime, hopelessness, despair, low self-concept, violence, and hate. In other words, it takes more than leveling slums to destroy slum values. On the other hand, dissolution of the slum, getting rid of the concentration that feeds the slum subculture, is a possible action that would strike at the heart of the problem and its causes. So bold action, not limited to improvement of existing housing, must be undertaken to revitalize the slum and to redistribute its people throughout the city, not in concentrated pockets or enclaves.

If the area is revitalized, there may be a two-way street, some people with more desirable values and higher socio-economic status moving in and some slum dwellers moving out. Meanwhile, the revitalization itself, if it involves the people of the community, also may contribute directly toward changing values, the most important of which relates to the importance of education and self-help and political activity.

Chances are high that if one knocks on the door of a slum home during schools hours, he will find school-aged children inside caring for younger siblings. Other such children may be found roaming the streets of their neighborhood, missing valuable time needed for continuing their already lagging education. Schools, properly used, are the most effective community institutions for upward mobility in that they fit people for better jobs. Some improvement of ghetto schools is taking place, but there also is some retrogression, especially in the Negro schools where principals select their best teachers to transfer to white schools where some token desegregation of faculties is taking place. In return, they sometimes get white teachers who were having trouble on the job prior to being transferred to ghetto schools. What is needed is a system-wide effort to find the very best teachers regardless of their race, to wrestle with the knotty problem of educating youngsters whose shoulders still are weighted with centuries of discrimination and deprivation. So outstanding should be the teachers and the program that parents from other districts will seek to have their children enrolled in these special demonstration schools.

The same tack should be taken regarding services and amenities. Street paving, lighting, municipal services, and a tax structure that would encourage home improvement are examples of programs that might be undertaken to revitalize the area and to attract outsiders whose values will infiltrate and help alter the existing value systems of people who need to be taught that they too are human and do count for something.

Political pressures being what they are, the kind of program I am suggesting cannot be undertaken with politicians calling the shots. Neither should it be left completely in the hands of activists who have the commitment but do not understand the subtleties of the problem. One innovation for programs such as these are authorities headed by a professional who has been trained for the job and who is being paid for producing.

But to get the job done, he must know something about community organization and be able to motivate mass action. While some knowledge about urban planning would be desirable, it would be secondary to the ability to work with people and effect programs.

The National Committee Against Discrimination in Housing, a New York City based non-profit agency, has suggested an innovation that might be equally effective. NCDH believes that fair housing centers that help people in the ghetto to find housing in various other areas of the city should be the initial program for any dissolution of the ghetto.

But no matter which approach is taken, what must be remembered is that the responsible group—the fair housing center, the fair housing authority, or whatever—must not be so tied to the political and financial power structure that its professional workers are blocked from doing the job. It won't be easy. And the effort will be expensive. But the gains will be many times over the cost if the programs are successful. Because of the ominous threats of slum violence and property destruction, and because of the losses to the GNP caused by social and housing deprivation and related ills, urban centers, and indeed the nation, cannot afford any long delay from bold corrective action.

INTRODUCTION

This study was prepared by John A. Brown and C. Bron Cleveland of Candeub, Fleissig and Associates, under the direction of Morris B. Fleissig, Supervising Principal. This firm and its research unit, Triad Institute for Urban Research, have nationwide experience in the field of housing and community development. Triad Institute is now in the process of preparing a detailed handbook on slum problems for the Southern Regional Council.

MR. MAYOR: CAN WE SOLVE OUR HOUSING DILEMMA?

American cities today face mounting social, economic and physical problems with the increasing formation and enlargement of housing ghettos. Housing ghettos aren't new; they have existed for generations and have become more complex and difficult to cope with over the years, especially as they relate to the overall economic and social status of Negroes.

On the one hand, some Negroes are making economic progress through better jobs, better education, more political representation and a relative prosperity resulting from the prosperity of the nation as a whole, although gains for Negroes are not proportional to those for whites. On the other hand, many Negroes haven't been able to attain their democratic rights for equal opportunity in America because of increasing segregation in housing. This type of segregation clearly separates Negroes from the society which they seek to become a part of. It makes other forms of segregation easier to apply or brings about "de facto" segregation. Though gains are made in integration of buses, schools, public accommodations and public facilities, Negroes still find themselves segregated because of where they live. Thus, Negro neighborhoods are often served by "Negro" schools, "Negro" parks and "Negro" shops (often owned by whites), and Negroes often ride to and from work on buses carrying only Negroes.

Regardless of the specific factors which have created segregated housing, neighborhoods and ghettos, the following problems require attention:

1. In-migration. In-migrants to urban areas find themselves in an unfamiliar environment. The in-migrant seeks a measure of security by living with people of the same racial or ethnic background.

2. Declining Neighborhoods. Many neighborhoods are declining because of inadequate planning, a low level of city services, substandard community facilities, insufficient code enforcement and rehabilitation activities and a lack of organization at the neighborhood level.

3. Inadequate Housing Supply. There is inadequate housing for low-income and moderate-income families, and not enough housing at any price for Negroes either in the city or in the suburbs. Home and home improvement financing is generally not available to people living in declining neighborhoods.

In addition, urban growth, which takes place at an increasingly larger scale than before, frequently results in the removal of smaller Negro communities near white communities as new business, industries and subdivisions take over large tracts of land. There is also a general trend toward separation of families by income, regardless of race, especially in single-family housing. Finally, we must recognize that, in some cases, there are conscious efforts by whites to avoid any social contact with Negroes and vice versa due to racial prejudice, ignorance or fear.

The implications of further housing segregation include:

1. Further alienation of frustrated Negroes and alarmed whites and a further breakdown in communications between the two.

2. Severe housing shortages for Negroes resulting in over-use of the existing limited housing supply and the formation of new slums at a rapidly accelerating rate.

3. Economic losses for white families who abandon their homes because they fear integration of their neighborhoods. (See "Neighborhood Stabilization: A Program," a Special Report by the Southern Regional Council, May, 1966, which discusses this problem.)

4. Creation of central city (and occasionally suburban) ghettos of enormous size which rapidly become physical and social slums and result in severe economic losses to the city and its taxpayers.

Regardless of personal, political, or philosophical feelings on racial matters, leaders in American cities must face housing problems forthrightly and evolve solutions to them. Here is a three-point program designed to help local leaders to find a solution for their individual cities. This program deals primarily with in-migration, neighborhood stabilization, and the provision of adequate housing for all citizens.

IN-MIGRATION

The Problem:

Both Negro and white families and individuals are moving to cities from rural areas in droves. Much like the immigrants who built our country, they both flee one way of life and are ill-prepared for another. Most come with high hopes which are frequently shattered soon after arrival.

Generally, only limited attention is paid to the problems of accommodating and acculturating rural in-migrants. The problems of these people are either ignored or treated without reference to the total need which must be satisfied if they are to adjust properly to the new environment. The in-migrant finds himself a stranger in a new city with little or no idea of where to go for needed help. He may need major assistance in job training, housing, consumer education, urban living, public health, and health, education and welfare services generally. Without proper assistance he may become an unproductive liability to the community. High concentrations of such people contribute materially to housing and ghetto problems.

Steps Toward a Solution:

A new approach is required to meet these problems. It might include the development of an organization or agency specifically charged with the responsibility of working with in-migrants. The objectives of such an agency might include the following:

1. To become familiar with each family and help each family to adjust to its new environment.

2. To aid families in acquiring housing of adequate size within their financial means in a decent neighborhood.

3. To maintain contact with all families for a year or more as they adjust to inner city living.

4. To aid in-migrants in finding jobs or job training, remedial education, and any other special aids which may be required and are available.

5. To work closely with the planning commission, the housing authority, the welfare department and other social agencies on comprehensive physical and social development plans for the areas where in-migrants live (receiver areas).

6. To identify gaps in existing social services and coordinate available services to make them available to in-migrants.

This agency could also establish and staff in-migrant centers in receiver areas. The centers should be closely coordinated with the all-purpose neighborhood centers discussed in a later section. The proposed agency and in-migrant centers might be funded by the Office of Economic Opportunity or other federal aid programs, the local department of welfare, board of education, the United Appeal, private contributions from civic and professional organizations, or a combination of these sources.

It is especially important to recognize the problem of rural in-migration as a special problem requiring special attention, rather than treating it as part of other problems. The method of handling the problem will vary from city to city depending on size, rate of in-migration, availability of services and other factors. In some cities it will apply to both Negro and white families.

NEIGHBORHOOD STABILIZATION

The Problem:

The supply of existing housing is limited. In most cities adequate housing for low-income Negroes is in extremely short supply. Adequate housing for all low-income families is generally not being built rapidly enough to meet the demand. As a result existing housing is being overcrowded and abused. Until the supply can be increased, existing housing must be maintained and made more livable.

Property improvements in declining areas must be made more worthwhile. Existing neighborhoods must be protected so they will remain good places to live and raise a family. No areas of our cities can be "written off" or city services and facilities abandoned even if future demolition seems certain. Lending agencies should be discouraged from "writing off" whole neighborhoods from improvement or repair loans. Particularly, schools, school programs and school equipment must be well maintained since fear of a decline in the quality of schools is a major factor in the loss of middle-income families. Neighborhoods must gain physical stability, social stability and economic stability.

Steps Toward a Solution:

In order to accomplish the goal of neighborhood stabilization, a number of steps can be taken:

1. Neighborhood Planning. The neighborhood can be designed to provide a better living environment. Neighborhood plans should build in amenities and eliminate adverse influences. Amenities include adequate parks, playgrounds, schools, streets and city services. Adverse influences include heavy traffic, noxious odors, vibration and noise, flashing signs and such. The addition of a new public facility such as a special school, neighborhood center, library or cultural facility can frequently have a major stabilizing effect on a neighborhood. New housing, public housing for the elderly, and even luxury housing can be used as a catalyst to spark a general uplift of an area.

Of course, luxury housing in such areas will not be attractive to developers unless bonuses in terms of reduced land costs and the protection of a strong plan are provided.

It is clear that simply building new homes or rehabilitating older homes and moving families to such homes is not adequate to meet our current problems. In every case, steps need to be taken to improve the human resources of the families within the city. While environmental amenities are being re-examined, plans for strengthening the social services of the neighborhood should also be formulated. The agencies engaged in social planning and those involved in physical planning should better collaborate their respective efforts. Meaningful neighborhood plans should not be prepared in a vacuum; they should reflect both social and physical objectives.

2. City Services. In addition to neighborhood planning, a major increase in city services is needed in declining neighborhoods: stepped-up street cleaning and maintenance, improved trash and garbage removal, more convenient welfare services, enriched school curricula, and improved transportation services, to name just a few, will add to environmental improvement.

   Where needed, welfare centers in each neighborhood (as part of the total neighborhood center) would bring this service closer to home and provide a more personal relationship between the agency and the families than centralized welfare agencies. Enriched school curricula would tend to reduce the exodus of stable families from the neighborhood while providing extra help for low-income families where needed most. Similarly, poor transportation service to low-income residential areas limits job opportunities and causes undue hardships. Transportation planning must take into consideration the job opportunities and the employment needs of all families, especially those of low income.

   Cities have sometimes cut back sharply on services such as street cleaning and maintenance, garbage and trash removal and transportation in certain areas because of pending urban renewal action or overwhelming problems of blight. This has been unwise even though revenues are not obtained to the extent necessary to support services.

3. Community Facilities. At the same time improvements to physical facilities such as schools, parks and libraries are needed. Physical facilities tend to decline as neighborhood housing declines. Overcrowding of residential structures generally follows physical decline. This overcrowding results from an influx of lower income families who occupy housing units converted (usually illegally) to accommodate more families. Families with more children and less income to spend on leisure time activities overtax existing public facilities in such areas. The need for facilities improvement and enlargement must be recognized and provided for in neighborhood stabilization efforts.

   Rehabilitation of existing public structures and new landscaping of older parks and public grounds can be a significant addition to stabilization efforts. In addition, new facilities should be built where needed. Schools and school grounds in declining areas and areas of racial transition are of particular importance since fear of a decline in the quality of school facilities is also a major factor in the loss of middle-income families.

4. Code Enforcement and Rehabilitation. Varying levels of rehabilitation and code enforcement are needed to effectively carry out programs which will maintain the existing supply of housing available to low-income families. The standards for both rehabilitation and code enforcement must be realistically geared to the capabilities for carrying out such programs and in many cases may require different levels of improvement based upon the condition of the structures, the capabilities of the families to pay and other factors.

A comprehensive program including health, sanitation, fire and housing code enforcement is needed.

In areas of housing code violations where structures are owned by landlords specializing in the operation of slum property, every aspect of the code must be enforced constantly to take the high profit out of such activities and to protect the rights of the tenants. In many areas this will require changes in tax policies to encourage the repair and rehabilitation of rental housing and to discourage the practice of taking all of the income as profit.

5. Neighborhood Organizations. Grass-roots neighborhood organizations, churches and civic groups* can be a vital force in improving conditions through organized neighborhood efforts. Existing organizations should be utilized where possible. Such groups can help to keep the community well informed, serve as forums and sounding boards for airing neighborhood concern, and can provide needed feedback and guidance to the city's leaders in their decisions regarding each neighborhood. When properly organized and assisted by responsible social agencies, they serve to strengthen all other stabilization efforts.

   Wherever possible, especially in declining areas, total neighborhood centers should be established to serve as public information centers, recreation centers and social service centers. They should be staffed to assist with area-wide home improvement projects, promote cultural interchange among families of varying backgrounds, and coordinate social services available in the city at large. These centers could be run in conjunction with the facilities proposed for in-migrants and welfare recipients mentioned above and should be a major element in the neighborhood planning program.

*Including PTA's, professional associations, service clubs, taxpayers' associations, improvement organizations, fraternal organizations and women's clubs.

HOUSING

The Problem:

In addition to neighborhood stabilization, cities need new supplies of housing to accommodate new families and to replace aging units and units being demolished. Current efforts by cities to supply this housing are obviously not meeting the need as reflected by generally inadequate housing and shortages of housing for families of varying incomes. In many cases, both the housing and the neighborhoods are rapidly declining.

Public housing projects have often been too large and have lacked the amenities needed to make them part of viable living communities. These amenities include shopping facilities, parks and open spaces, transportation services and school facilities. They have frequently been built on low-cost, left-over land in areas which are not suitable for family living by virtue of being surrounded by slums, being isolated from the facilities and services offered in the central area of the city or being located in predominantly commercial or industrial areas. In some instances, they have become institutional in character, partly because of their design and partly because of the structure of admission requirements and "project" administration.

New private housing is generally not being built to meet the needs of lower income groups. Most of the housing that is now being built by private developers for low-income groups is of poor quality, is not geared to current family sizes, and frequently is crowded onto insufficient land.

Often there also exists a dual housing market for Negroes and whites which frequently makes housing more expensive for Negroes. In spite of being more expensive, Negro housing is often located away from places where Negroes work, in areas where public facilities are declining and where industries and businesses detract from the residential suitability of the neighborhood. Housing for Negroes, at any price, is extremely limited. The supply which does exist is mostly hand-me-down housing; unit size is not adequate to meet family needs, and the units have often been improperly converted from larger apartments or private homes.

Low-income families also often have problems in acquiring loans for new homes and home improvements. In many cases, interest rates are higher for Negroes than they are for white families, regardless of income. In other cases, no money is available to Negroes because they lack good credit references.

Steps Toward a Solution:

Any program to improve housing must be geared to and emphasize the needs of low and moderate-income families. Such a program should consider the following:

1. Formation of a Local Development Group. To meet the overall housing needs of our communities, it may be necessary to supplement the normal activities of local housing development. In many cases the formation of a public-spirited local development group can help to meet these needs. Such a group should include representatives of leading financial institutions, businessmen, builders, utility companies, architects and planners and realtors. The function of this group would be to carry out activities in support of a comprehensive program of housing for all of the community's citizens. For example, they could help to find sponsors for low- and moderate-income housing and assist in attaining necessary financing. They could also purchase and hold land for housing, serve as non-profit sponsors themselves, and provide technical assistance in the total housing effort.

2. Suburban Homes for Negroes. Negro families generally have aspirations similar to those of white families. As their incomes and family sizes increase they often prefer the type of family amenities that suburban living offers. Housing should be made available in the suburbs for Negroes. If Negro families live throughout the urban areas in patterns similar to white occupancy, the trend toward panic selling and movement away from integrating areas will diminish. Success in providing more suburban housing for Negroes will rest on many of the other recommendations in this program.

3. An Increased Scale of Code Enforcement and Rehabilitation. In addition to stabilizing neighborhoods, increased code enforcement and rehabilitation is essential if existing housing supplies are to be maintained. A greater effort must be made to prevent the deterioration of individual structures that so often leads to the decline of the neighborhood as a whole. Immediate steps should be taken to save areas that have started to slip. In some cities the practice of "writing off" certain sections of the city that show signs of decline has created major slum ghettos. This practice should be stopped, and rehabilitation and code enforcement activities increased so as to maintain a supply of livable housing, especially where housing is in short supply.

4. Improved Home Financing and Home Improvement Financing. A financial group to deal with the specific problem of providing home loans and home improvement loans to low-income families and to Negroes is needed in most cities. Negroes are occasionally unduly penalized when applying for loans due to past credit performance. The financial group proposed could influence existing lending practices to assist deserving families in getting needed money. This group could also provide financial counseling to low-income families.

5. Fair Housing Legislation. Fair housing legislation on the local level is the most effective way to provide more housing for Negro families. Local fair housing legislation will assure a legal basis for opening housing facilities to all families and will eliminate dual Negro and white housing markets. It is also important to try to obtain fair housing legislation at the state and federal levels, especially where it is not immediately possible to obtain it on the local level.

6. Sponsored Moderate-income Housing. To provide a balanced supply of housing, efforts by private and public agencies can be supplemented by employee and employer groups, religious groups, fraternal organizations, and similar organizations. These organizations can help to provide housing for moderate- and low-income families. The provisions of Section 221(d)(3) of the National Housing Act permit such sponsorship and provide very favorable interest rates. This type of housing might be particularly appropriate in urban renewal areas where such housing would replace slum housing.

7. Public Housing. A number of changes in public housing policies would further most cities' overall housing needs. Utilization of the newer forms of public housing assistance to purchase FHA or VA foreclosures and other private housing for use as public housing would be especially helpful in distributing low-income families throughout the community.

Combinations of public and private housing facilities can be used to increase the total supply of public housing. Rent supplements can be used by cities to reduce the need for additional public housing facilities, to place public housing families in private housing such as Section 221(d)(3) units, and to provide units needed for extra large families. Local public housing agencies can increase their total number of public housing units by direct purchase of privately constructed units. Such agencies can also sponsor, co-sponsor or lease, Section 221(d)(3) units for use as both low- and moderate-income housing.

The construction of smaller, scattered public housing projects throughout the community is also recommended. Smaller public housing projects are advantageous because they reduce the institutional atmosphere of public housing and meet family and social needs better than the traditional projects of the past.

The historical design of public housing does not meet the needs of the present pressing housing problems. Unit sizes are frequently too small to accommodate the families now in need of housing. Many older public housing projects should be rehabilitated to reflect larger family sizes and to provide community facilities, shopping, health facilities and the other aspects of full community life.

In many cities, public housing projects are racially segregated. In other cities, while direct segregation is not taking place, projects are not racially balanced and admission practices and placement procedures tend to create segregated projects. Such practices should be stopped if these projects are to serve the full needs of the community. Although the federal government requires a policy of desegregated public housing, local housing authorities must make the effort to integrate projects. A policy commitment by local political leadership can also be effective in integrating public housing.

8. Relocation. Urban renewal, highway construction, and other public programs have often displaced numbers of families without replacing demolished housing resources. Providing relocation housing should be a major aspect of any community's housing program. Unless carried out adequately, relocation only creates housing shortages and increases housing problems in other areas. Relocation can be the impetus for the construction of new public and/or private housing to meet low-income family needs. Since public programs often require the relocation of large numbers of Negroes, overall housing efforts must take into consideration the needs of such displacees. Agencies responsible for relocation of these families should seek housing throughout the city rather than limiting their efforts to the so-called Negro housing market.

SUMMARY AND CONCLUSIONS

The proposed programs involve many different agencies of local government and many federal agencies. In addition, new governmental agencies may be needed to carry out some aspects of recommendations discussed here. Obviously, a new agency will be needed to implement a comprehensive program for rural in-migrants in most cities. Neighborhood centers, fair housing commissions and fair housing centers do not now exist in most cities. The new programs will require a great deal of initiative and follow-through to achieve the desired results.

Inherent in any major improvement program today is the need for strong municipal leadership by the elected representatives of the people and an informed citizenry. The programs proposed here can only be developed by a combination of public and private groups working jointly with and through the political leadership of the locality. The proposed top-level development group and improved home improvement financing will require the cooperation of business leaders in the community. Sponsorship of low- and moderate-income housing by employer and employee organizations, religious associations, fraternal groups and other non-profit groups will require a commitment from informed citizens. At the same time, the program should build in provisions for citizen involvement at the grass roots level. Existing and new neighborhood organizations and civic clubs can be the nuclei for neighborhood participation.

The proposals can only serve as a guide. No programs can be developed or be successful unless local people realize the need for them and design them to suit the needs of their particular communities.

APPENDIX

Financial Assistance for Neighborhood Improvement and Housing

A wide range of public assistance programs has been approved by the Congress in recent years. These programs can provide major impact to neighborhood stabilization efforts if applied imaginatively and in coordination with one another. Coordination of resources at the local level is needed to stop the decline of neighborhoods. Some of these programs can be used to help finance new facilities. Others provide direct assistance to private property owners where public programs are underway.

A partial listing of federal financial assistance programs available for carrying out many of the actions recommended here include the following:

In-migration

- Low-income housing demonstration grants are available from the Department of Housing and Urban Development under Section 207 of the National Housing Act.

- Community Action Program funding is available from the Office of Economic Opportunity. Such funds can be used to establish a program expressly for helping in-migrants adjust to urban living.

- Funds for adult basic education are available from the Department of Health, Education and Welfare.

- Assistance with manpower development and training activities is available from the Department of Labor.

Neighborhood Stabilization

- The Department of Housing and Urban Development has a number of programs available that can help to finance neighborhood stabilization efforts. Here is a partial listing:

  Grants for neighborhood facilities, such as neighborhood and community centers, youth centers, health stations and other public buildings to provide health or recreational or similar social services.

  Grants for urban planning assistance, including preparation of comprehensive community plans, and programming and scheduling of capital improvements (Section 701 of the National Housing Act).

  Open space and beautification grants, to provide parks and other recreation, conservation, and scenic areas or preserve historic places. Urban beautification and improvement includes such activities as street landscaping, park improvements, free planting, and upgrading of malls and squares.

  Code enforcement, rehabilitation and redevelopment grants, to upgrade blighted areas through combinations of repair of salvageable structures and demolition of economically irreparable structures, improvements to facilities and services including streets, sidewalks and utilities.

- Neighborhood service centers may be funded under Community Action Programs of the Office of Economic Opportunity.

Housing

- In addition to or in conjunction with code enforcement, rehabilitation and redevelopment grants mentioned above, direct housing assistance is available as follows:

  FHA mortgage insurance under the National Housing Act can be obtained for: (a) private loans for housing in urban renewal areas for sale or rent to moderate-income families under Section 220; (b) loans made by private lenders for repairs of existing housing under Section 220 (h); and (c) loans to finance low-cost homes for families displaced through governmental action.

FHA programs for families of low and moderate income in general are provided under Section 221 (d)(3) of the National Housing Act. These include: (a) insurance of mortgages to finance construction of rental and cooperative housing within the means of displaced families and families of low or moderate income; (b) insured below-market interest rate loans for rehabilitation rental and cooperative housing and; (c) rent supplements. Rent supplements are to provide decent housing for low-income individuals and families who are either elderly, handicapped, displaced from their homes by government action, are occupants of substandard housing, or are occupants or former occupants of homes extensively damaged or destroyed by a natural disaster. The housing must be owned by a private nonprofit, limited distribution, or cooperative mortgagor and financed with a mortgage insured by FHA after August 10, 1965, under its market-interest rate program for low- and moderate-income families.

Low-rent Public Housing Assistance, to aid communities to provide decent housing for low-income families who cannot afford standard private housing.

The 1965 Housing Act provides for 60,000 public housing units a year—240,000 in four years. Of these, an estimated 35,000 a year will be the traditional new construction. However, the new provisions permit an estimated 15,000 units a year to be bought from existing housing and rehabilitated if necessary, and an estimated 10,000 units a year will be leased from existing housing for short term use in meeting particular needs.

- Other loans and grants specifically for urban renewal areas, including direct grants of up to $1,500 to low-income homeowners and direct loans with maximum interest rate of 3 percent to property owners for rehabilitation of residential or business structures.

- The Demonstration Cities Act recently passed by the Congress will provide a new tool for major cities to attack housing problems on a comprehensive basis at a scale impossible up to this time.

THE UNITED
BANK

We have a new federal law that may mean more pay for you.

It is called the Fair Labor Standards Act, or the Minimum Wage Law.

You should know what the new Fair Labor Standards Act says about your job.

You should know what to do to get the wages the law says you are supposed to get.

Read this pamphlet for more information. See the back of this pamphlet for the name of someone to help you.

$ 40 a week pay

8 A.M – 12:00
1 P.M – 5:00 = 8 hrs. a day

½ hr. change clothes and clean up = 8½ hrs. a day work 5 days a week X5

42½ hrs. a week

$.94 an hour

42½ hrs. work ⟌$40 a week pay

How much is your weekly pay before deductions?

If you don't know for sure, ask your boss.

How many hours a week do you work?

When you figure your hours count in —

- time to change your clothes where you work if you are required to wear a uniform or work clothes
- time to get your work ready
- time to clean up your work
- time spent doing errands for the boss even if it is on your lunch hour.

Now divide the hours you work into your weekly pay (before overtime is figured).

The figure you get is your hourly rate.

If your pay is less than $1 an hour—or if your pay is exactly $1.25 an hour—

you may be entitled to a raise in your hourly rate.

If you work more than 44 hours in a week or if you work more than 40 hours in a week you may be entitled to overtime pay.

Does your son work in the kitchen of a big restaurant?

Are you a porter in a school?

Does your sister or daughter work in a laundry or dry cleaners?

Is your wife a cook in a hospital?

Anybody who has a job in any of these places probably should be earning at least

$1 an hour for 44 hours in a week and at least

$1.50 an hour for all hours over 44 hours.

If you already earn more than $1.00 an hour, you should earn time and a half (one and a half times your regular rate) for hours over 44 anyway.

If you work on:

A big farm that has at least 7 or 8 regular full time workers during the season or

A big motel or hotel then you probably should earn at least $1.00 an hour, but the law does not require overtime pay.

Here are some places where you probably should earn at least $1 an hour for 44 hours plus time and a half for hours over 44 —

Construction company

Big Retail store

Big drug store

Big automobile, trailer, farm implement dealer

Big gas station

BEFORE $1.25 ⟶ NOW $1.40

FOR ALL HOURS OVER 40 HOURS

$2.10 an hour

Maybe you have been earning $1.25 an hour or more for some time now.

If so, that may mean that you were covered by the Minimum Wage Law before, and beginning February, 1967, you should be given a raise.

You should now get at least $1.40 an hour for 40 hours work in a week
and at least
$2.10 an hour for all hours over 40 hours.

Do you work in a —

Bus company?

Department store?

Road repair crew?

Railroad station?

Wholesale company?

Big gas station?

If you do, and that job paid $1.25 an hour for 40 hours before February, 1967 — then probably after February, you should earn at least $1.40 an hour plus time and a half (at least $2.10) for overtime.

If you are a woman worker—and if you get paid less than the men for the same work—

you may be entitled to earn as much as they do.

If your boss employs school children during school hours—or if children are doing dangerous work even after school or in the summer—
this may be against the law

If your boss sells to the federal government or works for the government—you are protected by the minimum wage law.

Or write a letter or a postcard to the Wage and Hour Division of the U. S. Department of Labor nearest to you.

Or telephone the Wage and Hour
Division

Or go to the Wage and Hour Division yourself.

The people at the Wage and Hour Division will NOT tell your name to anybody.

You have a right to ask for help.

Your boss can NOT fire you for asking.

The addresses and phone numbers you need are on the back page of this booklet.

THE UNITED
BANK

The Wage and Hour Division will give you a report in a month or so.

If you are getting the right amount already, they will explain to you why you are not entitled to more.

If your boss has not been paying you the right amount, then he will have to begin to pay you the legal rate that you are supposed to get.
Also he may have to pay you back the extra amount that you were supposed to get for the whole time that you were underpaid

So you see, it is really worthwhile to ask.

SORROW SONG IN BLACK AND WHITE

BY VERA RONY

From 1956 to 1964 Miss Rony was Executive Director of the Workers Defense League and for the last two years of that period served in the same capacity for the League for Industrial Democracy. Since 1965 she has traveled through the South gathering material for a book on southern labor, to be published by Quadrangle Books, from which this article is excerpted. Other sections have appeared in THE REPORTER and DISSENT.

To realize the earth's generosity to those who have joy in sowing and reaping gives a deep sense of security and a faith in the rightness of things.

In prime television time, the day after Thanksgiving in 1960, the image of a famous newscaster appeared on the CBS channel. Slightly saturnine, humane, his natural elegance in chiaroscuro contrast to the dusty road, battered trucks, and milling people behind him, Edward R. Murrow intoned:

> This scene is not taking place in the Congo. It has nothing to do with Johannesburg or Capetown. This is a shape-up for migrant workers. The hawkers you hear are chanting the going piece rate at the various fields. This is Belle Glade, Florida. This is the way the humans who harvest the food for the best-fed people in the world get hired. One farmer looked at this and said, "We used to own our slaves, now we just rent them."

Harvest of Shame, television's first major probe of the soft underbelly of American affluence, was underway.

Thousands of viewers blissfully unaware of the years of horror pictures to come—the terrified and terrifying demonstrators, the blasted ghettos—responded with outrage and pity to these itinerant poor. But among a handful of knowledgeable viewers, the response was different. "Waal, it's a fine thing, of course," rumbled veteran farm labor spokesman H. L. Mitchell, in that slow, deep, flat-out delivery more evocative of Oklahoma than of his native Tennessee. "You know, the March of Time made a movie about southern farm workers in 1936. Millions of people saw it. It was gonna make a whale of a difference . . . . "

The history of agricultural labor in the South is the record of millions of people, of no single color or culture, to whom none of the miracle-making capabilities of America have made much difference. More graphically than Negroes alone, they illustrate the limits of traditional American meliorism. For they were stigmatized by no particular mythology or history; their sole handicap lay in the usefulness of their poverty to those who have wielded power in the South from 1877 until today. Leslie Dunbar says, " . . . The civil rights movement and the reforms coming from it are the culmination of a liberal era which began with the Great Depression. Civil rights was the final item on the agenda of modern liberalism." The record below should illustrate how irrelevant the liberalism of the '30's was for the southern poor of both races. In so doing, it suggests that, for the South, the final item on the liberal agenda may be more complex, far-reaching—and color blind—than civil rights alone.

"A Socialist Dry Cleaner from Tyronza"

After the new Business Bourbons broke the back of Populism near the turn of the century, there were only sporadic economic rebellions among the small farmers, tenants, and laborers of the most densely populated rural area in America, the Cotton Belt. Yet this vast, 125-million-acre span, stretching south from the Carolinas through the Atlantic states and west through Tennessee, Arkansas, Oklahoma, and Texas, sustained the poorest people in the United States. At the height of national prosperity, just before the Crash, farm families as a whole were earning one-third as much as urban families, or an average of $1,240 per year; farm families in the cotton states averaged $620. Since this figure includes planters and yeoman farmers as well as tenants, the last group must have survived at the subsistence level, if that.

Yet, being Southerners, many of them undoubtedly cherished, like the tenant-farming Mitchells, a modestly legendary explanation of their situation. H. L. Mitchell tells it this way:

> The founder of our family came from Northern Ireland to Charleston about 1750. Like my grandfather, he was a Baptist preacher. On his way to this country he was shipwrecked off the coast of South Carolina. The story is told that he had a bag of gold and a Bible but lost the gold. None of the Mitchells ever had any money afterward.

But nothing else in Mitch's childhood was legendary — by regional standards. At the age of 8 in Halls, Tennessee, he was chopping cotton and picking strawberries at 50¢ for a ten-hour day. About the same time, he learned that a Negro who had hit his father in a work dispute was promptly shot to death and his body dropped in the Obion River. By the time he was ten, he had seen his first lynching, and five years later, his second. But there, the adult was foreshadowed:

> They piled wooden boxes and pieces of wood around him and saturated the pile with oil. I was up near the front and I heard the man pleading for his life. As he stood there he gave what was alleged to be the distress call of the Masonic Order: "O God, is there no help for the widow's son?" Some leaders of the mob were Masons and they hesitated. But someone in the crowd yelled, "O hell, he's just a nigger Mason, let's burn him," and he set a match to the pile. Along with many others, I was sick and I never had any more use for the Masons.

In 1927, having completed his apprenticeship in the fields and four years of high school, Mitchell took a wife and moved to Tyronza, Arkansas, near Memphis, to begin his adult life as a sharecropper. However, he discovered that the housing provided by the large plantations dominating the area was such that "when it rained outside, it poured inside." Between the indoor weather and the outhouses, Mitchell abandoned sharecropping. Resurrecting an old pressing machine from his father's junkpile, he opened a dry-cleaning establishment.

In the beginning, the thriving little enterprise left him little time for reading — a prime avocation — or crackerbarrel discussion with gas station owner

Henry Clay East, his Vergil on the local scene. But by 1931, Tyronza, like the rest of the South, had succumbed to the Great Depression. Mitchell and his friend found themselves with abundant time for thought and plenty to think about. Farm prices were plunging like an avalanche and burying American agriculture in the economic debris. Between 1929 and 1932, produce prices had declined by more than 50% and net farm income by two-thirds. For rural America as a whole, it was a grave crisis — for the dominantly agrarian South, it was a catastrophe. And like most southern problems, it had not arrived overnight.

Down in the Ditch Together

When the southern "agrarians" sought surcease from the Depression by resurrecting the plantation ideal, Howard Odum reminded them that it was not the 200,000 planter-aristocrats who revived the South after the Civil War, but millions of yeoman farmers, industriously cultivating their 100-acre plots. By 1880, these sturdy citizens comprised more than two-thirds of all southern agriculture, yet their prospects had grown exceedingly dim. The small farmer's difficulty was sadly circular: He needed capital, but southern banks, tied to a one-crop economy, were too undercapitalized to offer him the high risk loans he required. Thus he was thrown back on credit merchants who demanded mortgages on his crops, thereby "converting the southern economy into a vast pawn shop." This burden of debt was further compounded by the low price of cotton, and the high price of tariff-inflated manufactures from the North. The resultant hardship and loss erupted in the Populist revolt. Said its thundering prophet, Tom Watson:

> You were born in plenty and spent your childhood in plenty. I had it too. Then you lost your houses. The sheriff's red flag was planted at your front gate. You and yours took down the family pictures from the wall, picked some favorite flowers from the grave and took your weary march out into a strange, cold world.

After 1896, when the insurgent, interracial phase of the Populist rebellion had been stoned, shot, and niggered to death, the farmer's weary march led most often to dependency. In 1880, about one-third of southern farms were tenant operated; by 1920, the figure had risen to 60%. As the South slid into the trough of the Depression, one-third of its cotton fields were claimed by the banks and insurance companies, while 5½ million dispossessed whites competed with 3½ million Negroes "for the new kind of slavery involved in tenancy."

For tenancy was, of course, a "boss and black" institution — the prosperous white South's adaptation to Negro "freedom." The black family, lacking land, mule, or hoe, went to work for the planter, who wanted steady labor without paying wages. As rent, the planter deducted one-third to one-half of the tenant's[1] crop, and for "furnish"—credit for seed, fertilizer, equipment, food, etc. (usually bought at the plantation store) — he took another 25% to 50%. A 1932 study of Negro tenants in Alabama showed that almost 90% "broke even" or "went into the hole." Only some 10% received any cash for their year's labor.

[1]Share tenants and sharecroppers are used interchangeably here because of their similarly subservient status. Technically, tenants furnished their own equipment and animals and usually paid 25% of their crop as rent whereas croppers, who owned neither, paid as much as 50%.

A Delta folk tale relates the experience of a wily sharecropper who was determined to beat the system. Shoving his four bales onto the scale, he watched the planter compute the supervision, "furnish," and interest charges, at the end of which that worthy informed him that, as usual, he had broken even. He wouldn't get a penny. Gleefully, the tenant tossed a hidden fifth bale onto the scale. "Dawggone," said the planter, "now I'll have to figger the whole thing over agin."

Nor did the planter's control stop at the purse strings. He also decreed what was to be planted, in what manner, where marketed, and what schooling, if any, the tenants' children would receive. In a soon-to-be-published history, Professor George Tindall says of this period, "The long shadow of slavery still fell across the vassals of King Cotton, white and black." But why did the once independent, self-respecting white tenants acquiesce? How were they restrained from rebellion? A famous social document, The Collapse of Cotton Tenancy, explains:

> Because of his economic condition, and because of his race, color, and previous condition of servitude, the rural Negro is helpless before the white master . . . This fixed custom of exploitation of the Negro has carried over to the white tenant . . . Yet it has been impossible to bring about any change, even to get the poor white workers to take a stand, since any movement for reform is immediately confused with the race issue.

Booker T. Washington said it more succinctly: "The only way to keep a man in a ditch is to get down there with him." So there they were, nine million of them — one of every four Southerners — living in the leaking, rotting shacks, eating the salt pork and hominy, bearing the ague which was malaria and the runs which were pellagra and the torpor which was hopelessness. When a minister investigating the high incidence of disease questioned a planter about the open-surface privies scattered over the tenant landscape, the planter assured him, "All that a sharecropper needs is a cotton patch and a corn cob." He said nothing about color.

In 1931, the statistics were not yet collected nor the causal relationship explored. But in Tyronza, Arkansas, it was enough to have eyes — and heart. Mitchell and East poured over the social nostrums of the day: Huey Long's "Every Man a King," and Gerald L. K. Smith's "Share the Wealth," reposing their confidence at last in the tiny blue books published for a nickle by Haldemann-Julius: "Clay ate up those little blue books," recalls Michell, "and if a customer came in, he'd slip them under his newspaper, so they would think he was reading the Memphis Commercial Appeal. The next thing I knew, he was out in the street telling everybody that the solution to all the problems of the world was a socialist society."

When Norman Thomas brought his presidential campaign to Memphis in 1932, the 5,000 people who turned out to hear him included the two theoreticians from Tyronza. Shortly thereafter, the Socialist Party boasted a branch in northeast Arkansas. "We probably had as many members in the Tyronza local as the Socialist Party has in the whole country today," says Mitchell. "There must have been a thousand of us, mostly sharecroppers—black and white. I think it was the educational work we did there that later made it possible to organize the union on an interracial basis. However, his neighbors were not yet ready for a union. That required a final, precipitating grievance which was supplied, ironically, by none other than the immortal champion of the Common Man and newly elected President of the United States, Franklin D. Roosevelt.

FDR, the Planters, and the Peasants

In FDR and the South, Professor Frank Freidel comments, "Few figures have more significantly shaped southern destinies than a New Yorker who liked to think of himself as also a Georgian by adoption." There follows a vivid evocation of Roosevelt's affection for Warm Springs and the rural South as a whole:

> Roosevelt enjoyed relaxing in the magnificent country house of Cason Callaway, one of the largest of the textile manufacturers and a benefactor of Warm Springs, listening to the singing of Negro musicians dressed like old-time plantation hands. Also, Roosevelt dreamed of turning the miserably debt-ridden small farmers, sharecroppers, and field hands . . . into self-sustaining, self-supporting small farmers, each on his own homestead. It was one of Roosevelt's fondest dreams.

We hear a wild snicker from the young militants, and it does sound preposterous 35 years later, but FDR cannot be dismissed as a caricature "white liberal." His Secretary of Agriculture, Henry A. Wallace, had, as Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., puts it, "one lobe of his brain attuned to idealism," while the undivided reformist zeal of brilliant Undersecretary Rexford G. Tugwell accounted for such departmental doers and shakers (in their divers and sometimes dubious ways) as Jerome Frank, Frederick C. Howe, Gardner (Pat) Jackson, C. B. Baldwin, Lee Pressman, and Alger Hiss.

But Roosevelt also had his priorities: The country had to be hoisted from the economic abyss without delay, and the Congress upon which the task depended was dominated by such southern hierarchs as Senators Joe Robinson (D., Ark.), the majority leader, and Pat Harrison (D., Miss.), Carter Glass (D., Va.), and Cotton Ed Smith (D., S. C.), chairmen of the Commerce, Appropriations, and Agriculture Committees, respectively. Nothing better illustrates what James MacGregor Burns has termed "the insuperable difficulties of Roosevelt's middle way" than the impact of the Agricultural Adjustment Act upon the South.

The sixth measure enacted by Congress during the historic Hundred Days, the AAA became law on May 12, 1933. "If the NRA was the mainspring of the New Deal in shop and factory, the AAA was its counterpart on the farm." When Agriculture Secretary Wallace rhapsodized that it was "a contrivance as new in the field of social relations as the first gasoline engine in the field of mechanics," and his aide, Mordecai Ezekiel, called it "the greatest single experiment in economic planning under capitalist conditions ever attempted by a democracy in time of peace," a paralyzed nation took them at their word. It was no time to inquire who would benefit from the experimental planning executed by the new contrivance.

In retrospect, the answer is clear enough; the historical verdict is unanimous.

The object of the AAA was to restore farm prices to the same ratio they bore to non-farm prices in the period 1909-1914. To this end, processing taxes were levied which financed the restriction of farm production, chiefly by paying benefits to farmers who agreed to produce less. In the vernacular, "Kill every third pig or plow every third row under." In drafting the law, the desperate need for speed and his own agricultural background led Wallace to rely on the advice of the major farm organizations, the American Farm Bureau and the National Grange. The Farmers Union, representing the smaller farmers, was scarcely consulted while the unorganized tenants, croppers, and field hands were totally ignored.

Since AAA contracts were drawn with those who controlled the land, the sharecropper could benefit only from the gradual rise in produce prices and the "parity" payments on his share of the crop. In practice, the planter received 90% of the government payments since he did "the reckonin" (excerpt from a letter to Mitchell):

> we poor people . . . of Shiloh . . . had a pretty tight time last Saturday. we got that cent and a half subsidy what was Due us, our boss man Mr. McCracken paid it off. he call us in a Dark Room, and his window Shades pull near down. we coulden see how to read. had his two boys Standing By his side. we just could see how to sine the papers. we dident get justers.

Many planters invested their government checks in machinery, which confronted the tenants with wholly new hazards: They could be "tractored" off the land or thrown from it by reduced cultivation. The law failed to provide firm safeguards against either fate. No apathy could withstand so many provocations; the decades of silence gave way to food riots, relief demonstrations, and Socialist campaigns.

Launching the Movement, 1934 Vintage

Although the worried planters had not yet learned how to equate socialism with Satan, they knew how to keep Socialist candidates off the ballot and Socialist voters away from the ballot boxes. As evictions got underway, frustration mounted. A Socialist organizer dispatched to the scene wrote Norman Thomas: "Here you will find the true proletariat; here you will find inarticulate men moving irresistibly towards revolution."

In February, 1934, Thomas came to Tyronza to see for himself. He toured the woebegone cabins and talked to croppers who had received their eviction notices due to AAA crop reductions. In a passionate speech at the Tyronza High School, he blasted the government program. Mitchell recalls a detail of the scene:

> One sharecropper came in and stopped at the door. I was acting as kind of an usher, and I pointed out a vacant seat. He said he didn't have long to stay, he just thought he'd look in. He had his week's rations of groceries in his arms, a sack of flour, some meal, and so on, and there was a fellow standing next to him. When Norman started to talk, this man had never realized the conditions under which he himself lived. His eyes were fixed on this stranger up there on the platform who was talking about him. Finally he just handed all of his groceries to the fellow next to him and went over and took a seat and sat through the meeting.

To the local Socialists, Thomas suggested that political efforts be soft-pedalled in favor of an economic organization to defend the interests of sharecroppers.

On July 26, 1934, seven black men and eleven whites, including Mitchell and East, met on a plantation just outside Tyronza and formed "the union"—they didn't know what else to call it. Some of the whites had belonged to the Ku Klux Klan. Some of the Negroes were veterans of a black sharecroppers union in nearby Elaine—and of the violence which met their cautious attempts to negotiate with the planters. With that in the foreground, and a half-century of alienation in the background, these eighteen men decided matter-of-factly that the only viable union of sharecroppers was an interracial one. Being Southerners, they next considered the utility of hanging a planter or two by way of example. But a white man who favored less thorough methods was elected chairman, a Negro minister became second in command, and an Englishman from Bristol was chosen treasurer. The by-laws, modeled on an old Wobbly union, proclaimed "The land should belong to the people who work on it." The South hadn't seen its like since Populism!

Unsurprisingly—in this remarkable region where time does not equal change—this new plantocracy v. tenant struggle was in many ways a small scale replica of the earlier conflict. Connoisseurs of Populism who recall the "Western" style rescue (TV should consider doing some "Southerns") of Populist minister H. S. Doyle, a Negro militant threatened with lynching in Thomson, Georgia, by "fully two thousand" armed white comrades will recognize the first major ordeal of the new Southern Tenant Farmers Union.

Two organizers, both ministers but one white and one black, were arrested near Marion, Arkansas. Ward Rodgers, the white man, was escorted to the county line; C. H. Smith was thrown into jail. Mitchell realized that in Smith's case there was not a moment to lose, but the union had not yet acquired a lawyer. A frantic wire to the American Civil Liberties Union netted three possibilities, all in Memphis. Mitchell and East rushed over there, only to be promptly refused by two attorneys. "I greatly admire you fellows," said one, "but I was in the Lost Battalion in the Argonne Forest, and I'm one Jew[2] who isn't going over to Crittenden County to get a Nigra out of jail when he's charged with organizing a union." Finally the highly respected C. T. Carpenter undertook the case and hurried over to Crittenden County.

As he confronted the notorious Sheriff Curlin, an unusual number of ancient cars, trucks, and wagons discharged their burden of white union members in front of the courthouse. Inside, the sheriff allowed as how he was not about to release Reverend Smith. Time passed; the sheriff remained adamant. Then slowly, imperceptibly, the little clumps of quiet, lounging, tobacco chewing men began to coalesce. No southern sheriff, Faulkner tells us, needs to look out of his window to see it happen; he is born knowing. But this time it was different. That night a great rally was held to celebrate Reverend Smith's release, and to hear how he had endured the fists and rubber hose of the law without betraying the union.

[2]Another time when a plantation mob cornered three union officials, it was an attorney named Goldberger who was singled out for a beating.

"That's how it began," says Mitchell, "and that's pretty much how it stayed." Negro unionists bore the brunt of the violence, but whites were not exempt.

> Planters . . . padlocked church doors and packed school houses with bales of hay to deter union rallies. Their riding bosses flogged sympathetic croppers and drove them from their plantations. The Harahan Bridge, spanning the Mississippi at Memphis, became the gateway to safety for union organizers.

The union begged the Justice Department for protection, but none came. Early in 1935, Reverend Rodgers was warned to "stop teachin' niggers to read, write, an' figger" or prepare to meet his Maker. Incensed, Rodgers told a union rally that unless the government put a stop to such intimidation, he "would lead a group to lynch every planter in Poinsett County." When the crowd roared assent, Mitchell hurriedly stepped in and restored order. But Rodgers was arrested before he left the platform. A planters' jury, hastily assembled in a local store, convicted him of blasphemy, anarchy, and attempted overthrow of the government.

The Rodgers case produced national headlines, hundreds of new union members, and money and moral support from near and far. On this swell of popular indignation, Norman Thomas returned to Arkansas. But he got no further than his first speech in Birdsong, where he was surrounded by planters and police yelling that "no Gawd-damn Yankee bastard" was going to lecture Arkansas. Brandishing the state constitution and protesting, Thomas retreated from the platform and the state. But as the French say, he drew back only to jump farther—and in a different direction.

Allies Likely and Unlikely

It was by now clear that the sharecroppers' problems would not be solved by orderly local reform. For the aggrieved Southerner the sole recourse, then as now, was Washington. There, in the feisty, argumentative stronghold of the New Deal, the sharecroppers attracted a pride of champions outstanding even in an era of political wizardry. Norman Thomas, Will Alexander, Rexford Tugwell, Jerome Frank and bruderschaft—a formidable, and very mixed, bag of allies. Of these, Thomas was the first and, in the nature of his part, the most outspoken. In one of those paradoxes which are the delight of a large and variegated society, this leader of the urban, second-generation American Socialist Party would play perhaps his most organic and creative role as the spokesman of the rural, bedrock native Southern Tenant Farmers Union.

After his first trip to Arkansas in 1934, Thomas wrote to Secretary of Agriculture Wallace, "What about the sharecroppers driven from the land . . . Has the Administration any plans for them other than the pious hopes written into the contracts with the landlords?" When Wallace, relying on his "other lobe which responded avidly to the Farm Bureau, the Extension Service, and Senator Joe Robinson of Arkansas," replied in the negative, Thomas looked for heavier artillery. He found it in a League for Industrial Democracy study which reported that, as a result of the AAA, 15% to 20% of all sharecroppers were already thrown off the land.

Wallace responded with aplomb—he ordered more research. Although studies conducted independently by Mrs. Mary C. Myers of the AAA and Dr. Calvin B. Hoover of Duke University reinforced the earlier finding, the Agriculture Department made no move. Within the Department, however, there was considerable commotion. From the outset, Tugwell's Young Turks had sworn allegiance to the sharecroppers. The AAA's ineffectual Section 7a—urging that wherever possible participating landlords retain the same number of tenants they had when the program began—was inserted only at the insistence of Jerome Frank's deputy, Alger Hiss. Others in the group included liberals Frederick Howe and Pat Jackson, and Communists Lee Pressman, Nathan Witt, and John Abt.

Had the folks back in Birdsong met this last clutch of allies, they might have felt the same misgivings as the old Department hands: "Too Ivy League, too intellectual, too Jewish." And one can imagine their response to the brilliant Lee Pressman's deathless challenge: "But what does this code do for the macaroni growers?" Nonetheless, in this engagement the Communists' usefulness cannot be argued. Later the Party appears in another role and perhaps another light.

By February, 1935, intensifying pressure from Thomas and the Rodgers case convinced the militants it was time to act. As soon as AAA Administrator Chester Davis left town, Hiss issued a re-interpretation of Section 7a: Landlords were obligated to retain the same tenants for the duration of their AAA contract. Davis returned, envisioned a planter uprising, became apoplectic, and cancelled the re-interpretation. He also fired all the insurgents except Hiss, whom he considered industrious and misled. Wallace and Roosevelt expressed the highest regard for the dismissed men, but raised no finger to reinstate any of them. During the resultant hue and cry, Norman Thomas obtained an interview with the President, who confessed he hadn't read the controversial Section 7a, twitted Thomas, "Now, Norman, you're not as good a politician as I am," and concluded, "There is a new generation growing up in the South. We've got to be patient."

In Marked Tree, Arkansas, on the night of March 25, forty masked night riders fired into the home of union attorney Carpenter. Five days later, a gang of armed men pistol-whipped a group of Negro men and women as they left church. A rival union movement was initiated by one J. Green who, obviously impressed by the news from Europe, proposed that his followers wear green shirts with swastikas. As Mitchell addressed a union meeting to expose the planter financing of the prospective Green Shirts, a man in the audience rose and pulled out a gun. At once, the unionist next to him grabbed his arm, thereby deflecting the bullet to the platform floor, two inches in front of the astounded Mitchell. The union had no choice but to move to Memphis and "go underground."

Now Norman Thomas no longer spoke only about economic reform. He wired Wallace that "only a miracle can prevent bloodshed" and requested intervention. When that proved fruitless, he went to Washington to plead his case in person, and when that too failed, he wrote FDR a personal letter describing the situation in Arkansas and expressing concern that the Agriculture Department was "frankly in fear of the power of southern senators." Thomas also pressed Sen. Robert F. Wagner, then drafting his Magna Carta for labor, to include "these virtual slaves" in its protection, but Wagner replied regretfully that to do so would doom the legislation. Thomas did, however, elicit one action from Washington:

Wallace gave the New York Times an interview condemning the bitterness aroused by "Communist and Socialist agitators in the South."

In this crisis, the beleaguered sharecroppers received unexpected reinforcements—a fresh, well-equipped squad of supporters, led by one of the most knowledgeable and effective of southern activists, "Dr. Will" Alexander. Coming from the powerful religious tradition which has spawned so many southern reformers, Alexander allied himself with Dr. Charles S. Johnson of Fisk, for scholarship, and Edwin R. Embree of the Rosenwald Fund, for cash, to create "the triumvirate which ruled the liberal South during the Thirties and Forties." By 1934, Dr. Will had added the sharecroppers to a personal jurisdiction ranging from the directorship of the South's first Commission on Interracial Cooperation to the formation of Dillard University.

Aided by the University of North Carolina's great regional sociologists (and Rockefeller money), Alexander and Johnson launched a systematic study of farm tenancy in the South. By the beginning of 1935, they had the facts; they also knew about the ordeal of the STFU, the frustrations of Thomas, and the Realpolitik paralysis of FDR. They were ready to go to work. Staked this time by the Rosenwalds, Alexander and Embree migrated to Washington, took a posh suite at the Hay-Adams, and embarked on the inside approach—a systematic wining and dining of the decision-makers in the Agriculture Department. This traditional lobbying was abetted in March by the publication of a masterly popularization of their research findings, The Collapse of Cotton Tenancy. It was no accident that its dire conclusions were front-paged across the country—the Hay-Adams team had hired a professional publicist. The New York Times now took up the cry with a series of rousing on-the-spot reports from Arkansas. As Dr. Will had planned, the sharecropper issue, which had always had heat, was now acquiring depth and dimension.

No King Canute, Roosevelt—who read not only the Times but also Dr. Will's book, of which he approved—was casting about for a solution. With typical Rooseveltian deftness, he found one which at once embodied his concern for the small farmer, placated Thomas and the Left, and pleased favorite Brain Truster Tugwell, still disgruntled over the ouster of his disciples. On April 30, 1935, FDR established the Resettlement Administration, to be directed by Tugwell. With that done, the President moved to protect his other flank: A "spontaneous" demonstration was to take place in Washington to "counteract unfavorable impressions of the AAA."

This, too, could be understood. "In his first two years, FDR achieved the exalted position of being president of all the people. Could it last?" By 1935, the answer was emerging. In the near future, an old associate would say, "The brain trusters caught the socialists in swimming and ran away with their clothes," and Thomas would retort, "Roosevelt has not carried out any Socialist platform except on a stretcher." But FDR had one trump card left, the reviving economy—and agriculture led all the rest. Between the drouth and the AAA, farm prices had increased by two-thirds, farm income by one-half, and cash receipts had doubled. Small wonder that neither Dr. Will's statistics, nor publicity, nor sentiment deterred Roosevelt from defending his most successful program.

Hearing about the AAA demonstration, Pat Jackson proposed that the STFU counter with a demonstration of its own. Only nine union members came, but they picketed the Department of Agriculture and made history; it was the first time a government bureau was so honored. When the cops tried to disperse the singing black and white demonstrators, Jackson—then in his volcanic, bull-horn-voiced prime—dispersed the cops. In an "unscheduled" address to his demonstrators, the President denounced those "with special axes to grind," who "were lying about the farm program." But the sharecroppers and their supporters had already made their impact: The Washington Post chose to salute "The Nine vs. the Three Thousand."

By July, 1935, the Resettlement Administration was ready to "coordinate and initiate all government programs in land utilization, rural rehabilitation and resettlement, and suburban resettlement." Tugwell, having taken Dr. Will's measure over many a beefsteak and Baked Alaska at the Hay-Adams, invited the Southerner to serve as his assistant. In the same month, the Senate opened hearings on a bill to provide tenants with government loans for farm purchase. The champion of the Common Man was at last remembering his debt-ridden Georgia neighbors. From the long range view, it was a promising first anniversary for the Southern Tenant Farmers Union—and its motley, untiring supporters.

Meanwhile, Back at the Plantation . . .

It has often been remarked that the long view is not very edible. For the cotton picking season opening in the fall of 1935, planters were offering 40¢ and 50¢ for 100 pounds of cotton. Thus the average worker who picked about 150 pounds in a day stretching from "can to can't" would earn less than $1 per day. There was no question of negotiating with the planters; by now they were accusing the union of planning the overthrow of "white supremacy, Christianity, the American flag, and the sanctity of home and family ties." In late September, when cotton was at its peak, delegates from the STFU's approximately thirty locals voted to strike. As Mitchell recalls:

> On the night before, the strike handbills were distributed all over the plantations at the same time—on fence posts, telephone poles, barn doors, everywhere—saying that strike was on and stay out of the fields. Five thousand of our people stayed home. In three Arkansas counties where we had just a few members, the state labor department man said he saw only five people working—in all three counties.

The planters held out for ten days; then they raised wages to 75¢ per 100 pounds. Although there was neither negotiation nor other recognition of the union, word of the triumph spread and the preventive wage raise, given in hopes of forestalling further unionization, extended rapidly over Arkansas. Sometimes this tactic works for the employer; this was one of the other times. The union enjoyed a membership explosion: Locals were organized so fast that the Memphis office couldn't keep track of them. In Muskogee, Oklahoma, a not quite full-blooded Cherokee named Odis Sweeden was squatting in his outhouse when he glanced at the newspaper underfoot and learned about the STFU's successful strike. He tore out the union's address, volunteered his services, and began to build an organization in dust-bowl Oklahoma that eventually comprised seventy-five locals. By the end of 1935, the STFU reported a membership of 25,000 in 200 locals scattered over six states.

Elated by this unexpected success, the union presented its next demand early in 1936: Wages for chopping and weeding cotton must be raised to $2 per day. The planters responded by evicting one hundred sharecroppers. As they camped in the snowdrifts, Pat Jackson called for a congressional investigation. His outrage, striking a spark in Sen. Robert LaFollette, inspired the most thorough investigation of civil liberties violations ever undertaken in the U. S. But the sharecroppers' civil liberties were not placed under the microscope of the LaFollette Committee. As its exceptionally courageous chairman said to Mitchell: "If we go in there, those southern congressmen will simply stop our appropriations."

As the ides of May came and went and the planters remained obdurate, the STFU called its second strike. Like the contemporaneous sit-downs of the auto workers, this effort had verve and originality. The picketing was done in "Marches": unionists were lined up one behind the other, about eight feet apart, forming a very long, thin line, which marched down the road from one plantation to the other, singing and calling to those in the fields to join them. Marchers would cover 20 to 25 miles each day, with their lines lengthening and snaking out as the sun set.

The planters also displayed ingenuity, although of a somewhat antiquarian nature. In Earle, Arkansas, city marshal Paul Peacher not only arrested thirteen pickets, mainly Negro, but forced them to work out their sentences on his farm. A federal grand jury found him guilty of eight counts of violating the anti-slavery laws. When two white union sympathizers, the Rev. Claude Williams (of whom more below) and Miss Willie Sue Blagdon, undertook to search for Negro unionist Frank Weems who disappeared after being beaten on the picket line, they were caught and whipped by "unknown assailants." Naturally, the disappearance of Weems, a black man, made no ripple, but the attack upon the whites was headlined across the nations. Clay East, leaving the Forrest City (Arkansas) courthouse after providing bail for some pickets, was recognized and set upon by a gang of riding bosses. He was flat on his back and fighting with his feet when the state patrol finally rescued him. "Clay was a very athletic type of person," sighs Mitch admiringly.

If the National Guard, called out four days after the strike began, did little to prevent such violence, it did serve the traditional function of keeping the nervous Nellies on the job and off the picket line. When Thomas again pleaded with Roosevelt to intervene, the President replied that he had requested the governor to investigate. "Like asking Capone to investigate the underworld," growled Thomas. He next urged FDR to make good use of his invitation to the Arkansas Centennial Celebration in June, but Roosevelt's conventional address skirted both labor standards and civil liberties.

In July the strike collapsed, having "made no dent at all." Still, the union had continued to galvanize its constituency and the liberal community as a whole. At year's end, the STFU boasted 6,000 new members (initiation fee, 25¢; annual dues, $1), for a total of 31,000 men and women, black and white, in Arkansas, Tennessee, Oklahoma, Missouri, North Carolina, Mississippi, and Texas. And it had aroused sufficient interest to warrant a March of Time documentary, which made no bones about the price exacted in pain and terror for the privilege of trying to better oneself on the southern plantation.

The Legislative Front: A Noble Failure, A 'Savior Without a Flock,' A Dubious Victory

At the time the movie, together with the other publicity, did seem to "make a whale of a difference." With the 1936 elections approaching and the issue vivid in the public mind, FDR moved to fulfill his legislative commitment to the sharecroppers. A Presidential Committee on Farm Tenancy was appointed, headed by Wallace and including (thanks to the machinations of Pat Jackson) a representative of the STFU. For Norman Thomas and Mitchell, the major issue confronting this committee was whether its legislative recommendations would be limited to the acquisition of land by tenants—"the subsidization of an American peasantry on subsistence farms," said Thomas—or would provide also for rural cooperatives. Both men were convinced that only the latter could compete successfully with the increasingly mechanized plantations. Although the STFU had many friends on the Committee, including Tugwell and the southern triumvirate, the cooperative proposals were foredoomed. As far as Congress was concerned, co-ops had been given a more than fair trial by Tugwell's Resettlement Administration and had proved a sad, funny—and costly—flop. Thus even before the Committee met, the STFU's primary objective was engulfed by one of the angriest controversies of the New Deal.

The ninety-nine "community" programs begun at the nadir of the Depression to relocate the jobless and landless represented a 'back to the land' movement dear to the heart of the President, who once said, ". . . The salvation of America lies with the country men and boys . . . They have more time to think and study for themselves." For Tugwell, who became their chief mentor and symbol, the community projects had a larger, almost apocalyptic significance. To them he brought a social philosophy as distinct from the Marxist orientation of Thomas and Mitchell as from the socio-economic regionalism of Alexander and the southern contingent. A former economics professor, Tugwell was a prophet of the planned economy and an enemy of laissez faire. But unlike the Marxists, he sought no new parties or movements to achieve these ends. Essentially elitist, he believed that an astute and determined president, surrounded by equally astute and determined planners, could revolutionize society.

The community projects—whether subsistence farms, rural-industrial, all-rural, or suburban—represented for Tugwell, says historian Paul Conkin, "the idea of cooperation, which was to replace competition and extreme individualism . . . as the new institution best suited for the modern environment. No more concerted public effort was ever made in the U. S. to develop cooperatives of all kinds." A glance at some of these projects will illustrate what happened when soaring idealism encountered unleavened reality.

At Arthurdale, a community for stranded miners in West Virginia which became Mrs. Roosevelt's pet Resettlement project, a White House aide ordered fifty prefabricated houses, which turned out to be totally useless. Thereupon the dauntless First Lady called in an architect and an interior decorator, all without consulting the local sponsors or the project director, who promptly resigned in protest. In Penderlea, a rural project in North Carolina, settlers discovered that it would take them over forty years to buy their farms, during which they had to submit to detailed home budgets and farm plans, and bank accounts held jointly with the project manager. At Penderlea and Arthurdale, the new schools were developed along the latest progressive lines proposed by consultant John Dewey; in both places the settlers demanded a return to tradition.

At Jersey Homesteads, the government spent $200,000 for a factory to produce concrete blocks; when production started, the factory collapsed. A Special Skills section brought handicrafts, fine arts, and entertainment to the projects; at Penderlea the settlers returned special records made for them, requesting hillbilly music instead. At Westmoreland, the director suggested that Special Skills people be sent only at local request, so "that we do not burden the community with more advantages than they can absorb at one time." Between the solicitous social workers, the questionnaire-asking sociologists, and the beagle-nosed reporters, one mountaineer said, "It got so a man couldn't set down to his sow belly and turnip greens without some stranger peeking in at the window or walking in to ask fool questions."

Of such stuff are headlines made, but there were more fundamental problems: The government loaned four million dollars to the communities for cooperative factories of the latest design, all of which proved financial failures. Five hosiery mills lost $64,000, a woodworking plant almost $191,000, a pants factory about $214,000, and the Arthurdale tractor plant closed after one year with a loss of more than $106,000. Even Jersey Homesteads, the only settlement with a homogeneous, New York Jewish population, whose elan is echoed in the little inaugural march for the garment factory which replaced the concrete block fiasco:

Production, cooperation
Freedom for every nation,
Here, there, and everywhere,
This is our claim:
Workers' Aim, Workers' Aim.

The all-glass, air-conditioned factory failed in its first year of operation. An equally dire fate befell the all-rural co-ops, which were mainly in the South.

"Bad management," said Mitchell, pointing to successful consumer co-ops undertaken by the STFU and Sherwood Eddy's Delta Co-op in Mississippi. True, in some cases, but mainly outside management, and so much of it! Seeking only refuge from the economic storm, the unsuspecting settlers were deluged by a Niagara of planners, supervisors, managers, educators, and recreators—all with the best intentions. Who could tolerate it? (It is a comment on the selective writing of our history, and the explosive social potential of 'participation' that, despite this experience, the concept was virtually ignored until the civil rights revolution, thirty years later.) The damaging impact of Washington's paternalism was reinforced by the repeated reshuffling of the sponsoring agencies, with attendant confusion; the unfamiliarity of all agencies with the techniques of social planning (another lesson unlearned), and most important, the contradictory aims of the Resettlement Administration and the settlers.

Whereas the STFU and the Delta Co-op farmers chose freely to cooperate, the overwhelming majority of the government's 10,000 settlers wished only to participate in the American Dream—to own their own home or farm. When their low earnings and the government's long-term purchase policy thwarted this purpose, no planning or helping could palliate their frustration.

These developments had not run their full course when the Presidential Committee on Farm Tenancy began its investigations in November, 1936, but they were sufficiently advanced to provide ammunition for the gathering legions of Roosevelt haters. Articles entitled "Hull House in the Hills," "The Fuller Life at Arthurdale," "Four Million Dollar Village," and "Back to Capitalism" chronicled the government's pratfalls, with only an occasional bow to its intentions and problems. Nor did they advertise that Resettlement's anti-segregationist, pro-poor people, and anti-privilege philosophy motivated much of their fury.

For all of this Tugwell was, unfortunately, an ideal lightning conductor. A dashing symbol of the New Deal who "suffered neither fools nor Congressmen gladly and often publicly confused the two," he was denounced in the press as both a "wild man from Moscow" and an ineffectual academician. By the end of 1936 an anti-Tugwell Club was formed in Chicago, cracks were circulating about the "Unsettlement Administration," and a devastating series of articles entitled "Utopia Unlimited" had appeared in the Washington Post. An isolated, "tragic figure, a saviour without a flock," Tugwell proved the final undoing of the co-operative ideal as a viable political program. By the time the Committee convened, he had decided to resign, leaving the Resettlement Administration in the hands of the less controversial Will Alexander.

Predictably, the Farm Tenancy Committee's report stressed the importance of private farm ownership and Congress showed little patience with other alternatives. In July, 1937, the Bankhead-Jones Act established a Farm Security Administration within the Department of Agriculture to provide government loans to selected tenants for farm rehabilitation and purchase. The Resettlement Administration was to be absorbed by the new agency and its community projects completed; no further social experiments would be undertaken.

In its minority report to the Farm Tenancy Committee, the STFU had said: "We strongly dissent from the 'small homestead' philosophy as the solution for the majority of southern agricultural workers. It is the more readily accepted by the present landlords because they know it to be relatively ineffective and . . . harmless from their point of view." For the union which claimed "that we workers in the fields, through our unions, through our strikes, and through our willingness to stand up against beatings, espionage, and all manner of terror . . . have brought the attention of the country to our problems," the Farm Security Administration was a dubious victory.

In addition, the FSA, like most poverty programs, was hamstrung by inadequate funds. The proposed annual budget of $50 million was reduced to $10 million in 1938, $25 million in 1939, and $50 million thereafter. Roosevelt, confronting an increasingly hostile Congress, offered little resistance, despite Secretary Wallace's admission that even at the $50 million rate, it would take 230 years to find farms for all the existing tenants, at $4,000 per farm! Also, the program was to be administered by county committees, notoriously dominated by the Farm Bureau. Said the STFU: "The county agent is, generally speaking, the servant of the landowning business interest from whom he gets a large portion of his pay, rather than the servant of the mass of the people in the farming areas."

The union found only one bright spot in the FSA picture, and his name was Alexander. The new director, a former farm boy who believed that "if a man didn't know the feel of an ax-handle, he couldn't understand America," yarn-spinning, genial, pragmatic Dr. Will made the most of his mandate. As a key member of the Farm Tenancy Committee, he had made sure that FSA would combine, for the first time, credit toward farm purchase with technical aid, thus motivating the ambitious tenant to learn better farming methods. In the South, this meant preaching the Odum-Vance gospel of crop diversification as a means of renewing the exhausted land and finally releasing the region from the tyranny of cotton.

In their engaging biography of Alexander, Miss Dykeman and Mr. Stokely describe the salvation of the Pettways of Gee's Bend, Alabama, begun early in the New Deal and brought to fruition by the FSA. Living in isolation in the giant ox-bow bend of the Alabama River below Selma, these 100 families descended from the slaves of the now deserted Pettway plantation were living on wild plums in the winter of 1933. After that, they were kept alive by the relief agencies and Resettlement, but FSA investigated and decided to invest in the Pettways. Loans were made for seed, fertilizers, chickens, pigs, cows, and mules—and for re-purchase of their 12,000 acres, long foreclosed.

By 1941, 97 families had repaid their loans and owned their 100-acre farms, in a county where only 20% of farms were operator owned. They had diversified their crops and built a new school, general store, community center and health center. When Dr. Will and their particular FSA mentor, Chapel Hill's much-loved Pete Hudgens, came to visit they were greeted by a spiritual composed in their honor, "Go Down to the Ferry and I'll Pray," each verse of which celebrated an FSA benefit.

Unlike his predecessor, Dr. Will realized that his offensive in the field would be brought up short unless he secured his political flanks. To inform the public he enlisted writers like John Fischer, now editor of Harper's, and James Agee who, with FSA photographer Walker Evans, created from this experience the classical Let Us Now Praise Famous Men. With his bourbon-and-branch water charm, Dr. Will also won the support of the majority leader, Arkansas' Senator Joe Robinson. Altogether, Dr. Will's FSA was a shrewd, practical, and imaginative operation.

Yet, by 1940, the country's war-bred prosperity had begun its customary work: The public was fast losing interest in the poor and dispossessed. Congress, sensing this, turned a more receptive ear to the Farm Bureau, now openly antagonistic to FSA. This was quite a switch from its 1934 position, when a collapsing agriculture caused its president to question even that most sacred of cows, rugged individualism.

It is a pity that historian Conkin's summation of the indictment levelled at FSA was not published until 1959, when Dr. Will was no longer here to enjoy it:

> The FSA aided the lowest and most helpless class of farmers, from the migrant laborers in California to southern sharecroppers. But the cotton plantations, the truck farms, and the large orchards were dependent upon > these very same cheap laborers and croppers that the FSA was aiding through rehabilitation loans or resettlement opportunities. At the same time . . . the support to local cooperatives often threatened the profit of private processors and retailers. Thus those who feared competition or who were about to lose their cheap labor were naturally opposed to FSA.

Dr. Will's account was pithier. His colleagues in the Farm Bureau had, he said, "the attitude that the medicine man in Africa would have towards someone who tried to give penicillin for boils." Realizing that the times were no longer propitious for penicillin, Dr. Will resigned in 1940. The agency struggled along until 1946, when it finally succumbed to the protracted attacks of southern congressmen.

During the eight years of its life, the FSA made more than half a million rehabilitation loans to southern tenants, or more than half of all such loans granted. Of the farm purchase loans, 30,809—more than two-thirds of all loans granted—were funneled into the South. For the 1,831,000 southern tenant families reported by the census in 1935, this represents farm assistance for 27.6% and aid in purchasing farms for 1.6%. After all the publicity and protest and dedication, it turned out that the New Deal's assault on one of the most severe aspects of "the nation's Number One economic problem" (as FDR termed the South) was a chimera.

For the next twenty years, Congress turned its back on the southern rural poor, with a single exception: In 1956, social security coverage was extended to all non-migratory farm workers.

The STFU, the Commies, and the Mainstream of Labor

While his political allies were pursuing their goals in Washington, Mitchell was seeking another kind of help in another quarter. From the beginning, he had held it unlikely that a union of sharecroppers, alone and unaided, could bring the planters to the bargaining table. His odyssey in search of a useful trade union affiliation mirrors almost every aspect of the vigorous, turbulent labor scene of the Thirties. Mitchell turned for support first to the local labor movement in Memphis which was, in pre-CIO 1934, the A. F. of L.: "They said the union could only lead to uprisings among the Negroes and that no one could organize a union of people as poor as the sharecroppers," recalls Mitchell.

Recognition first came from the national office of the A. F. of L., which sent $1,000 to support the STFU's 1935 strike—a respectable donation in those days. But that is as far as the relationship went for the next decade: "The A. F. of L. was too far away," says Mitchell, referring to the socio-economic topography. As it turned out, the brand new CIO, then only an organizing committee, wasn't much closer:

> John L. Lewis, although he took a great interest in it, didn't spend one dime to assist our union. It just wasn't profitable. Lewis, like practically all the rest of the labor leaders, was interested solely in organizing workers who were able to pay substantial dues and maintain their union.

He was willing to say anything, so long as it didn't cost him anything.[3]

In our time, a small new union which fails to attract the advances of the standard labor movement is completely out of it—a hopeless organizational wallflower. But in the Thirties, there were other partners, and other parties—notably the Communist Party. The STFU, which took pride in its grass-roots, democratic radicalism, was not inclined to view with alarm the rumored Communist affiliation of potential friends; after all, warnings about Moscow-dictated party lines were bound to sound fantastical in, say, Marked Tree, Arkansas. But that was before Commonwealth College, then a hotbed of political dissidence, sent a delegation to help the union organize. When one of its members, an overt Communist, proceeded to distribute literature urging Negroes to establish a Black Republic in the South—the Communist Party was an early exponent of black militance—the union people became alarmed and "shipped the whole crowd back to Mena."

This was, in turn, the merest prelude to the STFU's adventures with the Reverend Claude Williams, a man of parts whose 'primitive' Communism had its engaging moments, although it took a wry, humorous Southerner like Mitchell to savor them:

> Some delegates was sitting in a booth in a restaurant near the hall where we were holding the convention. I came in by myself . . . and saw Williams and one or two other fellows sitting in a booth. Williams was showing them a card. He had a red card in his hand . . . Thinking it was some union card, I just reached over and said, "What's this, Claude?" He hesitated and said, "Mitchell, you must not tell anyone about this, but this is my Party card." I looked at it and it wasn't made out to him. "Hell, that ain't your card. It's made out to John Gayley." He said that was his Party name.

At the STFU's 1937 convention, held soon after Williams's much publicized role in the Weems affair, the preacher used his freshly minted glamour to promote a curious proposal. He urged that all members working for wages transfer into the A. F. of L., while the tenants and sharecroppers move into the National Farmers Union, since they shared the interests of the larger land-owners. In short, he proposed to dissolve the union! After two furious days, the Mitchell forces managed to overcome the advantage of "any white man who would go out and get beaten up for a Negro," and the STFU remained intact.

Still, this was only the baptism by fire; for three years the STFU's quest for economic reinforcement and trade union solidarity would run athwart Communist plans and purposes — a destiny shared by all labor groups drawn into the orbit of the early CIO, to which John L. Lewis had harnessed the undisputed organizing talents of the C. P. The resulting intrigue and in-fighting could be sustained by the large industrial unions, protected on their employer flank by the Wagner Act. For the small, unprotected STFU, isolated in the hostile South, it was calamitous.

At the time of the above-mentioned convention, the CIO had not yet created

[3]While the early CIO could undoubtedly have provided some financial aid to the STFU, it should in fairness be said that at the outset, its resources had to be husbanded for the insatiable demands of the industrial organizing which was its avowed purpose.

a national organization for farm workers. A few months thereafter, however, a charter was issued to Donald Henderson, a former professor and warm political friend of West Coast longshore chief Harry Bridges, who commended him to Lewis. Pat Jackson, also a Lewis friend, insisted that the STFU be included among the founders, and it was so ordered.

No sooner did the STFU delegation arrive in Denver for the July, 1937 founding convention than Henderson pulled Mitchell aside and offered him the secretary-treasurer's post in the new organization provided he joined the Party. When Mitchell refused, the offer was withdrawn. Thereupon Pat Jackson, Lewis's official representative (foxy old John L. often hedged his Communist bets), vowed to use his boss's prestige to elect Mitchell from the floor; Henderson countered by intercepting all communications from Lewis to Jackson. When a second Lewis emissary arrived to investigate the communications gap, Henderson capitulated to the extent of making STFU president J. R. Butler a vice president of the new organization. The union born amidst these excursions and alarms was known as the United Cannery, Agricultural, Packing and Allied Workers of America, or UCAPAWA, pronounced by its admirers, YOU KA POWWOW.

For Mitchell and Jackson, the first pow-wow had been enough; they considered it highly unlikely that the STFU would survive the tender embrace of the new mother organization. However, the burgeoning CIO had so captivated the STFU rank and file that it was impossible merely to let the matter drop. They therefore bombarded Lewis with pleas for a separate CIO charter of their own. Lewis, sufficiently impressed with STFU to forego the hallowed prohibition against chartering two unions for the same jurisdiction, agreed. But, ever the nimble politician, he refused to rile UCAPAWA by undue haste; the STFU charter would be processed through the usual channels.

Thereupon ensued an organizational tragicomedy of the kind dear to the heart of labor buffs. Anxious to annex the STFU, Henderson pressured its president Butler (to whom UCAPAWA was paying an unheard of salary of $200 per month) to hold a special convention of his union to vote affiliation. Butler called the convention for September, 1937, two months after the events in Denver and mere weeks after the STFU charter application had begun to grind its way through the administrative entrails of the CIO.

One thousand eager STFU members assembled in Memphis, the largest convention ever held by the union. Mitchell, sensing the CIO fever among the delegates, assured them that the STFU's charter was on its way and argued against affiliation with UCAPAWA. Thereupon Henderson took the floor in no uncertain terms: Lewis would never do such a thing; it would be dual unionism—unthinkable. "It's either you boys join our union or have nothing to do with the CIO." Desperate, Mitchell begged Butler to postpone the vote until he could reach Lewis by phone. Butler, "an honest man caught in a squeeze," acquiesced, but Lewis was nowhere to be found. However, the fates took mercy on Mitchell — it was time for lunch. For two hours he clung frantically and fruitlessly to the telephone. He was still in that posture when Butler, no longer able to evade the baleful eye of Henderson, put the question to a vote. Affiliation won by a landslide. When it was all over, many of the new UCAPAWA members stopped to express their regrets to the crestfallen Mitchell. In the words of one: "We think the STFU is the best, but our local would run us out of the county if we went back without joining the CIO."

Henderson had not achieved this victory without providing firm assurances that the STFU would retain both its identity and autonomy within UCAPAWA. But as Mitchell and Jackson foresaw, sectarian politics do not cohabit with good faith. No sooner was the affiliation achieved than Henderson ordered STFU locals to by-pass their established channels and report directly to UCAPAWA. Says Mitchell:

> The rest of 1937 and 1938 were spent largely in one battle after another with the Communist leadership of UCAPAWA. Every time its Executive Board met, the STFU was on the agenda. We would always be voted down. We had four representatives and there were, I think, twenty-one on the Board, and the others voted in a block.

(Varying only in name and number, such reports echoed like a long sigh through the labor movement of the late '30's.) Complaints to Lewis received the standard organizational response: All appeals within UCAPAWA must be exhausted before he could intervene. The year and a half that the STFU plodded through this exhausting process was exceedingly eventful: Minor calamities within, a major calamity without, but almost everywhere a healing comedy quite absent from the more sophisticated political wars up North.

There was, for example, the unexpected decline and fall of Claude Williams. The STFU having no strictures against Communists, the incident of the little red card had in no way affected Williams's status in the Executive Council. But being a creative man, he chafed under the deceptively sleepy eye of Mitchell, which never left him for long. At last came the day of deliverance. Mitchell received a government consultantship requiring a good deal of travel; Williams was free at last. He now enjoyed many a confidential visit with his long-time friend, union president Butler, in whose place he felt at home, throwing his jacket over the chair for shirt-sleeved talk in the July heat. One day Williams absent-mindedly left without his jacket. Butler's nephew found it and, removing its heavy burden of papers, jauntily wore it to town. Eventually, Butler noticed the unfamiliar pile of material and, while leafing through it, came upon a letter on Commonwealth College stationery addressed to the Central Committee of the Communist Party, USA. It said in part:

> A situation has now arisen which offers us an extra-ordinary opportunity to move into the most important organization in the agricultural South: the STFU . . . H. L. Mitchell . . . who has been consistently opposed to the International with which that union is affiliated, to the Party, and to Commonwealth, is on leave of absence from his office. The President of the Union and other members of the Executive Council who are friendly to us have invited us to conduct an intensive program of mass meetings at which Claude Williams would be the principal speaker . . . This is an opportunity for establishing a real Party base in the STFU.

Butler, who had often defended Williams against charges of sectarianism and disloyalty, was outraged. In a letter demanding Williams's immediate resignation from the Executive Council, he said:

> Now please do not get the idea that I am censuring you . . . for belonging to the Communist Party. That is your privilege. The thing I am censuring you for is that under the guise of friendship you worked to disrupt the STFU in its basic principle of being non-partisan.

Mitchell contends that if the letter had said that the Socialist Party intended to take over the Union, Butler, staunch Socialist that he was, would have responded the same way: "He was very straitlaced about everything." The Executive Council gave Williams a full hearing, listened impassively to his claim that the damaging letter was written by a Commonwealth student for a class in fund-raising, and expelled him — a decision subsequently upheld by the STFU convention.

The Union turned to more serious business in January, 1939, when 2,000 of its members in southeastern Missouri, evicted from their homes because the planters had shifted to wage labor, decided to "just move out on the highway and sit there and let the rest of the world go by." Union vice president Owen Whitfield (Negro) begged the interracial crowd to consider the cold, the snow, the absence of tents and food — without success. The next day newspapers across the country showed the pitiful scene. Mitchell rushed to Washington for help and, when no bureau moved fast enough, applied to Mrs. Roosevelt.

By the time he returned to Memphis, the President had already ordered the National Guard to provide tents, field kitchens, and other essentials. But in the South, even the awesome resolves of presidents sometimes lose the name of action. The National Guard never arrived, but what did arrive was food, clothing, and money spurred by the First Lady's column about the demonstration. These were clandestinely distributed at night, to avoid harassment by the police and state troopers. Finally the planters put a stop to the entire operation by persuading local health authorities to declare the camps a public nuisance. Demonstrators were moved into whatever shacks could be found on the land — as long as they were remote from the highway and the inquisition of the news cameras.

It was no accident, according to Mitchell, that Henderson picked the time of his maximum involvement in the Missouri affair to administer the coup de grace to the STFU. UCAPAWA had already removed six states from the STFU's eleven state jurisdiction and sought to collect per capita dues directly from STFU locals, thus depriving the original parent organization of all revenue. This intra-union judo was enlivened by some holds available only to true believers.

The Communist Party always cooperated with Sharecropper Week, a nation-wide series of fund-raising events climaxed by a Carnegie Hall concert in New York. As a result of the uproar in Missouri the 1939 concert was expected to yield an all-time high. But a night or two before the event, unsold tickets began to pour into the benefit office. Investigation disclosed that the Communist faithful, always the heartiest ticket pushers, had undergone a reversal of marching orders. The benefit was a disaster.

While Mitchell was recovering from this blow, Henderson announced a major meeting to "re-organize" the STFU, to be held within 48 hours in Memphis, the union's home base. After a last, futile appeal to John L. Lewis, Mitchell drove non-stop from New York to Memphis, and mobilized every bus, car, or truck he could lay hands on to transport to this 'dual' convention the delegates who had earlier attended the STFU's 'bona fide' convention. Of the hundred-odd unionists who assembled in Beale Street the next day, the anti-reorganization faction claimed seventy-five — more than enough to move Henderson to compromise. Butler and Mitchell decided they could best contribute to this result by absenting themselves from the convention floor.

Scorning such niceties as the election of a chairman, Henderson opened the convention with a bitter denunciation of the two absent leaders and concluded with his decision to expel them from UCAPAWA. This led some STFUers to mutter that the only reasonable response to Henderson would be to throw him out of the window. As these suggestions rose in volume, a delegate phoned Mitchell and Butler, who counseled calm and set out for the convention. When they appeared, Henderson, who seemed to have more courage than counting faculty, hollered that if they didn't leave at once, he would have them thrown out. At that, a roar went up from the crowd, which was clearly hungry for action. Mitchell asked for the floor; Henderson refused. But before the aroused sharecroppers could clamber onto the platform, Mitchell called out, "Everyone who wants to stay in a real union, follow me." That is what most of them did, and in the doing, severed forever the relationship between the STFU and the CIO.

There is, however, a footnote to this occasion: "After we got out, we all went to the yard in front of the Labor Temple," says Mitchell. "Brother A. B. Brookins, our original song leader, a very small Negro gentleman of about 65, said to me, 'I think I know what we ought to do. Just let me go down there and do it myself. I'll get Mr. Henderson and take him to the foot of Beale Street right on the Mississippi and make a Christian out of him — I'll baptize him.' Of course, Henderson was already far away from Memphis, and as far as I know, he never came back."

In an "Open Letter to Friends of the Sharecroppers," explaining its secession from UCAPAWA, the union again sounded the pragmatic, non-red-baiting note:

> The STFU knew before it affiliated with UCAPAWA that Henderson was a Communist but we affiliated anyway. We have no objection to Communists. We do object to destructive trade union tactics. We have left the UCAPAWA not because it is Communist controlled, but because that Communist control has made it impossible for us to carry on our job as a union.

Butler's long-standing defense of Williams, Mitchell's postsecession refusal to press a legal opportunity to bar UCAPAWA from the South, and the tenor of STFU publications lend credence to this statement. While it is obvious that a subsidiary unit with political views divergent from its parent organization will have its problems, it seems likely that the STFU would have paid the price had the UCAPAWA been less rigid and dictatorial.

Southerner that he is, Mitchell blames the human element: "Henderson had a bad personality." But the political warfare raging throughout the labor movement of the '30's indicates that Henderson was not the only Communist who failed to grasp the ideal of participatory democracy. It seems to have been an endemic and pervasive failure. Nonetheless, UCAPAWA made serious inroads into the STFU, capturing among others two Negro vice presidents. While the CIO salary scale may have played a role, there were other, more legitimate factors. Said a memo distributed by the pro-UCAPAWA faction:

> Special attention must be given to the problems of the Negro people. It must be seen to it that they are not discriminated against because of their race in (1) jobs, (2) relief, (3) social security, (4) education, (5) courts, (6) medical care, etc. All workers are exploited . . . But the Negro people are confronted with additional problems arising from discrimination against them in the South. The Memphis office has refused to recognize this fact, although the majority of the membership is Negro . . . They have expelled all persons who have attempted to deal with these problems.

This conflict was, interestingly, somewhat similar to that cleaving the civil rights movement today. The STFU, convinced that poor Southerners, black or white, would either advance together or not at all, integrated not only its program, officers, and meetings, but also its training schools and conventions — no cinch in the 1930's South. While recognizing the special handicaps of its Negro members, the STFU could not continually emphasize them at the expense of its over-all program without hopelessly alienating the whites, who had already stretched their psyches to the uttermost.

The UCAPAWA, on the other hand, was heir to the extreme Negro nationalism of the Communist line in the period 1928-34: Negroes were a separate and distinct nation under the heel of an imperialist power, the U. S., and must free themselves from the oppressor exactly as the Negroes in Africa. By 1934, this position had yielded to Russia's need for allies to help contain Hitler, and the 'united front' policy took its place. But, as noted above, both the literature and the feeling tone of the earlier position survived in the southern wing of the Party and made its way into the new CIO unions. Then as now, for many exacerbated, angry Negroes no strategy of integration could compete with the passion, rehetoric, and untrammeled hope of a black crusade.

UCAPAWA also criticized the STFU for failing to organize aggressively, but it made no effort to take up the challenge; after the split, Henderson deserted the farm workers in favor of their more easily organized industrial counterparts. When the dust of political combat had settled, the STFU's constituency had dropped from more than 30,000 to about 5,000, of whom only 20% paid dues. "You know, when you get into a union fight, you don't pay attention to anything else except the fight," commented Mitchell.

The Receding Tide: The War Years, the Not-So-Golden West, Homecoming

Despite these depletions, material and moral, the STFU showed remarkable resilience during the next few years. With the war engendered job explosion, the union confronted a new dilemma. Between 1935 and 1940, tenancy in the South declined by some 382,000. The most confident unionists — mainly white — were forsaking the land; the least skilled and confident — mainly black — were pushed from it by mechanization. Mitchell refused to mourn the shrinkage of his jurisdiction and his leadership cadre: "There is so little future in farm work that the best union is the one that works itself out of business." Still, how to serve those who could neither continue to live on cotton nor seize the alternatives?

By cooperating with the FSA and the War Manpower Commission, the union organized annual cavalcades of 1,500 workers to pick special long-staple cotton in Arizona, 500 to harvest sugar cane in Florida, and some 3,000 to pick fruit and vegetables for Seabrook Farms, Heinz, and Campbell in New Jersey. These migrants sported union buttons, carried union literature, and operated under union conditions. At Seabrook, where the STFU was represented by the Amalgamated Meatcutters Union, which had jurisdiction in the packing plants, a picker could earn $200 to $500 in six weeks, often as much as he cleared in an entire year's work in cotton.

These arrangements not only insured the survival of displaced croppers, but aided those who remained on the land. Using the alternative of a migrant job as a weapon, the STFU would open the picking season in the Delta by calling wage conferences and announcing its demands, a form of remote control bargaining which helped to raise wages from $3 to $4 and $5 per day during the war years. Immediately after the war, the liberal Truman regime's War Labor Board would seek to freeze wages in the Delta, an attempt successfully resisted by the STFU.

All of this was not accomplished without a strike or two, but as the war pre-empted public attention, there were no more headlines, no more Sharecroppers Weeks and, with the demise of the FSA, no more epic political battles. The powerful allies scattered: Tugwell and Alexander departed Washington; Norman Thomas, the union's Galahad, was now pursuing the pacifist grail, while irrepressible Pat Jackson was thoroughly embroiled in the inner and outer struggles of the CIO. A quarter century would pass before farm workers would again attract the concern and cooperation which was theirs before their collision with those massive international phenomena, Communism and World War II.

For a half dozen years after the war, farm organizing was suspended in the South. With most of his remaining membership siphoned off into the new factories or the migrant stream, Mitchell left a caretaker regime in Memphis and set out to organize the giant orchards of California. But this was not before securing, at last, an organizational affiliation for the STFU. Despite the efforts of Walter Reuther, the pro-Henderson forces were still strong enough to bar the union from the CIO, but with the help of the Meatcutters and President William Green, the STFU was welcomed into the American Federation of Labor in 1946.

By the fourth year of his California campaign, Mitchell had three strikes against him, their very names redolent of the great golden state: DiGiorgio, San Joaquin, Imperial Valley. There, on the spectacular 20,000 acre farms, the same game was played, with the same results, as on the smaller plantations of the Delta — except for the West's greater reliance on the law. The DiGiorgio strike, distinguished by a picket line strung like a necklace, or a noose, around the endless orchards, surrendered to an injunction brought in the grower's behalf by the National Labor Relations Board. After a hearing, the Board changed its mind — but that was two years later.

With his country grit, it did not occur to Mitchell that after all this — climaxing seventeen years in the front lines — he was entitled to retreat to some pie-card[4] dug-out or other. Instead, accompanied by his impressive western recruits — Hank Hasiwar, a Prince Hal of labor skates, and Dr. Ernesto Galarza, a fiercely dedicated organizer-publicist — he returned to his native habitat. Not to Arkansas, where the work force was much reduced, but to Louisiana where, year after year, thousands of strawberry and sugar cane workers earned $700 to $1,200 a year.

Requiem in Louisiana

Although he looked and sounded the same, the returned Mitchell had acquired sophistication. Always poor and a captain of the poor, he had confidently aimed his slingshot at the California Goliaths or, as one of them remarked, "The A. F. of L. sent you fellows out with a popgun to hunt elephants." It was a mistake Mitchell had no intention of repeating. In 1951, he began to press both the A. F. of L. and the CIO to provide proper financing for farm organizing, only to have his plans cancelled by the deaths of Presidents Green and Murray in 1952.

The following year, Mitchell made a modest proposal to the new A. F. of L. leader, George Meany: In addition to the Federation's annual grant of $15,000 to his union, rechristened in California the National Agricultural Workers Union, Meany should head a committee to raise an organizing fund of $250,000 from A. F. of L. affiliates. According to Mitchell, Meany responded as follows:

> He was quite familiar with everything in my memo and rejected it outright, saying the A. F. of L. in all its history had never operated in the manner I proposed — that my plan was a CIO-type of organizing . . . He also said he did not believe that a group such as farm workers could, or for that matter, wanted to be organized.

So — wiser, sadder, and equally under-caparisoned, Mitchell laid seige to southern agriculture for the second time.

Between 1951 and 1953, Mitchell and Hasiwar (aided by A. F. of L. organizers) developed a 3,200-member organization of small strawberry farmers, the largest local in NAWU's history but not the most serene. Unaware of the special legal procedures governing co-ops, and occasionally forgetful of more common laws — overzealous members dynamited a truckload of 'scab strawberries' — the local provoked the wrath of the Justice Department. Faced with a federal anti-trust suit, NAWU attorney Daniel Pollitt was able to persuade the government that the erring local would mend its ways without suffering a heavy penalty. But he reckoned without Judge Herbert Christenberry. Hearing the modest fine demanded by the prosecution, the judge bristled: "I'd be harder than that on a violation of the migratory bird laws," and slapped a $9,000 fine on the union and suspended sentences on the organizers.

The fates, which seldom tipped their hats to Mitchell, now sent him some unexpected allies. A group of Catholic priests nearby had undertaken a rather exotic mission for that time and place: They were ministering to the poor — in this case, sugar cane workers, mainly Negro, scattered among nine south Louisiana counties along the Mississippi. Their employers were the large sugar mills which had expanded their control over more than half of the cane fields, displacing tenants and family farmers. With incomes averaging less than $1,200 a year, these workers needed charity, but Father Vincent O'Connell of Loyola University in New Orleans was convinced that charity was not enough. Introducing his friend Mitchell to his friends, the cane workers, he initiated a partnership which was, for the 1953 South, unique. Backed by Archbishop Rummel, priests not only encouraged workers to join the union, but offered church and school facilities for their use.

NAWU quickly enrolled 2,000 cane workers, sought recognition, and was refused. With a surfeit of big, broken strikes behind him, Mitchell was not hankering for another one. Courteous letters were sent to the mill owners, urging any form of negotiation which would hold out some hope for the workers, and state mediators were invited. But the Sugar Cane League refused to budge. As in Arkansas, as in California, the union was faced with a simple choice: Walk away and desert your people, or strike. On October 12, 1953, after a strike vote of 1,808 to 2, "the cane mutiny," (as Time called it) began.

Strike-bound Louisiana, 1953, showed a marked resemblance to strike-bound Arkansas, 1936. Armed guards patrolled the roads, curfews were imposed, and within one week, 700 people were evicted from company homes. Father Jerome Drolet of Thibodaux, Louisiana, interviewed in New York while on a fund-raising trip for the strikers, called the mill owners "white collar, two-armed bandits." Yet neither they, nor the strike-breakers from Mississippi with rifles in hand, could control the conflagration. By October 25, the strike had spread to 75 plantations and involved 3,000 workers. At this point, Archbishop Rummel urged the mills to negotiate; they refused. For they had found a way to enlist that old reliable ally, the law.

The mills obtained an ingenious and extremely harsh injunction against the strike, on these grounds: 1) the strike imperiled a seasonal crop vital to the economy, and 2) since farm workers were omitted from all laws protecting the right to organize, it follows that the law did not intend them to organize. Or, if you don't rate protection, you don't rate a chance at all. But the irony of this argument goes beyond the obvious. As Dr. Galarza demonstrated, sugar cane workers are, of all American labor, uniquely subject to federal law, although not of the protective variety. They are regulated by a complex set of controls known as "the sugar system," wherein the government sets the prices, markets, profits, and wages of the industry. It does so, naturally, in response to pressures. Thus in Hawaii, where cane workers are organized, the 1949 hourly wage was 93¢, whereas in Louisiana it was 41¢, and in 1953, 44¢.

Nonetheless, the union's devoted (i.e., unpaid) attorneys were worried — neither the Eisenhower euphoria nor the southern courts held out much hope. When the Louisiana Supreme Court upheld the injunction against all union activities, the NAWU had no choice but to call off the strike which had held fast through a month of reprisals. Two years later, the Supreme Court dissolved the injunction, a shining moment for the deceptively cherubic Professor Pollitt (University of North Carolina Law School), who filed the brief in pauperis and whose faith in his cause kept the appeal alive. Some future union of sugar cane workers would perhaps profit from it. For this union, it came too late.

Sometimes the story of southern farm workers seems like a long exercise in black humor: No matter how bad things are, they always get worse. The battle in the cane brakes had an unexpected and drastic side effect: The passage of a right-to-work[5] law in Louisiana — a goal sought by the state's anti-union elements since 1942. This chain of events began early in 1953, when a violent paper mill strike defaced labor's image. Still, in an agricultural state, an industrial imbroglio moves no political mountains — but a farm workers' strike is something else again:

> . . .the cane field strike was a direct challenge to a traditional system in one of Louisiana's oldest and most basic industries. And it was interpreted as a flagrant insult to the men of stature and influence who controlled the system. Its repercussions were deep-rooted and long lasting . . . The strength of the agricultural influence is evidenced by the fact that the Farm Bureau subsequently took over the right-to-work campaign — lock, stock, and money bags.

The above is taken from a lengthy document distributed by the Louisiana Labor Council to explain its actions between the passage of the right-to-work law in 1954, and its repeal in 1956 — there being a considerable body of opinion which held that an explanation was called for. What had happened, according to the Council, was that by dint of arduous and adroit campaigning during the state elections of 1955-56, the state labor movement won a bargaining position vis-a-vis the legislature. It then discovered that the solons could be persuaded to repeal the over-all right-to-work law only if a new one, applicable solely to agricultural workers, was enacted. The Labor Council acquiesced, and by 1956 Louisiana became the first, and to date the only, southern state to free industrial workers from this hamstringing legislation.

The engineer of this victory was Labor Council President Victor J. Bussie — widely regarded as one of the most effective and most advanced of southern labor chiefs. Consider then his dismay when the Council's repeal celebration was jarred by a clamor of protest from Mitchell and Jackson (now with the merged AFL-CIO), who urged every labor journalist they could lay hands on to beard Bussie in his Baton Rouge den. But Bussie, a game fighter, refused to retreat.

Had the Labor Council not given every assistance to NAWU's organizing drives, to the tune of some $13,000? Had they not helped Mitchell during the strike, although some of them felt that NAWU was a bunch of "stargazers"? After all this had failed, was the Council required to consign the entire labor movement to wrack and ruin because the Louisiana power elite were determined to prevent farm organizing? Finally, the new legislation did not add any new burdens to NAWU—it merely lifted the old ones from the rest of the unions. In sum, was this not the realistic thing to do? Bussie submitted his case to the AFL-CIO Executive Council and was—predictably if uneasily—upheld. Said labor commentator Paul Jacobs: "One wonders who was more uncomfortable when Mitchell and

[5]These euphemistically titled laws prohibit the union shop, a traditional form of union security whereby, once the union is recognized by the employer, all the employees in the bargaining unit must assume union membership with all the privileges and obligations thereof. (Unlike the closed shop, where union membership is a requisite of employment, the employer is free to hire whom he pleases.) Organized labor opposes these laws because 1) a union cannot be responsible to an employer unless its discipline applies to all plant employees, and 2) since the union must bargain for and protect all the employees, those who pay no dues for such services are "free riders."

Galarza left Unity House, they, driving away in a beat-up and battered car, or the powerful board members who remained behind." Nor did the Council's discomfort make it more amenable to NAWU's appeal for funds. There was not even a booby prize for the loser.

At what point does an organizational image begin to lose luster? At this time, the newly joined AFL-CIO was a little less than a year old—all the excitement of its inaugural fresh in the memory. The labor reporters at the Council meeting understood Bussie's dilemma. But many knew about the farm workers' struggle from way back, knew about the sugar cane strike, unsupported by its then parent organization, the national A. F. of L., knew about the Supreme Court appeal, on which even the usually helpful CIO refused to risk money. Any or all of these omissions and commissions could be explained as realistic unionism. But the newly united labor leaders had spoken movingly about organizing the unorganized—the poor, the submerged, the forgotten. Clearly, they did not choose to do so in Louisiana. If not there—where? And when?

"We been 'buked and we been scorned": Revolt in Mississippi

For the next nine years, nothing stirred in the southern fields; immemorial custom reigned serene. NAWU, limping along painfully on the financial crutch of the National Sharecroppers Fund, gave up the ghost in 1960. When Harvest of Shame was televised, there was no longer even the pretense of a farm workers' union. As for Mitchell, he stuck to his last; refusing Reuther's generous offer of a swivel-chair job in Washington, he headed back to Louisiana. He is there now, organizing blacks and whites into the Meatcutters Union and raising money for a community organizing project in Reserve, directed by a local Negro leader who emerged in the sugar cane strike. He has, in Adam Clayton Powell's phrase, kept the faith.

During these years, southern farm workers continued to be denied the right to collective bargaining, to a minimum wage and overtime pay, to unemployment compensation and workmen's compensation[6]—and their children worked in the fields when they were not in school, and often when they should have been. In 1964, farm wages in the South[7] averaged about 75¢ an hour, whereas the national average was $1.13. (The only non-southern states averaging less than $1 per hour were New Mexico and Texas, both above 90¢.) This persistent deprivation triggered one of the great out-migrations of history. In the nine-state heartland of the South, the number of tenant families plummeted from 1,210,000 in 1935 to 162,121 in 1964; more than 40% of those displaced were Negro. As people were thrown off the land, the mass of day laborers and migrants swelled to a high of 806,100 in 1954. By 1959, only 567,358—or between two and three million individuals—remained; the vast majority of those who fled were Negro.

[6]In Florida, growers who employ foreign workers contractually covered by workmen's compensation sometimes extend coverage to their domestic workers. Throughout agriculture, coverage is largely by grower option, yet farm labor ranked third among death dealing occupations in 1963.

[7]"The South" has throughout referred to Odum's eleven-state area: Virginia, Kentucky, Tennessee, Arkansas, North and South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana. But since many statistical comparisons are now based on the nine-state "heartland" excluding Virginia and Kentucky, that practice has been followed in this passage. The addition of those two states, averaging an hourly 89¢ and 93¢ respectively, raises the all-South wage figure to 78.7¢ an hour.

The southern elite was unperturbed by this vast exodus. Let the Negro search for the Promised Land in whatever miserable ghetto up North—as long as he didn't dream of searching for it in the place where he was born and raised, "Home, the only home he will ever really know," in the words of Negro poet Calvin Hernton. But in 1960, the South discovered that those Negroes who remained had been dreaming that dream for a long, long time, and that no force on earth could deter them from seeking to re-create it in reality.

It was five years before the Revolution dug down to the nitty gritty, but it was bound to come. After the bus stations and restaurants, the Freedom Schools and the voting, the 'new Negroes' would finally look around at the sagging houses, meager tables, and yard toilets, and the $2.50 per day which accounted for them, and bring the Revolution to "where it's at." Like its parent organization, the Freedom Democratic Party, the Mississippi Free Labor Union was born out of the Mississippi Summer of 1964. And like that legendary time, it was the product of black and white, young and old, churched and unchurched—of young Bob Weil, Mary Sue Gellatly, and Bob Scoville, who taught the Freedom Schools, of Reverends Larry Walker and Art Thomas of the Delta Ministry, of Fannie Lou Hamer, Charles MacLaurin, and Amzie Moore, whose Freedom Democratic Party galvanized the northern Mississippi Delta—and lastly, of the twelve tractor drivers who walked off the Andrews plantation on May 31, 1965, setting off the first major farm workers' strike in thirty years.

Mr. Andrews was informed of the strike at 6 P.M. the day before. By 9 P.M., the utilities in plantation houses were turned off, and by 2 A.M., the eviction notices were on the door. When the 80 people who spent the night at the Delta Ministry's Mount Beulah Center couldn't get back early in the morning to remove their belongings, the sheriff tossed everything into the street. Much was broken, or repossessed by the furniture companies, whose trucks were waiting. To observe this strike was to enter a time capsule and step out into the 1930's. The Tribbett twelve, sitting in the savage sun of the Mississippi August trying to sew together their Tent City, just blown down by a storm, differed in one thing from the Missouri highway demonstrators of 1938—they broiled while the latter froze.

Said Garther Martin, a somber, deliberate man of 35, "A while back I owed Andrews $400 for my wife's doctor bills during the winter. She chops an' I drive a tractor, $6 a day. But what do you do in the winter, except maybe run rabbits? When you do work, you got the piled-up bills for rent an 'lectricity—naw, no indoor plumbing an' only two houses has tubs—an' anything special that come along, like sickness. So you're never outta debt—you always startin' to work on a brand new debt."

At first, clusters of tractor drivers, choppers, waitresses, and maids—about 1,000 in all—responded to the pickets "Turn back," to Reverend Walker, in blue jeans and open shirt, shouting, "If these twelve men lose, you all lose," to Fannie Lou Hamer, shivering the soul with "Go Tell It on the Mountain," and preaching: "Pharaoh is right here in Sunflower County! Israel's children are building bricks without straw—at $3 a day." But within a month, the leading strikers were arrested, an injunction was obtained limiting the picketing, and tractor drivers were offered $7.50 to stay on the job. "People are mad, but they're scared," said picket Wallace Green, formerly an Andrews foreman. "They know the whites done beat their kinfolk. One boy, they burned him and buried him standin' up." And in June there were the fierce beatings of FDP demonstrators in Jackson, not to mention those borne by Mrs. Hamer and Charles MacLaurin the year before. By August, a tight-lipped MacLaurin conceded that no more than 250 were still on strike.

In his no-nonsense Jackson office, the baffled president of the Mississippi AFL-CIO exploded: "I told 'em! Walker talked to me about organizing these people in '64, and I told him. How you gonna organize 25,000 cotton pickers and choppers who work 2½ months a year and can't do nothin' else? Or 3,000 tractor drivers scattered all over the goddam Delta—you know how many organizers it'd take?" Again an able, dedicated AFL-CIO leader was caught in a bind; again he was explaining. And by his own lights, the lights of a humane, traditional unionism, he was right. But there was something which escaped Claude Ramsey, or which he couldn't afford to grasp, given a constituency he had kept tethered to the pro-civil rights AFL-CIO only by the force of his frontier personality (and dogged effort). When you're confronted with a revolution, you had better find a way to offer bread; if you don't, they will hear you say, "Let 'em eat cake," even when you didn't say it and never would. But Ramsey, working to rebuild the state's shattered Democratic Party with the only Negro allies his members would stomach—the moderates—could make the radicals no immediate, practical offer. He was still trying in August, although the Free Labor Union had openly condemned him. Several unions—Communications Workers, UAW, Teamsters—sent monies, but nothing helped. The Mississippi Free Labor Union died a' bornin'.

In 1966, Congress mounted what appeared to be the first meaningful attack on southern rural poverty since the New Deal: The Fair Labor Standards Act was amended to include farm labor in its minimum wage provisions. The wage floor would rise from $1 this year to $1.30 in 1969. For Mississippi, this reform comes too late. Informed sources predict that the increasingly mechanized planters will again use a government program to evict farm workers from the plantations: Some 100,000 choppers, hoers, and unemployed plantation tenants remaining on sufferance are expected to be thrown off the land. Many observers believe that such evictions relate to a new segregationist strategy of eroding the political potential of the Black Belt by forcing Negroes to get out.

Fortunately, the breach between the Movement, now embodied in the Child Development Group of Mississippi, and the labor leadership of the state has been healed, and energetic efforts are underway to attract industry and to re-train farm workers. Hopefully, the government will not only assist such long-range programs, but also inhibit the rate of eviction or provide adequate emergency aid. There has been a sufficiency of highway demonstrations and tent cities in the history of southern farm labor.

Unfortunately, this does not exhaust the underside of the new minimum wage law. Due to the exemption of farmers employing less than the equivalent of seven full-time people in any quarter of the preceding year, the U. S. Department of Labor estimates that no more than 166,000 farm workers will be covered in the nine-state area. Using the latest[8] figures for tenant households, 161,121—and for regular and seasonal workers, 567,358—the new wage floor will undergird some 23% of southern farm workers. And that is an optimistic estimate; other loopholes are already coming to light.

Despite a number of useful re-training, housing, and educational programs for farm workers, when it comes to basic reform, the Great Society of 1966 falls somewhat short of the New Deal of 1936.

The New Wave: Texas and Florida, 1966-67

If the Mississippi union was a still-born offspring of the civil rights movement, there was another, luckier progeny—Cesar Chavez's farm workers' union in California. Part of Chavez's luck was that, unlike his southern predecessors, he did not have to start from scratch; since 1959 the AFL-CIO's Agricultural Workers Organizing Committee had mounted a modest but resolute campaign throughout the state. After seven lean years, the AFL-CIO decided to strike the growers of the San Joaquin Valley for the hourly $1.40 set by the Labor Department as a fair wage. Chavez, who had served his labor apprenticeship on the Mitchell-Galarza picket line in the DiGiorgio strike, decided that the workers of the Valley could not afford another Waterloo. In what the hostile Nation's Business describes as his "colorful, maddening" way, Chavez transformed the cut-and-dried AFL-CIO strike into La Huelga, a roaring mixture of Mexican pride in "La Raza" and CORE, SNCC and church enthusiasm for this long silent people now stirring into blazing life.

When this new-style campaign triumphed, bringing Schenley and DiGiorgio to the bargaining table and dispelling at a stroke more than three decades of farm labor futility, the magnetic waves radiated across the continent.

In Houston, Texas, an itinerant writer and Chavez lieutenant named Gene Nelson, freed from organizing a Schenley boycott, dropped over to Rio Grande City to look into rumors of rebellion among the melon pickers. In Charlotte, North Carolina the unquenchable southern director of the Industrial Union Department of the AFL-CIO, Jim Pierce, began to cogitate about the 100,000 migrant farm workers in Florida. And in Chicago Ralph Helstein, president of the Packinghouse Workers, having racked up impressive precedents in equal opportunities for Negroes and new opportunities for the technologically displaced, turned his attention to this renewed frontier.

The new wave broke first in Texas. Nelson arrived in the Lower Valley in February, 1966, to find the Chavez charisma and decades of grievance already at work. Starr County, 97% Mexican-American, is, with its average annual income of $1,000, the poorest county in Texas and the 18th poorest in the United States. Its Mexican-American residents, who averaged 65¢ an hour for a 10 to 18 hour day, flooded into the union; within a month, 1,300 had signed up. By June, the Chavez approach—"You are sons of Zapata, you must be brave"—had sufficiently inspired the community to warrant a strike. (As usual, there was no alternative; the growers, unfettered by labor law, refused to either recognize the union or hold elections on the basis of cards signed.)

[8]Since 1964 figures for regular and seasonal farm workers are not yet available, the 1959 figures have been used in this category. Due to a decreasing out-migration rate of Negroes since 1960, no drastic change is expected between the '59 and '64 figures.

From the beginning, the strike had authentic Texas overtones — nothing picayune about it. On the first day Nelson, determined to impede the sale of scab cantaloupes, stationed himself at a switching point as a loaded train moved out of the packing shed. The engine picked up speed, Nelson stood firm, the onlookers froze. Four feet in front of the organizer, the train ground to a halt. In addition to such "Bonanza" tactics, the unionists sought to cut off grower recruiting of Mexican strikebreakers from the nearby border and to enlist the support of the Texas AFL-CIO.

They were more successful in the latter endeavor than in the former. Within six weeks, Hank Brown and Roy Evans, the leaders of the state federation, marshalled $18,000 and a ton of food and clothing for the strikers. But as increasing numbers of campesinos left to join the migrant trek up North, Nelson required a special strategy to keep both union and strike alive. Borrowing another leaf from Chavez's primer, he organized a march upon the state capital in Austin similar to the grape pickers' "penitential pilgrimage" from Delano to Sacramento.

The march, which began on July 4th, did not lack for drama, humor, or that Texas specialty—the politics of the jugular. It also had, as mascot, a Mexican burro dubbed "$1.25" in honor of the marchers' demand for a state minimum wage. Entering Edinburg on the first leg of their journey, the Huelgistas were met by an ambulance containing the hospitalized mayor, who was determined to welcome them. By the time they arrived in Corpus Christi, their ranks included students and faculty from Texas A. & M., steel and electrical workers from San Antonio and, a little further on, a Negro delegation from Huntsville.

Floresville, near Governor John Connolly's ranch, was notable for the absence of its favorite son. But in San Antonio Senator Ralph Yarborough, fresh from the minimum wage battle in Washington, revived the marchers with "Viva el campesino! Viva victory for the workers of America!" There also the march, which was led by a Catholic priest and a Baptist minister, received its strongest religious endorsement. During a mass for the marchers Archbishop Robert E. Lucey, a long time friend of farm labor, said: "It is with a large measure of reluctance and regret that we endorse and approve your demand for an hourly wage of $1.25. No sane man would consider that a fair wage in these days . . . $1.25 is ghastly recompense for exhausting labor under the burning sun of Texas."

However, the peak moment of the 490-mile demonstration came unexpectedly. A few days before the marchers were to enter Austin, Governor Connally and entourage suddenly swooped down upon them in the middle of the road. A tape recorder picked up the exchange:

Gov: I want to compliment you on having a very peaceful, a very orderly march. I hope it will remain so, and, uh, I want to ask you today to, as you proceed, if you, uh, insist on proceeding with the march, then, uh, I want to ask you to be, uh, very careful to see that the march does remain, uh, very orderly.

Reverend Novarro: That's why Father Gonzalez and I are co-chairmen of the march, and this is a march for justice, and it is being held of the principle of human dignity. And honor.

Gov.: I'm delighted that it is . . . my personal ears or the ears of government > are never deaf to the needs of the people of this state. . . . I hope you understand, however, that there is always some reluctance on the part of those of us who occupy positions of leadership, it certainly is true of me, that, uh, there are ways and there are methods by which you achieve your ends.

After some fifteen minutes of this, during which the governor refused to make any commitment for the minimum wage, the cavalcade of Lincolns swept away from the silent, deflated crowd.

But it was too late to turn the marchers around. On Labor Day, 56 days after they set out, 6,500 of them streamed over the Colorado Bridge to be met by 4,000 cheering sympathizers on the capitol steps. A few blocks earlier, Senator Yarborough had joined the column, to loud hosannas. Up ahead, "$1.25" had dropped a mess on the road and an AFL-CIO man ran up to Yarborough: "Cuidado, be careful; don't step on the governor's platform." The Texas Observer had welcomed the marchers to Austin with an editorial which began: "The Valley farm workers who are walking 490 miles from Rio Grande City to Austin have walked step by step from obscurity and exploitation into Texas history." It was a sentiment passionately echoed by a dozen speakers, many of whom made reference to the governor's absence.

Bill Kircher, organizing director for the AFL-CIO, said, "I give you the pledge of 15 million AFL-CIO workers that from now to eternity we will stay behind you until you obtain the goals you set for yourselves." Another march leader, Father Antonio Gonzalez, spotted his parents in the crowd, discarded his text, and said:

> My mother had 18 children and she has been working in the fields for 40 years. She still works in the fields. She just came back from Minnesota. Why should she have to do that? My father has cancer, yet he is working in the fields. Forty years migrating to look for food is too long. it's a disgrace—a Texas disgrace and a national disgrace!

Responding to the crowd's affection, Ralph Yarborough shared with his "Amigos, compadres," a great Anglo's sense of occasion: "As King Henry V said on the eve of Agincourt:

> We few
> We happy few
> We band of brothers
> For he who stands with me today shall > be my brother . . ."

These happy few have yet to win their Agincourt. And this time, it is not for a lack of Henrys. The labor movement has come "a fur piece" since H. L. Mitchell, Galarza, Mrs. Hamer, Amzie Moore and the others fought and lost alone. The campesinos of Texas fight alongside Cesar Chavez, Bill Kircher, Roy Reuther—all have come repeatedly to Rio Grande City—and they lose just the same. And in just about the same way.

The main difference is one Texas shares with California: the strikebreaker from Mexico. Although the bracero program (large scale, contractual importing of Mexican farm workers) has been discontinued, individual Mexicans with "permit cards" can take jobs in Texas. In May of this year, American labor leaders persuaded the Mexican Federation of Labor (CTM) to post its red Huelga flag on the Mexican side of the entry bridge near Rio Grande City. Since Mexican law forbids violation of CTM strikes, the supply of strikebreakers was cut off for three crucial days while the melons ripened for harvest. Then the Mexican flag disappeared. Sorry, said the CTM, the governor of the province told us that Mexico has no war with the United States. "I think Connally called the governor," says Gilbert Padilla, a vice president of Chavez's United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, who is guiding the strike at present.

When Padilla posted his pickets on the American side of the bridge, he encountered the growers' familiar ultimate weapon. The Texas Rangers, whose fame was achieved in more exalted feats, shoved, insulted, and arrested the pickets in the first of 117 arrests and several severe beatings which evoked the censure of the League of United Latin-American Citizens, an investigating committee of the state Senate, the Texas Advisory Committee to the U. S. Civil Rights Commission, Congressman Henry Gonzalez, and Senator Yarborough. By beating striker Magdaleno Dimas, whose police record made him fair game, until he had a serious concussion, the Rangers also invited a visit from the Migratory Labor Subcommittee of the U. S. Senate.

After hearing medical testimony and talking with many strikers, Chairman Harrison Williams (D., N. J.) said:

> There has been a great deal of testimony that Capt. Allee and the Rangers under his direction have trespassed upon private property, made numerous arrests without proper cause, used physical force far beyond that required to take a subject into custody, participated in acts of strikebreaking, and committed other infringements of personal and property rights. That testimony stands uncontradicted by Allee.

Despite a number of advantages unavailable to their predecessors—seasoned and compelling leadership, material and moral assistance from the AFL-CIO, political support in high places—the campesinos of the Rio Grande valley will have to live a while longer on moral indignation and $1.00 an hour, the new federal minimum wage for farm workers.[9]

A similar conclusion may be drawn from the effort to organize the 100,000 Negro and Mexican-American migrant workers of Florida. Like the Texas effort, this was a "first." Despite Harvest of Shame, despite public and private committees, hearings, and reports, no union had summoned the will, the audacity, to offer leadership to these most alienated of American workers. Living on $900 a year, disease-ridden (in one Florida county 100% of all migrant children have parasitic diseases), largely illiterate and rootless, the migrant workers have been thrust outside the pale of organized society—and that includes organized labor.

But the IUD's Jim Pierce is the exception to the cautious rule. A man who enjoys his no-holds-barred, two-year slugging match with the giant J. P. Stevens Co., Pierce was moved, in both senses, by the migrant challenge. By the spring of 1966, he had laid the groundwork for the third "new wave" campaign to organize American farm workers. Eschewing the use of conventional organizers, Pierce [9]Texas being both historically and statistically more southwestern than southern, the writer did not intend at the outset to include it in this report and therefore omitted the field trip which provides the basis for the other contemporary sections. hunted for staff in unexpected quarters. With the help of the Southern Regional Council's Emory Via,[10] he aroused the interest of the Southern Students' Organizing Committee. In the summer, seven students hit the migrant trail, handing out union cards from Florida through Michigan, New York, New Jersey, Maryland, and Delaware. Afterwards, the graduates among them returned to Florida to harvest the fruit of these labors—with bravura results.

Assigned to help the celery pickers in Belle Glade, Tommy Martin, a thin, dark young coyote from Arkansas, proceeded to lead a two-day walk-out of 2,500 workers to demand more than $1.15 per hour that set the growers on their ear and served notice that some changes were being made. Mike Lozoff, a native Floridian, followed this opener with a campaign to improve migrant housing, not one whit changed since its television debut in Harvest of Shame. A judicious use of pickets and publicity produced first outrage, then concessions—and substantially improved living quarters.

Pierce had, in the meantime, moved to organize the community in support of the migrants. By October, the American Friends Service Committee, the Florida Migrant Ministry, the Catholic Board of Human Relations, and the OEO Community Action Fund had joined in the Florida Citizens for Farm Labor—a formidable massing of benevolent forces. Despite these advances, the organizing drive was in trouble: The Industrial Union Department could not muster the funds required for a concerted assault on the powerful fruit and vegetable growers' associations backed, as result of the November elections, by the conservative regime of Governor Claude Kirk.

Still, IUD president Walter Reuther and organizing director Nick Zonarich refused to retreat. Instead, they appealed to Ralph Helstein, the innovating leader of the Packinghouse Workers. In what may have been a decision more of the heart than the head, Helstein accepted. After rounding up experienced farm organizers from California, he addressed himself to the task of finding a strategy which would successfully pit limited funds, limited staff, and angry but undisciplined workers against the relatively unlimited funds, skills, and political clout of the growers. At this writing, the search—and the organizing—continues.

At the conclusion of the Senate Migratory Labor Subcommittee hearings in Rio Grande City, Senator Harrison Williams said that the testimony "comprised the most powerful evidence this committee has ever received" of the need to extend the protection of the national labor laws to the workers in the fields. Although these laws do not by themselves provide instant solutions to the problems of southern workers (as the underpaid, unorganized industrial South amply proves), they are at least a beginning—a breach in the 100-year-old feudal wall.

But recently there has been evidence of an even more compelling nature. On June 25, the Southern Regional Council released a report prepared by six physicians who had undertaken a field trip through Mississippi. The report is entitled "Hungry Children," and its 27 pages of frightful detail are summed up as follows:

> In sum, we saw children who are hungry and who are sick—children for whom hunger is a daily fact of life and sickness, in many forms, an inevitability. We do not want to quibble over words, but "malnutrition" is not quite what we found . . . (These children) are suffering from hunger and disease and directly or indirectly they are dying from them—which is exactly what "starvation" means.

These are the children of farm workers and children like them may be found throughout the rural South. It is an important fact about America that we have sat still while this final, unbearable evidence has accumulated. And we are sitting yet.

I. Introduction

A registration campaign in full swing is exciting to watch. People are out knocking on doors, meetings are being held, telephone calls are being made, and drivers are busy with buses and cars bringing people to the registration offices.

All this doesn't happen automatically. A well-organized registration campaign takes thought, careful planning, hard work and plenty of determination.

During the past year, the Voter Education Project was associated with nearly one hundred voter registration programs. Many of the experiences reported by these various programs have been used in writing this booklet. We hope the booklet will help others in planning their registration campaigns.

Of course, no two communities are alike. Rural areas may not want to use approaches used in urban areas, and vice versa. Each community should know what will work and what won't. Each community will have to make these decisions for itself. The purpose of this booklet is to offer suggestions that might be helpful in making the decisions.

II. Planning and Organizing

The key to a successful registration campaign is good planning and organizing. Don't wait until the last minute to start. Begin planning well ahead of the registration deadline.

The campaign should be planned and organized to fit the needs of the community. Make sure there is someone to fill every job. Then make sure every job gets done. A really good registration campaign leaves no loose ends. Here are some suggested steps which can be followed:

1. The first step is getting someone to serve as campaign director. He should be a responsible and capable leader. He should be someone who can get volunteers and raise money. He should be someone who knows the community. His is the most important single job in the campaign, since he will be responsible for leading the campaign every minute of every day until it is completed.

2. It is helpful to have a group of capable men and women working with the director as an advisory committee. These also should be responsible people with a thorough knowledge of the community.

3. Decide what area will be covered by your campaign. It may be several counties, one county, part of a county, a city, or part of a city. Get detailed maps of the area. Mark off your target area so that everyone who takes part in the campaign will know exactly where it is.

4. Get registration and voting figures for the target area, as well as figures on the voting-age population. Voting-age figures can be taken from census reports. Registration and voting figures often may be found at the courthouse or city hall. Sometimes a registration list can be obtained. However, it may be necessary to make a house-to-house survey to find out who isn't registered. (We'll talk later in this booklet about door-to-door canvassing.) The Voter Education Project has approximate registration figures by counties for seven states. Space is provided in the back of this booklet for writing down figures on registration and voting. It is important to get the actual registration list, if it is available.

5. Study the figures and plan your campaign so that the most attention will go to the areas that need it.

6. Study past registration drives. If these were not successful, where and how did they fail?

7. Set a budget for the registration campaign. This will tell you how much you will have set aside to spend for transportation, office supplies and other items. It also will tell you how much money has to be raised to pay for them. Remember, a campaign can succeed with a small amount of money if it is well organized. Wherever possible use volunteers. And ask businesses, churches and clubs to donate such things as office space and meeting halls.

8. Study state registration laws and the federal Voting Rights Act. (Copies of the Voting Rights Act can be obtained from the Voter Education Project, 5 Forsyth Street, N. W., Atlanta, Georgia 30303, or from the U. S. Civil Rights Commission, Washington, D. C. 20425.) Make sure you know what the county registrars are required to do and when their office is open. Get the names of registrars, election commissioners and other key officials. You may want to write their names in the space provided at the end of this booklet.

9. Draw up a list of local issues that can be used in persuading people to register and vote. This will help you explain the importance of voting in down-to-earth, practical terms. A section on local issues appears later on in this booklet.

10. Call on the registrars early. Don't go alone. A committee of two or three is better than a single spokesman. The committee of spokesmen should tell the registrars that workers will be bringing in people to register. The committee should ask the registrars to make it as easy and convenient as possible for people to register.

11. Urge the registrars to increase registration days and hours. Ask them to stay open on evenings and weekends while registration activities are going on. Ask the registrars to keep the office open for business as near the registration deadline and as near election day as possible. Where office days and hours are set by law, make sure that the registrars stay open at least as often as required.

12. Request that the registrars appoint some deputy registrars to travel the area and register people at large gatherings. Also urge the registrars to let you (or the deputy registrars) register people at schools, libraries, community centers, shopping centers and other convenient places, where it is legal to do so.

13. Recommend that the deputy registrars be thoroughly trained for their work. This will help avoid questions about whether the deputy registrars are doing the job as it should be done.

These last four steps call for meetings with the registrars. Keep after the registrars about every right that belongs to you and your group. If the registrars refuse to cooperate and give no good reason for it, go with your committee of spokesmen to the county governing board. Let everyone know you will ask for everything you rightfully can expect.

Point 8 above is highly important. The campaign director should know exactly what the law is. So should the advisory committee and other campaign leaders. Then as questions come up, these questions can be handled without troublesome delays. And someone will know exactly what the registrars are supposed to do.

In counties where the U. S. attorney general has assigned federal examiners, you will find that many Negroes would rather register with these examiners than go to the courthouse. Federal examiners generally set up their offices in post offices. But in some counties, the examiners have rented space in such buildings as stores and motels. Sometimes they set up offices in trailers.

Many Negroes feel more comfortable and confident about registering with federal examiners. And registration with examiners can continue even after state registration deadlines have passed. It is possible to vote in an election if you register with a federal examiner as much as 45 days before the election.

III. Setting Goals

You may want to set certain goals for your project—that is, things you hope and expect to do. Be sure everyone in the drive knows these goals and what is expected. The goals may include the following (some of which were used in Madison County, Tennessee):

1. Registering as much of the voting-age population as possible. This may mean setting some sort of target figure—five hundred, a thousand, or even ten thousand, depending on the community.

2. Offering classes on the basic facts about government. (Be sure the facts are carefully checked.)

3. Encouraging young people to participate.

4. Developing leadership of all ages for the future.

5. Urging civic groups (PTA's, fraternities, neighborhood organizations and the like) to inform the public about local issues and participate in ongoing citizenship education.

IV. Committees

You may want to set up several or more committees for your drive. The number will depend on the size of your community and the goals of your drive.

A large campaign may well need a campaign committee. This committee's job is to work with the director in guiding the day-to-day operation of the drive. Its membership could be the same as the advisory committee mentioned earlier. Or it could consist of chairmen from the various wards, precincts, blocks, beats and other voting areas.

Now decide on any special committees that you will need. Here is a list of committees that have been used in other projects:

1. Canvassers, or Blockworkers. These people are used in door-to-door operations. They may work under captains or coordinators. Or they may work under the precinct, block and beat leaders mentioned in the campaign committee above. Often these canvassers are students and young people. But they can be housewives, farmers or anyone who wants to do the work.

2. Transportation. This committee carries people to the courthouse and various places of registration. Many people do not have cars and are much more likely to register if they are given transportation. Members of the transportation committee should know the streets and roads. Their job is to locate and arrange transportation for the entire registration drive—cars, buses, trucks and whatever might be available. This might include transportation, when necessary, for registration workers. (Chapter VI in this booklet discusses transportation.)

3. Telephoning. This committee's job is to telephone unregistered residents, remind them of the registration deadline and urge them to register. One approach is to check registration lists, where available, against city directories and telephone books. In this way, the names of unregistered persons can be determined. Those with telephones can be called. Names of those without telephones can be given to the canvassing committee for personal visits. Follow-up calls should be made to see whether those promising to register have done so. Card files might be made, both of registered and unregistered residents. People on the telephone committee can be housewives, elderly people, teenage girls and anyone who would like to work in the campaign without leaving home.

4. Public Relations. This committee handles newspaper stories and calls upon radio and television stations to try to get announcements broadcast. (Radio is especially important in many communities. Disc jockies can be particularly helpful.) Committee members write press releases and announcements. If free space and time is not available, it may be necessary to buy advertising (if, of course, the campaign budget permits it). The committee may also arrange neighborhood, precinct and area mass meetings.

5. Leaflets and Posters. It is up to this committee to prepare catchy posters, bumper stickers, leaflets and handbills for use in the registration program. A sample locally prepared leaflet is shown on the page opposite. This is a good leaflet because it ties a local issue (the election of legislators) to the importance of voting. It tells about the removal of old barriers to voting, such as the poll tax and the literacy test. And it lets people know somebody stands ready to help if help is needed.

6. Speakers. This committee must supply speakers for mass meetings, rallies, civic club meetings, church services and other public occasions. Speakers should be selected who can tell the story well and stir the listeners. The job of arranging mass meetings may be assigned to this committee instead of the public relations committee.

7. Churches. The church committee seeks support for the registration campaign from ministers and ministerial associations. The local ministerial alliance should be asked early to officially endorse the campaign. And ministers should be asked to kick off the campaign with a "Citizenship Sunday." This could be connected with a sermon on citizenship. Ministers could announce the registration campaign themselves, or they could permit a registration worker to make a brief announcement and address from

NEGRO CITIZENS!!

Only a few more weeks are left before the July primary for Senators and Representatives.

There are only 3 more days to register before the books close:

the pulpit. The ministers should be asked to make periodic announcements to their congregations during the registration campaign. And workers in the campaign should visit revivals and gospel sings to urge people to register. In many communities, churches are used for meetings and church buses are used to transport people wishing to register. Some churches may not want to take part in these activities. In many communities, however, ministers have been among the leaders in registration campaigns.

8. Babysitters. This committee's job is to take care of children while parents are registering. It also may take care of the children of registration workers. The committee often is composed of high school age and college age young ladies. But elderly people can be quite helpful here too.

9. Soundtrucks. In communities where they are permitted, soundtrucks are a good way to reach a lot of people and get them to listen to what you have to say.

10. Prizes. Awards and prizes often encourage registration workers to work harder. The competition can be between individuals, or it can be between groups such as precinct committees or various churches and civic bodies. The prizes can be cash or they can be goods, such as a sack of groceries to the worker who registers the most people during the week. Or the prize can be a trophy or plaque.

Again, it is not necessary to have all of the committees listed above. It all depends on the size and nature of your campaign. But appointing committees is a good way of making clear who is responsible for what job. If you want only a few committees, several of those on the list above can be combined. For example, the public relations committee could be given the additional task of handling leaflets, posters and speakers.

Committee appointments can be made by the campaign director or by the advisory committee or by both.

V. Students and Young People

It is a good idea to have students and young people in your project because many of them are full of enthusiasm and new approaches. Most young people are willing to work long and hard. They are unusually dedicated and energetic.

Students and young people to work in your project may be contacted through:

1. Other registration projects.
2. Local and nearby colleges, especially those having pre-college programs and summer sessions.
3. Letters to officials of Negro colleges.
4. Letters to student groups and youth organizations.
5. Local high schools.

Often, students and young people will work without pay. Sometimes they will ask only for a small allowance to cover the cost of meals and other necessities.

In some instances, a coordinator for the young people may come from outside the community—possibly from such groups as civil rights organizations, the American Friends Service Committee, and student religious organizations.

It would be wise to pick out some of the more promising young people and give them responsible jobs in your project. This is a way of developing leadership for the future.

VI. Transportation

Transportation is important enough to discuss further. It can be a real problem in rural areas and in any area where people live some distance away from the registration office.

As suggested previously, many churches have a bus or station wagon that could be used. And the congregations could be asked to provide private cars.

Cab companies, bus companies, and ambulance services also can be helpful in providing transportation to get people to the registration office. In one rural Georgia county where the cost of gasoline was a problem, canvassers used bicycles.

When you feel discouraged, remember the story of the registration worker in rural Mississippi who had no transportation for the long trip to the courthouse. She sat on the edge of the highway for three hours until she and her potential voter got a ride into town. That's determination!

VII. Canvassing

Door-to-door canvassing is the heart of most registration campaigns. This is the person-to-person part of the project.

Canvassing should start well ahead of the registration deadline. Time should be allowed to contact some residents more than once, if necessary.

Suppose you are a canvasser. Here are some things you should do in canvassing:

Choose a time when you will be able to talk to the largest number of people. The best time usually is between 4 p.m. and 8 p.m. on weekdays.

It helps to have a registration list, perhaps on index cards as mentioned previously. This will tell you who is registered and who isn't.

When the door is opened, introduce yourself. Some canvassers wear badges or streamers identifying them as registration workers.

Come straight to the point or chat awhile, depending on the circumstances. Assume that all the adults in the home are unregistered until you have reason to believe otherwise. Many people do not like to admit they are not registered. Inquire about all the adults in the home.

If the unregistered person needs transportation, it helps to be able to offer a ride straight to the courthouse then and there. This way the unregistered person will not have time to change his mind. This way you will know that he or she went to the registration office.

If the unregistered person wants to make the trip later, set a certain day and time. Leave your name, the name of the project, and the project telephone number in case the unregistered person decides he wants to go earlier. Also offer to provide babysitters if this service is needed.

Sometimes the problem is either fear or apathy. It might help to tell these people about the Voting Rights Act of 1965. The Voting Rights Act stopped poll taxes, literacy tests and other devices that have kept Negroes from voting in the Deep South. This covers Virginia, Georgia, South Carolina, Louisiana, Alabama, Mississippi and part of North Carolina.

You should know how to tell those who are reluctant to register about this law. You also should know about state registration laws. This will make it possible for you to answer such questions as how long a voter must live in the state and county, how old he must be, how soon he must register, and so on.

Some communities hold training workshops for canvassers. At these workshops canvassers learn all the basic facts they need to know—where, when and how to register, and who can register. Canvassers also decide at these workshops what is the best way to approach people to get them to register.

It helps to have a handbill, similar to those described previously, with all the basic facts on it. This handbill can be given to residents of the home. Or it can be left in the mailbox.

Make follow-up visits at the homes of those who promise to register later, in order to make certain that they have. Also make follow-up visits to families that were not at home at the time of the first visit. Some registration projects use doorknob cards, in addition to handbills, as a means of letting families know that a registration worker had been there while they were away.

Canvassers should keep complete records of their calls. Names and addresses should be kept of those registering, those promising to register, and those refusing. This information can be put on index cards and be used in future registration projects and in get-out-the-vote programs.

Canvassing can be both challenging and frustrating. You will meet people who think they are too old to vote and people who think politics is nothing but a hopeless and crooked game. You will meet people who just aren't interested.

Sometimes doors will be slammed in your face. But if you can get one person to listen, he will talk to his neighbors and lessen their fears and doubts. Sometimes, particularly in rural areas, you will find someone who is known as the "key man." If you can persuade this man to go register, others will follow his example and go too.

Stick to the job and keep going back. Know your facts and know how to present them. If you really believe in voter registration, chances are you will be able to get others to believe in it too.

VIII. Putting Issues to Use

It is much easier to talk to people if registration is tied to local issues. In every community, there are problems and needs that are close to the hearts of the people. It helps to be able to point out that registration and voting can be steps toward solving these problems.

Depending on the community, such issues might include the following:

1. Getting good schools.

2. Getting good streets and roads, sidewalks, streetlights, sewers, garbage collection and other services.

3. Getting anti-poverty and welfare programs that are needed.

4. Getting Negro law enforcement officers, legislators, school board members, tax officials and other officeholders and public employees.

5. Getting fair fines and sentences in the courts, and stopping uncalled-for "nuisance" arrests.

6. Ending police brutality, both inside the jail and outside the jail.

7. Doing away with restrictions such as curfews that apply only to Negroes.

8. Gaining the necessary political power to do such things as demanding representation on selective service boards that decide which Negro and white youths will be drafted.

9. Electing, or helping to elect, Negro and white candidates who believe in justice and fair play for all citizens.

10. Defeating, or helping to defeat, officeholders and candidates who do not believe in justice and fair play for all citizens.

These are but some of the issues that can be used. You probably know of others. If the unregistered person is told that his vote can help solve these problems, it will be much easier to convince him to go register. In some cases, whole registration campaigns have been built around one or more of the issues mentioned above.

IX. Timing

Timing is important in a good registration project. Each step—and the project itself—should be planned so that it comes just at the right time.

Keep in mind that your project will not be finished in a day or two. Most registration drives last several weeks or even several months. This means planning far into the future. And it means keeping people interested and working for a long time.

Don't start so fast that people lose interest after the first few days. Many campaign leaders have found that it is best not to go too fast at the beginning, but to move ahead gradually. This way there is something to do all the time, and people are just as busy at the end of the campaign as they were at the start.

It might be helpful to draw up a long-range timetable before the campaign begins. This timetable could be posted in the campaign headquarters, where it could be used to plan activities and check progress from day to day and from week to week.

X. Conclusion

In this booklet we have not discussed get-out-the-vote campaigns, which are quite similar to registration campaigns. The organization is pretty much the same. For a get-out-the-vote campaign you probably would want to add poll watchers to the list of committees in this booklet. A get-out-the-vote campaign is a natural follow-up for a registration campaign, since it does none of us any good to register if we don't vote.

Taking part in the sort of campaign outlined in this booklet is citizenship at its best. You are urging people to register, vote and take part in their government. You can proudly say that you have tried to do something toward improving government in your community, your state and your nation.

ON THE NATIONAL CRISIS

A STATEMENT BY

THE SOUTHERN REGIONAL COUNCIL

AUGUST 1967

A STATEMENT OF THE SOUTHERN REGIONAL COUNCIL

As an organization of Southerners of both races dedicated to equal opportunity for all, the Southern Regional Council has watched with profound grief and alarm the riots that have occurred during this first half of the summer of 1967. But far more destructive than riots would be the failure of the nation to recognize riots as a symptom of profound failure -- social and economic -- of American society to provide a chance for a decent and constructive life for vast numbers of its people, North and South, white and Negro.

Fully aware of the need for fact and sympathy in doing so, we are compelled as Southerners, out of a knowledge of our own region's tragic history of racial antagonism, to speak to the nation, urging that it act against the causes of the riots and not merely with repressive force to end them. We would also urge the South, as it continues to strive to restructure its society to conform to laws of equality and racial justice, to look upon these riots which have occurred in Northern cities as a severe object lesson in the tragic consequences of not achieving these objectives fully for all citizens.

We are grieved about the damage, destruction, injury and death attendant on riots. But we are even more concerned about the damage physically, mentally and spiritually that has been done to far more human beings over many years by the social conditions out of which the riots have risen. The grave national emergency of the riots at essence involves the conditions that southern organizations like ours have struggled against for years -- poverty and discrimination against Negroes.

As so often we have had in the past to point out that only a minority of white Southerners have engaged in racial violence, so it should be noted that only a minority of Negroes have succumbed to the destructive fury expressed in the riots. But the suffering and injustice which have stirred their fury are borne by many millions more, whites as well as Negroes.

Particularly is this true in the South. However, we can take neither comfort nor any degree of self-satisfaction out of the fact that until this moment, most of the riots and the worst of them have occurred outside the South. We can only acknowledge that historically, the South has exported people of both races not properly prepared for life in a complex modern nation, and with them have developed new variants of the deprivation and racial antagonisms that have so long crippled the South. And we can only look about our own region and know that the same conditions which have exploded into riots exist in many places in the South. The starvation-level poverty in many parts of the rural South is a particularized problem of ours, more severe and punishing probably than any other poverty in the nation.

Progress in race relations and against poverty in the South has been great in recent years. But it has not been enough. While these states have made efforts toward compliance with federal civil rights laws, perhaps to a greater degree than the rest of the nation is aware of, there has been achieved in no area of desegregation the goals of national law and commitment. In the basics of making a living, the South's per capita income has increased at a greater rate than that of the nation since 1950. But in terms of actual dollars, the gap between the South's per capita income and that of the rest of the nation has widened.

In these and other endeavors, the South has been gaining, but not enough.

In 1960, when white violence was the problem, a Southern Regional Council publication, "Racial Violence and Law Enforcement," stated: "Law enforcement is... an essential factor in the progress of race relations. In the continuing racial crises of the South, the police have two basic responsibilities: to enforce the laws with absolute impartiality; and, secondly, to maintain a climate of public order in which constitutional liberties can be freely exercised, by white men or Negroes, by integrationists, or segregationists." These responsibilities remain.

There should be no confusion of rioting with either the tradition of non-violent Negro protest demonstrations or with the honorable philosophical principles of civil disobedience. Unlawful violence by a mob has none of the moral defense or force of these traditions, and such violence must be quelled, just as white mob violence against constitutional peaceful protest has to be. But in both instances, we must be alert to the dangers of excessive, unconstitutional use of police force; we must look with apprehension on any tendency to be satisfied merely with the momentary ending of the system of violence without following through with treatment of the social and economic malfunctionings that are the underlying causes of such violence.

We must note too another grave factor in our current crisis. There now are millions of Americans outside our economic system, neither contributing to it or benefiting from it. This must realistically be seen as a serious threat to that economic system.

The Southern Regional Council supports and urges national efforts to remedy problems of race and poverty. We support and urge similar efforts on the state and local level in the South, public and private. We need to continue present efforts and improvise creative new approaches to solve such regional problems as rural and urban poverty, educational deprivation, and race relations. The South has yet the opportunity to go beyond technical compliance with law to the functioning of a truly equal, harmonious society. And because it has come to basic changes in the nature of American society later than the rest of the nation, the South also has greater opportunity, yet, to avoid mistakes others have made. We, the South, can still avoid in most cities the development of ghettoes. We can utilize intelligent planning to make people rather than things the central factor in industrialization, urbanization, the transformation of agriculture, and the utilization of natural resources and the South's as yet largely unspoiled beauty of landscape.

The Southern Regional Council believes that the good will between the races in the South has not deteriorated in these past years of often tense, total change of the legal framework of relationships between the races. Indeed, we believe that relationships have been improved to the extent that Negro Southerners have gained in self-respect and status in society, and to the extent that they have come to equal footing in their day to day, face to face encounters with white Southerners. We continue in the conviction that for the South and for the nation, the only realistic and moral goal in regard to race relations is the full integration of Negroes and other minority groups into the American society. We recognize and applaud efforts of such groups to develop legitimate methods of gaining objectives of self-interest, economically and politically. But we continue to oppose racism and separatism as antithetical to everything America stands for. It is our belief that Southerners, white and Negro, have moved and are resolved to continue to move toward the kind of society, one of equal opportunity and human dignity, made possible by the Constitution of the United States.

It is toward this high goal rather than to the absence of riots that we must look.

NEIGHBORHOODS

WHERE HUMAN RELATIONS BEGIN

A STUDY OF RESIDENTIAL PATTERNS IN PHILADELPHIA, WASHINGTON, D.C. & BALTIMORE

This study was prepared by Mrs. Margaret Price, formerly an Atlanta newspaperwoman, who now resides in Washington. Mrs. Price has prepared a number of research reports for SRC, primarily in the area of registration and voting.

"Where, after all, do universal human rights begin? In small places, close to home — so close and so small that they cannot be seen on any map of the world. Yet they are the world of the individual person: the neighborhood he lives in; the school or college he attends; the factory, farm or office where he works. Such are the places where every man, woman and child seeks equal justice, equal opportunity, equal dignity without discrimination. Unless these rights have meaning there, they have little meaning anywhere. Without concerted citizen action to uphold them close to home, we shall look in vain for progress in the larger world."

FOREWORD

One stubborn citizen, with a generous endowment of energy and intelligence, can involve his neighborhood and sometimes his city in a drive to prove that interracial housing works.

Across the nation such individuals have sparked moves to encourage white citizens to stand firm, and not to panic, when the first Negroes move into their neighborhood.

Most of these efforts have been in old, established sections of central cities, often the only neighborhoods open to Negroes. Cut off from white suburbs by overt and subtle prejudices, they have to buy houses where they can.

Their desperate need for housing often is exploited by unscrupulous real estate dealers, who in turn encourage and play upon the fear of white residents in a changing neighborhood. In such cases only the dealers profit, for the white home owner in his fright sells low and the Negro in his desperation buys high.

Where white residents decide to fight the panic-peddlers they can find allies among the Negroes who have bought homes. They also want to protect their investment. They know the speculators can turn single family homes into rooming houses, crowd three families into a house built for one, slip through variances in the zoning code, and in time turn the neighborhood into a slum.

Every city in the country with a sizeable Negro population knows something of such pressures and faces the prospect of one mid-city neighborhood after another turning into a racial ghetto. The supply of decent housing available to Negroes has not begun to keep pace with their increase and the shortage will become even worse if present population trends continue.

Figures obtained for Congressional Quarterly by the Center for Research in Marketing predict that by 1970 at least 14 big cities in the United States will have Negro populations of 40 percent or more. A majority of the population in Washington, D.C., already is Negro and three other cities are expected to top the 50 percent mark. The projections show that by 1970 the following 37 cities (100,000 population or more) will be 30 percent or more Negro:

	% Negro 1960	% Negro 1970		% Negro 1960	% Negro 1970

These changes are part of a trend that has accelerated since World War II. The Negro population once was largely southern and rural. The mechanization of farms and the hope for better futures sent Negroes into the great urban centers. At the same time, white families began leaving the cities, lured by the easy mortgage money available on the new suburban houses, the chance to have a yard, and better schools for the children. New express highways and money to buy a car made commuting easy. Their tax dollars, of course, went with them.

Negroes moving into the cities from the rural South often lacked the skills and the education which would have allowed them to compete in the job market; many of those otherwise qualified were barred by prejudice from good jobs and homes.

Cities have faced mounting welfare costs when they could least afford them. Schools have become overcrowded and resegregated. The bright promises which attracted so many Negro families failed to materialize. The resulting tensions, hatred, and bitterness led to riots over a score of cities in the summer of 1966 alone.

*A publication of the Atlanta Region Metropolitan Planning Commission dated April 1, 1966, establishes a percentage of 44.4 Negro population for the corporate limits of Atlanta as of 1966.

Middle income Negroes who could afford a decent house found the doors to suburbia closed, or open so small a crack they were afraid to take a chance and subject themselves and their families to rebuffs, or even violence.

Many northern cities have laws outlawing discrimination in public accommodations, schools, employment, and housing. These are good as a first step but too often the laws have too many loopholes, the penalties are too weak, or the enforcement agencies too understaffed to depend on these alone to solve the problems of discrimination. The federal government, through its vast powers and money, undoubtedly will have to play an increasingly large role in ensuring equal treatment for all.

The federal government, too, will have to help cities meet their other vast needs, for rapid transportation, low cost housing, mortgage guarantees for renewal and new construction for parks, civic centers and other amenities, if the deterioration of cities is to be halted.

But, until the day when cities have the plans and the money in hand to revitalize, what happens? Do the ghettos spread inexorably? The lucky cities have a band of Negro and white citizens already working to stem the tide.

This is a report of three such groups — in Philadelphia, Washington, and Baltimore — selected to illustrate different approaches of varying scope. This brief account of the structure and activities of the three was written not for the social scientist or intergroup specialists but to suggest to men and women who live in cities, or who would like to return, some methods they might use to save a neighborhood and perhaps a city.

Each group knows that no single neighborhood can stem forever the tide of encroaching ghettos, tightly hemmed in by all-white suburbs. They know they are a holding action until citizens and their governments — city, state, and national — act to relieve the pressures.

When that day comes, groups such as these will offer a nucleus of goodwill and experience upon which to build the open city of the American promise.

WEST MT. AIRY NEIGHBORS — Philadelphia

Last year, a California analytical firm submitted a $34,000 report on the schools in the Germantown section of Philadelphia. It recommended a major overhaul of the system, to stem the flight of whites to the suburbs and halt the trend which was turning Germantown into "a poverty-stricken Negro ghetto."

The report advocated a system of four-year schools divided into elementary, middle, and high school levels with a central facility where all pupils below the ninth grade would be bussed for special classes a half day each week. Estimated cost of the program was $36.7 million.

The central facility would be integrated. The other middle and elementary schools, presumably, would be predominantly white or Negro because of residential patterns. After all, Germantown was not yet ready for total integration, the analysts reasoned, and would have to begin slowly at the central building where "this confrontation under a controlled situation can reach the unconscious prejudices."

After the report, which was financed by a foundation grant, was submitted to the school board, survey analysts appeared at an open meeting to explain the details to Germantown citizens. An audience of 150, about equally divided between white and Negro parents, heard an explanation of the plan, which was well drawn and impressively buttressed with statistics.

Ordinarily, such an audience might be expected either to listen with a degree of gratitude and acquiescence, or to object with sincere, if somewhat muddleheaded, emotion.

This, however, was not an ordinary audience. If the report had been tossed into a buzz-saw it could not have been torn apart more effectively.

This could have been foreseen, for a large number of those in the audience were from the West Mt. Airy section of Germantown and belonged to the West Mt. Airy Neighbors Association. Members of this group tend to be both articulate and well-informed. They had done their homework and for every statistic which indicated that Germantown citizens weren't ready for interracial schools and neighborhoods, they could present a counter statistic.

The West Mt. Airy representatives, in short, were not impressed. When a vice president of the analytical firm said the ghetto prediction was made on "statistics nationally," the West Mt. Airy residents made it clear they did not fit the pattern.

The majority from West Mt. Airy felt the school board should spend its time and money in improving the existing school system. They argued that imaginative programs to foster excellence in each school would encourage white parents to return or stay in the city.

As for the central facility idea, a mother of three children who attend a West Mt. Airy elementary school summed up: "It is, after all the frills are removed, a weekly field trip where all races sit around for a few hours painting pictures or weaving place mats!"

West Mt. Airy is well beyond that stage.

The central facility plan has been shelved.

The Community

What kind of a place is West Mt. Airy and what were some of the facts citizens cited to disprove the contention that once Negroes move into an area it is on a downhill path?

First, West Mt. Airy is a fortunate community. Measured by most national and city standards, it is above average. To illustrate, the 1960 census showed that West Mt. Airy had:

> A population of 15,735, living in 5,045 households, showing little change from 1950, in contrast to other old Philadelphia sections which had substantial population losses.
>
> Twenty-one percent of the population, and 16 percent of the households, were nonwhite.
>
> Total population was almost evenly divided between those under 40 and those above. Among whites, however, 55 percent were over 40 and of these 30 percent were 60 years or over. Only 19 percent of the nonwhites were 40 to 60 years of age, and only seven percent were 60 or older. This meant there were more school age children among the younger Negro families.
>
> Of 4,000 West Mt. Airy families for whom the 1960 census had data, 21 percent had incomes under $5,000, 40 percent between $5,000 and $10,000 and 39 percent above $10,000. This was well above the citywide rate — 39 percent with incomes under $5,000 and only 14 percent above $10,000.
> Twenty-four percent of the population over 25 years of age had completed college; the proportion was exactly the same for whites and Negroes.

Twenty-eight percent of all men were in the professional category, 16 percent were managers or proprietors. Among nonwhite males, 22 percent were professionals and among nonwhite females, 24 percent.

Eighty percent of the households had cars, compared to 56 percent for the city; 17 percent had two cars, and three percent had three or more.

Fifty-four percent of the whites and 79 percent of the Negroes owned their homes. Citywide, the rate was 68 percent for whites and 43 percent for Negroes.

Sixty-three percent of the residences were one family houses, about a third of these detached and the rest row houses or twins, as semi-detached houses are called in Philadelphia.

The average number of persons per household was small — four persons for nonwhites and three for whites.

Values of the owner-occupied houses had remained stable, despite a tremendous volume of new housing in the city and suburbs, with the average price about the same in 1960 as in 1950. About 25 percent of the houses were valued by their owners at under $10,000 and 36 percent at $15,000 or more.

Physically, West Mt. Airy lives up to its boast of being a "Green Country Town in Philadelphia." Its 1,100 acres, or 150 city blocks, are bounded on two sides and partially bisected by a vast park and stream valley belt of 1,385 acres. Stone walls and a few towers marking the site of colonial mills and several old buildings survive from the eighteenth century but an enlightened city, beginning in 1873, returned most of the parkland to its original wilderness state for public enjoyment.

One of the oldest homes in West Mt. Airy is Upsala, an outstanding example of Federal architecture built in 1798. Beginning early in the 19th century, prosperous Philadelphians built large estates and summer homes there and in 1884 the Chestnut Hill branch of the Pennsylvania railroad was extended to serve them. Many of these big, old houses remain, surrounded by large lawns and adjoining smaller houses gradually built over a period of 50 or 60 years. Only about 10 percent of the houses were built in the past 20 years. The typical house is built of native stone.

A West Mt. Airy Neighbors brochure describes the area today: "The early farmhouses contrast with Sir Walter Scott Gothic, stock-brokers' Tudor and Cape May gingerbread . . . as became the fashion of the '80's and '90's. The solid stone twins with the sunparlor identify the blocks built in the early 20th century and the completion of row houses filled in much of the remaining open areas."

West Mt. Airy is a short ride to downtown Philadelphia, by commuter train, trolley, bus, or car. Sports facilities, including tennis courts and golf courses, and supervised playgrounds are in or near West Mt. Airy. It is next to Chestnut Hill, as fashionable in-town as the Main Line in the suburbs.

Until the 1950's, this was a settled neighborhood of stable population and property values. It was also a white neighborhood, except for one pocket of Negro families who had lived in the area for years.

Change

Then, change came to West Mount Airy. Housing tastes shifted and there was less demand for the big, old houses. Residents faced the prospect of seeing some of these converted to apartments, rooming houses, or commercial purposes.

Other forces in the city at large threatened the stability of West Mt. Airy. The white population in Philadelphia was dropping as the Negro population increased, from 380,000, or 18 percent of the total, in 1950 to 535,000, or 27 percent, in 1960. Instead of new housing for this increase, the housing market available to Negroes was shrinking. Big urban renewal projects made scant provision for the displaced poor and an estimated 71.7 percent of those forced to move were unable to find decent housing. In one such project slums were razed to make way for a middle class housing development and 20,000 poor were displaced; the majority had to move into houses as bad, if not worse, than those from which they had been evicted. At the same time, the white exodus from the city was eased by the federal government. White couples, some of whom might have preferred to stay in the city, found they could buy homes in the suburbs with small cash down payments and mortgages underwritten by the Federal Housing Authority or Veterans Administration. This massive aid to the new suburban housing market had a side effect in the city, depressing the value of old houses there to a point where banks were reluctant to issue VA or FHA mortgages.

Negroes did not have the choice of moving to the suburbs. Both Pennsylvania and the city of Philadelphia have fair housing laws, but they exempt owner-occupied one and two-family houses and 61 percent of the houses in Philadelphia fall in this category. Negroes who could afford to buy a house had only a restricted choice. Inevitably, West Mount Airy, with big old houses for which there was a limited market, would be considered by Negroes who wanted to get away from the overcrowded mid-city districts.

One Negro family had bought a home in West Mount Airy in 1951; it was more than a year later that a second Negro family bought there. By the end of 1955, 46 nonwhite families had purchased homes and by 1958 the Negro population had increased to 12 percent. Most of the Negroes tended to cluster on certain blocks.

Two groups meanwhile had begun thinking something should be done to ease the transition period and guard against panic by homeowners — the Churches Community Council and the Allens Lane Art Center. The latter operated one of the first integrated day camps in the city and had made it clear that its recreational and cultural events were open to all. Beginning in 1956 the Churches Community Council sponsored a series of meetings to discuss "How to Maintain Real Estate Values and the High Standards of Our Neighborhoods." These two organizations, by having begun discussions early on the problems of changing neighborhoods, provided a nucleus of citizens for the later group which would work for orderly change.

Meanwhile, the concern of some homeowners over the influx of Negro families was heightened when the school board, in a redistricting move to ease the plight of some badly overcrowded schools, sent Negro children from nearby areas to West Mount Airy's Henry Elementary School. Almost overnight, the school became predominantly Negro. A few more houses went up for sale. Many white parents switched their children from public to private schools. Blockbusting speculators moved on the area, in the familiar pattern.

WMAN

West Mount Airy was fortunate in having George Schermer as one of its residents. In 1958, Schermer, then chairman of the Philadelphia Commission on Human Relations, invited several residents to his home to discuss neighborhood changes. Out of this initial meeting in the Schermer living room grew West Mount Airy Neighbors, Inc. (WMAN), formed early in 1959.

From the start, Schermer suggested that the organization concentrate, not on racial stabilization, but on making West Mount Airy so attractive residents would not want to leave. Schermer felt the most important asset was a sense of community and that this should be promoted by a series of activities. He advised against programs which would suggest a fight against panic, or the posting of signs "This House Not For Sale," which he thought would be as bad as having "For Sale" signs. Members agreed and this emphasis on the attractions of the community has been the guiding principle since.

Almost casually, one of the attractions promoted is the demonstrable fact that different races can live together harmoniously.

WMAN did not ignore the existence of racial problems, however. A few blocks in the area were near a panic state and WMAN sponsored block meetings to discuss racial changes, property values, and blockbusting.

Along with George Schermer, West Mount Airy had one other big asset from the start — Mrs. Beatrice Chernak, principal of the Henry Elementary School, which serves most of the children in West Mt. Airy. She was appointed principal in 1957 when many parents already had removed their children and sent them to private schools and others were talking of doing the same thing; morale in the school was slipping badly. Mrs. Chernak was determined Henry School would be a good one, an asset to the community. She had strong allies in the Home and School Association of Henry School (this is structured under the Board of Education and works somewhat as a Parent Teacher Association elsewhere). WMAN gave active support to Mrs. Chernak and the Association.

Night after night Mrs. Chernak met with small groups of parents to convince them that they should keep their children in Henry School, that school standards would not be lowered. She convinced many. She helped direct Home and School Association meetings under psychiatric leadership where Negro and white parents could voice their fears of living together and sending their children to the same school.

Throughout, Mrs. Chernak has been one of WMAN's strongest props. Today, she is a legend in the area. She visits or calls new families in the area to invite them to send their children to Henry School. One of the favorite stories about her is that she has been known to look out her office window, see a young woman obviously about to become a mother and then dash out, hand extended, to say, "Come in, dear. I know you will want to see the school your child will attend."

Last year, the Philadelphia Inquirer called Henry "one of the most exciting schools in town," with a good library and art and music courses augmenting above average scholastic courses.

More young white families are moving into the area, with their school age children; these and the white children who are now returning from private to public school boosted the 1966 white enrollment at Henry to 31 percent.

Whites make up a much larger percentage of the general population — 75 percent — but many of these are older families with children now grown.

Activities

One of WMAN's early decisions, which has contributed greatly to its success, was the decision to hire a part time executive secretary. Mrs. Ruth Steele has held this post for the past four years. She operates from an office in her home in West Mount Airy, coordinating WMAN activities of over 800 members. WMAN has always been self-sustaining, deriving income from contributions and dues — $5 annually for families — and occasional fund raising events.

WMAN's greatest resource is a body of intelligent men and women, Negro and white, who like their neighborhood and intend to keep it a pleasant place. By now, they have enough experience to allow them to move quickly to block any change which threatens the residential pattern.

One committee keeps an eye on zoning. Every request for variance is scrutinized carefully and then WMAN decides whether to support or oppose. Their record is notable; in one area, zoning requirements were upgraded and the minimum allowable lot size was increased.

Currently, they are working with three other organizations in surrounding neighborhoods on long range plans for a survey of the area's commercial district, hoping that eventually they can apply for city funds for renovations and a public parking lot.

Another group works on preserving and improving the physical appearance of the neighborhood and keeps a close watch for violations of city sanitation codes. A collection from members and commuters financed planting, grass cutting, and flower pots at the three railroad stops the past two years; this Christmas wreaths will brighten the stations. This group also has persuaded the railroad company to start work on major repairs to walkways and approaches to the stations.

WMAN was instrumental in the passage of a city ordinance limiting the display of "For Sale" or "Sold" signs to seven days after an agreement of sale has been signed.

The Real Estate Practices Committee has obtained the signatures of more than 30 real estate brokers to a code of ethics which commits them to a promise to refrain from panic peddling and pressure tactics. In return, WMAN steers potential customers to these brokers. Mrs. Steele maintains a list and, on a rotating basis, recommends these brokers. Some of these now go out of their way to encourage sales to white families.

Occasionally, an unethical broker will solicit houses to sell, but WMAN is ready. Members are asked to report such approaches to the central office and then circulate a "Don't Call Us—We'll Call You" form. This informs the broker the property is not for sale, nor is other nearby property (space is provided for signatures and addresses of neighbors). The broker is asked to refrain from further solicitation and told that a second approach will be reported to the Pennsylvania Real Estate Commission as a violation of that body's regulations.

Property values now are stable and houses range in price from about $10,000 to $100,000, with a few even higher.

A Community Relations Committee tries to anticipate trouble and where necessary moves swiftly to meet it, providing leadership and guidance to blocks at the first hint of panic.

After some complaints of youths loitering, racing cars and motorcycles in one area, the Recreation Committee talked with the boys and found they not only needed something to do in their spare time but that they wanted to earn pocket money. A youth employment service was set up and one housewife now acts as a clearing house for teen-agers who want odd jobs and residents who need help in yard work, baby sitting, and other chores. The committee also has sponsored teen-age dances every other week at a school. Members are now trying to acquire land for a community swimming pool.

A public relations committee promotes West Mount Airy as an attractive place to live. A brochure detailing the advantages of the area has been widely circulated, through company personnel offices, churches, and clubs. A well-publicized House Tour each spring spotlights the diversity of the area: homes shown have ranged from a converted, 200-year-old weaver's cottage and a remodeled carriage house and stable, to a Victorian house and a contemporary rambler.

Favorable publicity resulted from a square dance held one year for Philadelphia's foreign students and from the entertainment another year of the families of 60 United Nations employees invited from New York for a typical American weekend. West Mount Airy also has an amateur theatrical group and Allens Lane Art Center provides a series of cultural events.

Each year WMAN gives an annual community service award. Several years ago this went to the officers and men of the 14th Police Precinct for their "tireless service and helpful friendliness."

Today

West Mount Airy Neighbors believes the hardest part is over, although there still are some problems, and the area could backslide. As Mrs. Steele puts it, "A certain amount of continuing vigilante work is necessary."

There has been some slight expansion of the housing market available to middle income Negroes, both in the city and in the suburbs, thanks to the work of other fair housing groups. This has eased the pressure for additional houses for Negroes somewhat in areas such as West Mount Airy.

Mrs. Steele said there is a creeping ghetto on the first blocks off the main commercial street, in an area of small row houses, and that WMAN "is not reaching them" and must try to develop greater contact. In another area of row houses where two white ethnic groups are concentrated, desegregation is being accepted calmly, in part due to the active role of their church.

Mortgage money has been no problem. Also, some houses have been sold by Negroes to whites. In one instance, a Negro bought a house for $22,000 and then, two years later when he moved from the city, sold it to a white family for $26,000.

The upper grades of the area school are more predominantly Negro than the lower, indicating that a better racial balance is in view.

A more personal measure of WMAN's racial climate was the reaction to the recent arrival of one Negro family. This family had moved into a housing development in a white Philadelphia suburb several years ago. They were met with such violence that the Governor had to call out the National Guard to restore order. After the Guard was withdrawn the family continued to be subjected to harassment and threats which never stopped in the years they lived there. Finally, this year the family gave up. They bought a home in West Mount Airy.

When a reporter heard of this he talked to Mrs. Steele and neighbors; all reacted in the same way: leave them alone, they have had enough trouble. The reporter agreed and as a result newspapers merely carried a few paragraphs that the much publicized family finally had been hounded out of their suburb and had moved into West Mount Airy — they did not pinpoint the street.

Mrs. Steele said West Mt. Airy residents do not believe in effusive greetings and the "brotherhood bit" delivered along with a plate of cookies. So, she and a number of other women wrote notes saying simply, in effect, welcome, we are pleased to have you in the neighborhood. The young wife replied in a note with one line Mrs.

Steele and WMAN members will long remember. It is wonderful, she said, to be able at last to wheel my baby carriage in front of my house without fear my baby will be spat upon.

The Future

Two years ago Matthew Bullock, Jr., WMAN's first Negro president, in his annual report said, "In a sense, the first phase of our organization's life is over. We have put out the fires we were created to combat. I do not mean that negative pressures on the area have ceased completely, but our handling of them has become routine." Then he went on to chart the future course:

"We shall, of course, continue our established activities and will become increasingly involved in the municipal planning for the Germantown area. More important, however, in a society which is turbulent with change in the area of human relations, our organization and our community are in the vanguard. We have already learned many lessons that many communities have not yet even faced. It is a fascinating fact that civil rights issues have inevitably raised a variety of positive issues. You can't look at school integration without looking at the whole problem of manpower utilization. Similarly, you can't look at integration of neighborhoods without questioning the meaning of community. The elimination of fear opens new horizons in human experience.

"In a society characterized too much by personal alienation, the recognition of other human beings, however different, as a spiritual resource is increasing. This is at once an individual and a social awakening. I have been impressed with the number of people whom I have met who speak of West Mt. Airy as though the community has nurtured a kind of vital spark within them. We do have a special atmosphere or flavor, call it what you will, that intensifies our feeling of humanity . . . In our nation in which there is so much talk of the 'Great Society,' West Mt. Airy is progressing toward the 'Great Community' . . ."

NEIGHBORS, INC. — Washington, D.C.

Eight years ago a small Washington group called Neighbors, Inc., set out to prove that a racial balance could be struck in at least one neighborhood of the nation's capital.

Born amid near panic and facing formidable odds, NI proceeded with a special sense of urgency, knowing that success or failure would have wide significance. With Washington acquiring a growing number of new African embassies particularly sensitive to discrimination and with a large foreign press corps which looked on race as one of the big, and discrediting, stories in the United States, the NI experiment was close at hand for easy observation.

NI also could not escape the attention of the President and the Congress. In time it offered evidence that no single neighborhood can survive indefinitely as a racially unrestricted showplace surrounded by a growing nonwhite population forced to live in overcrowded ghettos.

Today, the schools and some streets in the once all-white section served by NI have a larger Negro school population than either white or Negro families would like. However, the panic that followed the first large inflow of Negroes in the mid-1950's has subsided and racial transition has been slowed. The NI community is one of the few desirable ones in the Washington area into which Negroes can move without fear of humiliating rebuff from white neighbors. Some white families also have been moving into the area, although at a slower pace than Negro families. The latest census tract figures available for the four sections of the NI territory showed that in 1964 the nonwhite population was 7.5 percent in Shepherd Park, 36.2 in Takoma, 7.8 in Brightwood and 64.9 in Manor Park.

But, what does this mean in human terms?

"When all this started," one white housewife told a reporter, "we were looked upon as very suspect. Now, I think, integration is no longer a dirty word here."

"We're not idealists, just practical people," another commented. "Me, I love this neighborhood. The people are stimulating. I've lived here for 15 years, and I intend to stay. Integration is happening; I'm accepting it."

A Negro father who moved into the neighborhood when he couldn't buy a house near the Virginia school where he teaches is sure that "my kids won't grow up hating all white kids as I did when I was growing up in the South."

District of Columbia

A judgment on whether NI is a success can be made only against an awareness of the tremendous pressures for Negro housing in Washington and of the problems unique to the District of Columbia.

The 1960 census listed a 54 percent nonwhite population for Washington, the first large city in the nation with a Negro majority. By 1966 the percentage had risen to 63 percent and school enrollment was 90.8 percent Negro.

However, the nonwhite proportion of the population of metropolitan Washington, which includes Maryland and Virginia suburbs, has remained constant at between 25 and 30 percent since 1860. The difference is that of today's 25 percent Negro population, four of five live in the District. Only 6.1 percent of the suburban population is nonwhite.

Between 1950 and 1960 the white population of the District dropped by one-third, while the white population in the surrounding suburbs increased 91 percent.

The central city of Washington contains 61 square miles, less than five percent of the standard metropolitan area, and had a 1960 population of 763,956. The remaining 1,237,941 metropolitan area residents lived on 1,424 suburban square miles.

White residents driving from their offices to homes in the Maryland and Virginia suburbs or in Washington west of Rock Creek Park see only comfortable, predominantly white neighborhoods. The average tourist in Washington, on his rounds between his hotel and federal landmarks of the picture postcards, also sees little of the "other Washington."

Periodically, residents are shocked out of their complacency by newspaper reports of a city they rarely see. One such report summarized a 1966 housing study by the National Capital Planning Commission which found:

> Forty-one percent of Washington's population lives in inadequate housing — a total of 103,000 households with 299,800 persons. This covered 81,000 individuals in houses which were overcrowded, 104,700 in those which were substandard, and 114,000 in those which were too costly, taking more than 25 percent of the householder's income.
>
> Subsidized dwellings are needed for 37 percent of Washington's population. At present, public and other subsidized housing is available to 6 percent.
> Nearly one-fourth of the District's population lives in "abject poverty — the lowest form of deprivation."

"The poor are being squeezed by . . . growing low income housing demand, rising housing costs and diminishing supply of housing available to them . . . Conditions of housing occupied by the poor are worsening, and the poor are being shifted geographically. As a result, other neighborhoods are declining rapidly. In short, slums are being shifted with low income families."

Housing problems in Washington do not all center on the Negro poor. There are 104,000 low income white individuals, many of whom also need assistance.

And, there are Negroes who can afford decent housing, but find a large portion of the market closed to them. The National Capital Planning Commission reported there is an affluent group in Washington of 93,500 white persons and 23,800 Negroes. In the middle and lower income groups are almost the same number of persons of both races — 120,000 whites and 124,800 Negroes.

In the 1950-60 decade, nonwhites were sold 2.2 percent of the metropolitan area's new houses and rented less than one-tenth of the area's new rental units, according to figures released by the Civil Rights Commission following a hearing on Washington housing problems in 1962.

The Metropolitan Washington Housing Program has estimated that "if some 4,000 Negro families were to settle in the suburbs each year, with the area's rapid growth this would merely continue the present ratio within the District." An estimated 300 Negro families moved into predominantly white Maryland and Virginia suburban developments in a two year period ended in 1965. There are now a scattering of new, predominantly Negro housing tracts opening in the suburbs.

All of these pressures have a profound impact on a central city section such as the one covered by Neighbors, Inc.

NI Territory

Neighbors, Inc., is concerned with an area of 250 city blocks in the northern section of the District, east of Rock Creek Park and running into the Maryland border on the north. Some 50,000 live here, in four neighborhoods — Brightwood and Manor Park in the south, Takoma and Shepherd Park on the north. There are about 8,000 houses, with a wide range in price, from blocks of small $15,000 houses to others where some prices run over $100,000. A majority of the houses are owner occupied. Most of the 6,100 rental units are in apartments, where the median rent is about $100.

The architecture is indeterminate for the most part but houses tend to look solid and pleasant on tree-lined streets. The predominant impression, except in the most expensive sections, is of comfort rather than style.

A few Negroes moved into the area after the Supreme Court held in 1948 that restrictive covenants are not enforceable by the courts. (Such covenants in wills or deeds provided that certain property could be sold only to Caucasians.) By the mid-1950's Negroes, desperately in need of housing, were moving in at a rapid pace; white families were fleeing, and the real estate speculators and blockbusters were working in force. Many of the long-time residents had been convinced that in a year or two the area would be all Negro.

Marvin and Naomi Caplan and their three children were one of the few white families to move into the area in 1957, when they bought a house in Manor Park. They liked the spaciousness of their house, the convenience of city living, and wanted their children to grow up in an integrated neighborhood. Before long, they wondered if they would be the last white family on the block.

Caplan, then a reporter, decided to act. His first idea of working through an exciting civic organization was abandoned, for the group was apathetic on the issue of orderly racial transition but adamant on its stand against Negro members. He did, though, persuade the organization to schedule a meeting to discuss neighborhood change. Few members attended, but 75 other white and Negro residents did. After hearing a talk by a member of a Philadelphia stabilization group, a third of those present decided to set up a similar organization.

Quite early, Caplan and others to whom he had talked decided it would be impossible to try to stabilize only their own neighborhood of Manor Park and so included the three adjoining neighborhoods in their plans. The small group drafted a statement of purpose and announced a public meeting would be held in a church. At this June, 1958, meeting, attended by 100 residents, Neighbors, Inc., was organized.

Caplan, in a statement at a hearing on housing in Washington held by the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights in April, 1962, explained the thinking behind NI:

"Our formation in June, 1958, was an act of resolution and despair. Those of us who came together, colored and white, were dismayed at the bitterness, tension, and often insane behavior that attended the entrance of Negro families into what had formerly been an all-white neighborhood. We were sure there had to be a more sensible alternative to the prevailing pattern of entrance, panic, and flight. We were united in our resolve to try to establish a neighborhood in which people of different races could at least talk to each other and work together on common problems . . ."

Block Meetings

In the first months, NI, with neither staff nor money, concentrated on the most urgent problem, halting the panic selling of white residents. The area was then about 25 percent Negro, but white families moving out were being replaced almost solely by Negro families. All homeowners suffered in the exchange, with white families selling at below market prices, Negro families buying at an inflated price and the speculators pocketing the difference.

NI founders began a series of block meetings, concentrating particularly on the streets where a new Negro family had moved. This involved finding a sympathetic resident who knew many of his neighbors and who was willing to sponsor a meeting, preferably in his home. The block meetings were kept small and one of the early NI members usually appeared to answer questions. These generally centered around fears that the quality of schools would deteriorate with a growing Negro population, that real estate values would drop, the neighborhood would deteriorate, and the family would lose status by living in an integrated neighborhood.

NI emphasized that innundation was not inevitable, that if white families decided to stay and made this known to others who in turn refused to give up their homes, the neighborhood could be stabilized. National surveys were cited to prove that property values do not drop in integrated neighborhoods unless homeowners flood the market. NI spokesmen pointed out how much money speculators were making by their blockbusting tactics and read public records from the D.C. Office of the Recorder of Deeds to prove their point.

At these meetings white residents often met their new Negro neighbors and realized for the first time that their aims for maintaining and improving their property were identical. In this way, too, some white families for the first time met Negroes with comparable, or superior, economic and educational background.

In January, 1959, six months after formation, NI received a grant from the Eugene and Agnes Meyer Foundation and a full time executive director, Mrs. Margery Ware, was hired.

Expanded Activities

NI was now ready to broaden its program. The block meetings had begun to change the pervading sense of hopelessness and had brought in new members ready to volunteer their services.

As in all changing neighborhoods, this one was beset with rumors that property was deteriorating and it was necessary to convince residents and prospective homeowners this was not so. A Block Leaders Training Course was organized to encourage the formation of block committees to tackle problems of upkeep on their streets. A system of 75 block spotters was set up to report any nuisance to the NI office. One group worked with churches and synagogues to oppose an increase in the number of liquor stores in the area. District Commissioners were persuaded to install better street lighting and provide better trash pickup service. NI also successfully fought changes in the zoning code which would have permitted greater density in some sections and kept an eye on efforts to sell property for income or commercial purposes in violation of zoning regulations. The Recreation Committee sponsored a Family Fun Night for all residents at a local church, more swimming lessons at a city pool in Takoma Park, and various clubs for gardeners, bridge players, etc.

At the end of the first two years, NI could point to two specific accomplishments. For the first time since the panic selling began, a few white families had moved into the area. Mrs. Ware admits these were received with great sighs of relief, as an indication the NI message was getting across. Then, after a two year campaign by NI and the American Veterans Committee, backed by 40 other organizations, the three local newspapers agreed to eliminate the "colored" designation in classified advertisements of houses for rent or sale.

Spreading the Word

In 1961 a three-year Taconic Foundation grant allowed NI to step up its activities. A community organization specialist was employed to concentrate on real estate pressure tactics and parents' efforts to improve the area schools.

NI also issued a brochure describing the attractions of the area: one bus fare to the heart of town, excellent schools with no split shifts, shopping centers within a short walk, movie theaters and libraries also within walking distance, well-established churches and synagogues, recreation facilities in nearby Rock Creek Park, and a community in which all are welcome. Thousands of these were distributed, often with a covering letter to new Congressmen and government officials inviting them to settle in the area. (And some of them did. A number of top ranking officials now live there.)

newspapers, an article on the organization in the Atlantic Monthly by NI President Marvin Caplan, talks by NI speakers to civic groups in the District, Maryland, and Virginia. A leaflet containing quotations from prominent individuals about NI's work was given wide distribution.

Meanwhile, NI began the first of a continuing series of events to build a sense of community pride. Under the sponsorship of a number of dignitaries, including an ambassador and two cabinet officers, a reception was held for the diplomatic families of new nations. The affair was held in the auditorium of a local elementary school. There were puppet shows for the children, a string quartet provided background music, later two concert pianists gave a recital. Portions of the event were recorded by the Voice of America. The third annual NI report noted:

"The national and international implications of this event — a friendly welcome to newcomers to our country, not from professional diplomats but from the ordinary residents of an American neighborhood — were immediately apparent to everyone...

"The reception was also a visible demonstration that rather than lose status by living in an integrated neighborhood, residents gain prestige."

In 1962 the organization sponsored the first of its annual Spring Home Tours to which the general public is invited for tea and a tour of six or seven of the most attractive homes. These not only raise funds but have interested a number of visitors in buying in the area.

The following year NI held an Art and Book Festival, now another annual event. Both Presidents Kennedy and Johnson have sent letters of commendation. As many as 300 members have been involved in planning, organizing, and staffing the two-day festivals held at the local high school. Art, books, and records are sold, entertainment is provided for children, there are craft demonstrations, international booths, and garden club exhibits. The Washington Post art critic termed the second festival "one of the finest displays of local professional talent ever seen in this city under one roof."

An annual picnic, a spring clean-up campaign with prizes for outstanding accomplishment, a hospitality and welcoming committee, a neighborhood commons cleared and planted by adults and children, all contribute to the sense of community. Boys and girls are involved in a number of projects through Junior Neighbors, divided into junior and senior high school groups.

A monthly newsletter, Neighbors' Ink, edited by volunteers, keeps members posted on organization activities, tells them about newcomers, and offers members a chance to air their views in letters to the editor. A rumor column examines any tales spreading about the area and refutes false stories with facts.

Buying and Selling

The Washington real estate industry has been one of NI's toughest problems. Brokers have been more unyielding than in the two other cities of this report. A majority of the largest Washington firms refuse to handle property in the NI area. NI spokesmen charge that salesmen in these companies ignore the section when showing homes to white clients and discourage Negro clients altogether. In the early days, after the first influx of Negroes, this meant that transactions were left for the most part to speculators and blockbusters.

Now, because of NI's vigilance and a 1964 D.C. regulation outlawing blockbusting, there are only sporadic attempts to frighten homeowners into selling. Speculators have moved to other areas, concentrating particularly on a suburban Maryland county.

Whenever NI does learn of speculative practices in the area, these are reported in the monthly newsletter. For example, the May, 1965, issue noted that the Office of the Recorder of Deeds showed that a home was purchased by a real estate firm (the street address of the house and the firm were identified) for $16,800 and sold four weeks later for $24,000. An earlier issue told of a house bought for $24,000 and sold three months later for $32,450.

Today, a small number of general real estate firms, and a larger number of reputable Negro firms, sell property in the area.

In one of its brochures, NI advises those who are being transferred or moving for other compelling reasons that there are a number of steps that can be taken to safeguard their own interests and those of their neighbors. The first suggestion is to notify NI, which has a Housing Information Service available to prospective buyers and sellers, without remuneration. This service may know of a desirable buyer and can certainly recommend a reputable agent. NI warns against dealing with a speculator, for experience has shown this will only mean the seller will get a lower price. Also, the seller is asked to insist that the agent show the house on an "open" basis for "agents who show your house only to white or only to colored prospects are short-changing you. They are tapping only half the available market in the community." The seller is asked, too, to tell neighbors why he is selling, explaining that he is not running and will make every effort to get a responsible family for new tenants.

NI cooperates with fair housing groups in the District and the suburbs in efforts to encourage white families to move back to the city and Negro families to move to the suburbs.

NI was one of the groups influential in persuading the District Commissioners to issue a fair housing order in 1964. This was done under the Commissioners' police powers and outlaws racial and religious discrimination in the sale and rental of all housing except small-scale rentals in owner-occupied property. It also prohibits discrimination by lending institutions.

Mortgage money never has been a particular problem in the NI area. However, at one time the Federal Housing Authority seemed to be under-appraising property. The NI staff gathered facts and made a formal protest. As a result, FHA reevaluated the area and raised appraisals.

Property values as a whole have climbed. Between 1960 and 1964, for example, they rose about 10 percent.

Schools

NI's most critical problem is the racial composition of schools, particularly at the junior and senior high school levels. In the first year of operation, 1959, members realized that parental apprehension about the schools was one of the strongest factors influencing white families to leave. They cited the one-third Negro enrollment of the Paul Junior High School. At the beginning of the 1966 term, 91.7 percent of the Paul student body was Negro. A new junior high, Rabaut, which draws part of its student body from the NI area, was 99 percent Negro. The area high school, Coolidge, was 92.4 percent Negro.

Negro percentages in the four elementary schools were: Brightwood, 91.6; Shepherd, 64.5; Takoma, 70.2, and Whittier, 98.4.

These unbalanced racial compositions have caused many white and a sizeable number of Negro families to send their children to private and parochial schools.

In a city with a public school enrollment only 9.2 percent white there are obviously factors beyond the control of any single group. Neighbors, Inc., however, hopes to hold the white pupils now enrolled and encourage others to attend by improving the quality of education offered in the public schools. They want to demonstrate that schools do not have to deteriorate as the Negro enrollment climbs.

Parents have a problem peculiar to Washington, which does not have home rule. Unlike other citizens, they do not have the leverage of the ballot to force city authorities to spend more on schools. They cannot vote a school board out of office, they can only petition. Members of the Board of Education are appointed by the judges of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia. All requests for money by the School Superintendent must first be approved by the Board of Education, then by the District Commissioners, by the proper committees of Congress, by the Congress itself, and finally by the President.

For three years NI parents met with school officials to promote special programs in art, music, sciences, government, or languages, which would make their junior and senior high schools outstanding. Finally, in 1962, a special program, "American Democracy in Action," was inaugurated at Paul Junior High. The program is designed to instill an early interest in government and the democratic process.

An executive committee of residents oversees the program. They are assisted by an advisory council; each council member agrees to participate in at least one program for Paul students. The council has included four Associate Justices of the Supreme Court, three cabinet officers, five Senators, four Congressmen, heads of independent agencies and various other government officials.

Pupils make many field trips, attending Congressional and court sessions, legislative hearings, and meetings of the District Commissioners. They have interviewed the Governor of Maryland, visited campaign headquarters and political rallies in surrounding jurisdictions.

As school began in 1966, the D.C. Board of Education approved the position of Secondary School Coordinator for the three secondary schools in the NI area. Payment of the coordinator's salary will be shared by the public school system and the University of Maryland. The NI Education Committee considers this the first tangible step in a proposed "blue ribbon" school plan for the area drawn by the University of Maryland.

Structure

Since the first grants from the Meyer and Taconic Foundations, NI has received additional grants from these sources and from other foundations for a total of about $90,000. Benefit concerts and the annual art festival and house tours have brought in additional funds. The remainder of the income has come from dues and contributions of members. Currently, dues are $5 a year for family membership. NI's annual budget for several years has been around $25,000.

At peak strength, NI has had, in addition to the executive director, a community affairs specialist and an assistant, plus a secretary and a clerk. They operate from a two-room office centrally located in a small, new building in a commercial area.

A 20-man Board of Directors governs. Two are elected from each of the four neighborhoods in the area and the others are elected at large. There is an annual meeting each June, two meetings a year in each of the four neighborhoods, and special meetings are called on specific problems. The 1966 membership of NI was 1,800.

Mrs. Ware, for seven years executive director of Neighbors, Inc., until her resignation in the summer of 1966, believes any similar group should concentrate from the beginning on a broad community development program, rather than stabilization, unless it is necessary to stress the latter because of a panic situation.

She thinks NI was right in trying to build from the first an image of a group of solid homeowners, organized, and meriting serious consideration from the city and its officials. She also thinks that NI probably should have concentrated earlier on improvement of the schools, admitting at the same time that the forces were too great and the resources too small to keep a better racial balance in the schools. She feels the next few years will be critical and that the school situation will be the ultimate test of NI's success or failure.

Mrs. Ware believes it would be easier to start a Neighbors, Inc., today. There is a District fair housing regulation; open housing groups are now working in other sections of the District and the suburbs; churches are more active in the civil rights field (NI had little cooperation from area churches in the formative years); middle income Negroes have a slightly wider choice of housing now. And, with the added emphasis on civil rights, new federal legislation and court rulings, the community as a whole is more aware of discrimination and better armed to deal with it.

The Future

NI has reached a stage of development where members are asking serious questions about its future direction. Increasingly, these have been raised at meetings, in letters in the monthly newsletters, and whenever members discuss the group.

Basically, the question is whether NI should continue to focus most of its energies on neighborhood stabilization and improvement or whether it should move beyond this to concentrate on such larger issues as home rule, poverty programs, civil rights, and civil liberties. There are wide differences of opinion.

One group feels NI should not concern itself with the "numbers game," that the racial composition of the area is unimportant and the emphasis should be on problems facing the city and nation. Another faction believes NI can be effective only if it continues to concentrate on problems of the immediate environment. In between is a group which contends the primary emphasis should be on neighborhood development but that at the same time members should be able to work on metropolitan problems through various subcommittees. At the time of this report, board members and leaders of the four neighborhood components were being polled to learn what course they think NI should follow.

Whatever the decision of NI's future program, many members feel the controversy is an indication of vitality. It does transcend racial bounds, for each faction has white and Negro proponents.

This seems natural in a neighborhood where residents nervous around anyone not of their own color have long since fled and those who are left have lost any self-consciousness about race. Children of both races play together, white and Negro parents baby sit for each other and "party" together. It follows that they can also fight, in a good, impersonal, neighborly American way.

BALTIMORE NEIGHBORHOODS, INC.

Since its founding in the 17th century, Maryland has had a problem of identity, more so than most border states. A reasonable surveyor interested solely in geographic efficiency might well award part of the state to Pennsylvania and the rest to Virginia.

Throughout its history, Maryland has had no overwhelming sectional identity. As one of the original 13 colonies it was a mid-point, neither north nor south.

Maryland was founded as a haven for Roman Catholics, but since the Catholics of Ireland and England did not migrate in sufficient numbers, Maryland never quite became a truly Catholic state. Nevertheless, a succession of Catholics ruled as governors of Maryland in the 17th century, with one exception. During the Puritan ascendancy in England, a Protestant was named governor. This was diplomatic accommodation of a high order.

And it is this spirit of accommodation which runs like a zigzag stitch through the fabric of Maryland history. It produced a religious toleration act in 1649 and kept Maryland in the Union although thousands of her sons went off to join the Confederate forces.

The half-way point for the half-way state, as it were, is Baltimore. Here all the contrasts which exist within the state seem to have been deposited.

There are ancient white families of the hunt club-cotillion set and Negro families whose roots go back as far and as deep in Maryland history. This is a city, too, where, until a few years ago, the restrictive covenant closed some of the "best" residential areas to Jews, where Catholics were barred from some professional clubs and snubbed in some sets, where white Protestants thought it was hopeless to try for a seat on the city council. For Negroes, it was a city of rigid segregation.

Harry Bard, president of Baltimore Junior College, in an article in the Baltimore Afro-American summed up the city as the worst and the best. Perhaps, he wrote, Baltimore has more than its share of both. Detailing some of these elements, he continued:

Among the worst are "practices which bring colored people who commit crimes into a Criminal Courthouse where all the symbols are white; the judges, the bailiffs, the clerks . . .

"The lack of recreational facilities in areas like Greenmount Avenue is dangerous. De facto segregation in some of the Baltimore schools is a symbol of the old. And the lack of employment opportunities for out-of-school Baltimore colored youth is dynamite...

"And the worst includes what Francis Bierne, in his Amiable Baltimoreans, calls 'the four o'clock shadow,' with Jews, Catholics, and Protestants meeting on numerous civic boards... but not really getting to know each other intensely and seldom visiting each other at home. At best, they hardly break through a veneer.

"On the plus side are the open and frank dialogues by the NCCJ (National Conference of Christians and Jews), NAACP (National Association for the Advancement of Colored People), Urban League and other groups. Also on the plus side are the contributions of some Baltimore businessmen like the Voluntary Council on Equal Opportunity and that of some labor groups associated with AFL-CIO.

"On the plus side, too, is recent progress of the Police Department... the plans of the Baltimore Education Department and the serious thinking in the City and State Government halls, and the intense dedication of the mass media.

"Also on the plus side is the recognition that colored citizens do care about helping their own needy. Their personal contributions of over one million dollars for the Provident Hospital prove this... Responsible colored leadership in Baltimore is certainly a plus."

Housing

An understanding of the split personality of the city helps explain Baltimore's stance on racially segregated housing.

How else explain a Real Estate Board which opposed open occupancy in 1964 but the next year urged the President to support a broad open occupancy law for the nation and then in 1966 opposed such a law for the state? Changing leadership of the board is one explanation, but the board itself is split, or such an about-face would be impossible.

There is a division in the city government over housing. The mayor and city council president both backed a strong fair housing ordinance, but it failed this year on a city council vote.

In many ways, however, Baltimore is typical of other big cities with a large Negro population. The white population has been declining, moving to the suburbs, and the Negro population has been expanding. Between 1950 and 1960 the white population of Baltimore City dropped by 113,000 and the nonwhite increased by 102,000. The 1960 census for Baltimore, the nation's sixth largest city, showed a total population of 939,024, with 326,589, or 34.8 percent, nonwhite.

The Negro population of the city clusters around the central business district, spreading out northwest and northeast in 45 census tracts with a nonwhite population of 75 percent or more. In 1964, 77 percent of the city's Negroes lived there.

Negro family income lags behind that of white families. In 1966 median white family income in the Baltimore metropolitan area was $8,125 and $5,250 for Negro families. However, 12 percent of the Negro families had incomes of from $10-15,000 and 53 percent had incomes over $5,000.

This growth of the Negro population, and the rising income which made home ownership a possibility for many, has not been matched by new housing available to Negroes. Between 1940 and 1957, for example, only 6,000 new dwelling units were open to Negroes and most of these were in public housing developments. Inevitably, they had been moving to older areas formerly occupied by whites only.

Today, Negroes have fanned out to live in 95 percent of Baltimore's districts. In some of these they represent only a scattering of the total population. Nevertheless, considering that in 1940 almost the entire Negro population — 226,000 at that time — lived in two sections of the central city, the change has been dramatic. It has also been peaceful, for the most part, with only a very few reports of harassment.

The Beginning

Ten years ago, a section of Baltimore known as Ashburton was an entirely white community located about 15 minutes by car from the downtown center. Houses along the tree-lined streets are largely single family dwellings, with a sprinkling of semi-detached houses. Built 20 or 25 years earlier as a "restricted" area, it had received an influx of prosperous Jewish families in the post World War II years and had gradually become a section including families of varied religious and age groups. Houses ranged in price from $15,000 to $45,000.

In 1956 the first Negro, a high school principal, bought a home in Ashburton. Within the next year, more than a score of other Negroes, most of them professional people, moved into the neighborhood. The following year, 1958, another 40 or 50 moved in.

By this time, blockbusting agents and speculators had moved on the area. They were operating on the now familiar pattern, selling a home to a Negro family and then deliberately exploiting and exciting racial prejudice and fear of falling real estate values among other families on the block. When families did panic, the real estate operator might pick up a bargain and turn a neat profit by selling the house at an inflated price to a Negro desperately in need of housing.

Where white families on a block were slow to panic, some speculators bought homes and moved in low income families, or even several families, on a weekly rental basis. Others persuaded poor Negro families to buy, under a no-down-payment arrangement, houses they could not afford; naturally, they had no money left over for proper maintenance. Meanwhile, advertisements in the real estate sections of the newspapers offered houses in "Ashburton—colored" although the area was still 95 percent white.

"For Sale" signs were much in evidence and a new rumor sprang up every day. Sometimes a "Sold" sign went up on a house speculators had not yet sold, as a method of scaring neighbors into selling. Some brokers were refusing to show property to white buyers.

Then, in 1958, a white public relations man, Ellsworth E. Rosen, who had moved to Ashburton the year before with his wife and two children, decided he was not going to sit by while the speculators wrecked a neighborhood. He and Mrs. Rosen found kindred souls in a young lawyer and his wife, Mr. and Mrs. Melvin J. Sykes, who also lived in the area. The four arranged a meeting with some 20 neighbors to discuss their changing area and what they could do to foil the blockbusters. This was the beginning of the reorganized Ashburton Area Association, open to all races. Early in 1958 they mailed invitations to join to the 1,100 households in Ashburton and in short order there were 400 members.

The initial letter, asking for members and contributions, stated: "We welcome all good neighbors, regardless of race, creed or color. But we understand, as we trust everyone will, that experience shows that the key to keeping up the quality of this or any neighborhood is to attract a sufficient number of new white homeowner families."

Next, members of the fledgling organization made a house to house canvass and handed out a brochure telling of the association's aim of stabilizing the area. Later, a flyer containing the names of new white buyers in the area was distributed and residents who had put up a "For Sale" sign were contacted and asked not to discriminate against a prospective white buyer in favor of a Negro buyer. At the same time, residents were warned against dealing with unscrupulous speculators and told of the dollar loss this could entail. Letters were sent to the heads of major industries to ask them to recommend the Ashburton area to employees. A letter also was sent to the Real Estate Board of Greater Baltimore asking members to show homes in the area to prospective buyers.

Meanwhile, the founders of the organization explained its purposes to newspapers, on radio and television. At the same time, the Ashburton Area Association ran a series of newspaper ads calling attention to the attractions of the area.

Even more importantly, the group set up a series of block by block meetings, with charter members on hand to explain the purposes of the association.

Rosen, in an article in the Saturday Evening Post, explained how a typical meeting of about 20 men and women in the living room of a block leader's home progressed:

> "If you want to protect your home and your way of life," they were told, "a simple solution lies open to you. You don't have to join the Army and face death on foreign soil. You don't even have to risk bodily injury. All you have to do is to continue living in your own home."
>
> The speaker was a Negro. Intelligent, soft-spoken, articulate, but a Negro, and the only one in the group.
>
> "Don't think you can escape the problem simply by putting your house up for sale and running away," Otho P. Pinkett said. Pinkett lives in Ashburton and manages an 815-unit public housing project in another part of the city. "Times are changing faster than most of us realize. Even if you move far out in the suburbs, I can virtually guarantee that by the time you finish paying off your next mortgage — and it will be a lot higher than the one you have now — you'll face the same situation. There will be Negroes living near you.
>
> "As a matter of fact," he added with a smile, "if this area turns all Negro, I plan to move out to the suburbs with you."
>
> I think Otho Pinkett is right, and so apparently did some of my neighbors by the time that meeting was over. Two families who had indicated they intended to move said they would hold on for the time being . . .
> It is shock treatment, as a rule, when a Negro walks into a supposedly all-white meeting — and the shock, in turn, heightens the realization that Mr. Pinkett's sense of values, desires and plans for the community are no different from those of others in the room.

As the block meetings continued, and as residents were armed with facts and figures from studies in other cities which demonstrated that property values had not declined where owners refused to yield to pressures, the panic began to subside. In the first six months of the organization, 15 sales were made to white families and about twice that number to Negroes. Prices, which had dropped alarmingly where residents had succumbed to the rumors of the speculators, were slowly restored to their fair market worth.

The residents began to fight in another way. Working with other like-minded associations, they complained to the Bureau of Building Inspection about illegal "Sold by ....." signs. The city solicitor ruled that a zoning ordinance did bar advertising signs in a residential neighborhood and notices of violations went out. Residents had offered proof that often these "Sold by ....." signs were on houses for several months, while they still were being offered to customers. On one block alone, where 15 of 23 properties had been marked either sold or for sale, only six houses were marked for sale two weeks after the city took action.

Ashburton was not alone in fighting for its area. In nearby Windsor Hills, an older community with a wider variety of size and style among the 600 houses and apartment units, Negroes had begun moving in somewhat earlier. Two years or so after the first Negro family came, another 50 to 60 had followed. During this period, a dormant civic organization, the Windsor Hills Improvement Association, was revived to work for a racially stable neighborhood. From the first, members, Negroes as well as white, felt that under the speculative pressures which existed the association had to work to bring in new white families to the area. When they found that real estate agents were unwilling to recommend Windsor Hills to white buyers, the real estate committee of the association decided it needed a resident agent to promote sales and rentals. A housewife in Windsor Hills passed the real estate board exams and the neighborhood had its own agent. In her first three years, she sold 25 homes and rented 30 others to white families. Ashburton later followed the Windsor Hills example and backed a resident agent.

During the same period, Negroes were moving into other neighborhoods and several of these also set up their own associations.

As members of these groups became more engrossed, and more knowledgeable, in the problems and opportunities of interracial housing in established neighborhoods, they decided a greater cooperative effort was needed. They felt that the basic problems of attitude among real estate brokers, banks, mortgage lenders, and potential white buyers called for an educational job beyond the scope of the individual neighborhood groups.

The neighborhood organizations solicited the aid of the Citizens Planning and Housing Association, the Baltimore Urban League, and the Maryland Commission on Interracial Problems and Relations. This larger body decided in turn that a successful program had to have the backing of business leaders.

The logical group to approach was the Greater Baltimore Committee. The GBC was made up of some 100 of the liveliest and most forceful businessmen and financiers in the city. They were then spending a tremendous amount of effort on an imaginative $127 million redevelopment project, Charles Center, in the downtown area. Some in the neighborhood groups felt the approach to the GBC was hopeless, that these hardheaded businessmen would have neither the time nor the inclination to help. Nevertheless, the GBC was asked for help. The civic groups argued that the downtown renewal project and the new Civic Center would be jeopardized if ringed by miles of ghetto neighborhoods. They pointed out this would be inevitable if efforts were not made to help residents move into every section of the metropolitan area. They stressed the need for the tax money of higher income families to support downtown rehabilitation and the important role attractive, stable neighborhoods could play in keeping these families in the city.

The GBC was asked to support the opening up of additional new and old housing to Negro citizens, to stimulate public awareness of practices that cause disorderly change and to enlist the cooperation of real estate interests in the preservation of the city.

The Committee met in September, 1958, to consider the call for support. To the surprise of the skeptics, a report was adopted that recognized the serious economic consequences of disorderly neighborhood change and directed its Urban Renewal Subcommittee to make a thorough study of the problem and recommend "what role, if any, the Greater Baltimore Committee should play in solving the problems of changing neighborhoods." Subsequently, the words "if any" were dropped from the charge and the membership recommended that a city-wide agency be formed in which the Committee would participate.

Once committed, the GBC moved fast. Within two months a conference of business and community leaders was called. Real estate representatives, lawyers, bankers, city planners, educators, members of neighborhood associations, and city government officials held panel discussions on blockbusting, new housing for Negroes, and improvement of older houses.

At the conclusion of the meeting, the conference chairman, James W. Rouse, mortgage banker and urban renewal expert, said:

"We find that the rapid conversion of neighborhoods from all white to all Negro occupancy presents Baltimore with one of its most serious economic crises in recent years. The flight of the medium and upper income families from the city limits and their replacement by persons of both races of the lowest income levels is a threat not only to our municipal solvency but to the economic stability of the entire metropolitan area. It is therefore recommended that there be formed a city-wide organization composed of representatives of civic and labor organizations, improvement associations, the Real Estate Board of Greater Baltimore, the Greater Baltimore Committee, the Association of Commerce, the homebuilders, and the city and state governments. During the preliminary stages and until the city-wide group is well established, the Greater Baltimore Committee will provide clerical and professional staff assistance."

BNI Formation

In March, 1959, this city-wide organization GBC recommended came into being when by-laws and articles of incorporation were approved for Baltimore Neighborhoods, Inc. (BNI). Original members included the Greater Baltimore Committee, the neighborhood associations which had started the movement, several civic and religious groups, and interested individuals.

The early work of BNI emphasized community education and the organization of additional neighborhood groups to promote the concept, and feasibility, of racially stabilized neighborhoods. A tangible note of success came in 1960 when BNI drafted and was instrumental in securing passage of an anti-blockbusting ordinance. This made it unlawful for any salesman or real estate firm to misrepresent facts concerning present or future occupancy, or the value of property.

In 1961 BNI took two steps which set it on the course followed today. Directors decided that a program of neighborhood stabilization could not in itself achieve BNI objectives and so a second goal was set: expansion of housing opportunities for Negroes throughout the metropolitan area. Secondly, BNI hired a full-time professional executive director, Edward L. Holmgren, a University of Chicago graduate in political science, who had worked with the Chicago Housing Authority, American Friends, and Urban League.

BNI also received a financial boost in setting up an expanded program when two foundations, Taconic and Field, each gave $11,500 in 1961 and again in the following year. The first issue of a BNI newsletter claimed it was "the only foundation-supported agency in the nation seeking a comprehensive solution to an urban dilemma — preventing the city from becoming an all-Negro ghetto while at the same time promoting equal housing opportunities for all people, regardless of race."

Since his appointment, Holmgren has had a staff aide, a secretary, and at other times an intern provided under another grant program, plus volunteer workers.

A measure of the acceptance of BNI's efforts in behalf of the entire community is the $10,000 grant from the city government both in 1965 and 1966. BNI's 1966 budget was $45,000, about one-fourth contributed by local business interests, another one-fourth by foundations, and the rest by the city, church, and civic groups and individuals.

BNI Activities

BNI operates in some ways as does the housing division of a city human relations commission. It is a catalyst, an educator, and mediator in any activity which touches on the vital issue of housing for all citizens.

From its inception, BNI has offered a variety of services to neighborhood stabilization groups. Staff members are available for consultation and they also have prepared a series of useful guidelines. One of these outlines suggestions for setting up neighborhood meetings, dealing with practical matters such as the size of the group convened, where it should be held, what should be stressed. Another more detailed guide includes factual answers for the most likely questions on such matters as property values and schools. Others tell how to handle brokers using pressure tactics, how to decide whether you can afford to buy a house, and what neighborhood services are available from the city.

BNI draws on the experience of other cities and various housing studies but interprets these in local terms. In the format for fair housing meetings in the home, for example, there is a suggested answer to the inevitable question about what happens to property values when a Negro family moves in.

Studies are cited which show that experience has proved that property values do not drop, unless white residents flood the market with more homes than the market can absorb. Then, the brochure continues:

"Since Baltimoreans are inclined to be skeptical as to whether developments in other communities have any bearing on their local scene, we will do well to examine some Baltimore facts and figures.

"In 1956 a study was made of four blocks of Longwood Street in the City. The sale prices to Negroes from 1953 to 1955 (when all but a few homes passed from white to Negro occupancy) was compared with the sale prices of the same houses when sold to whites between 1947 and 1953. Price data was obtained on 31 of the 40 homes in the 2500, 2600 and 2700 blocks of Longwood. In the 2500 block the average price increase was $2,700 including ground, in the 2600 block about $3,500 and in the 2700 block about $2,900. The range of prices to the Negro purchasers was $11,500 to $17,500.

"A later study of property values (1960), in which more than 22,800 residential sales in Baltimore were analyzed, concludes that 'property values do not invariably decline when Negroes are admitted to occupancy in previously restricted neighborhoods.' There was a tendency for homes under 50 years of age to increase in value when subject to open occupancy."

Directors of BNI appointed a Research Advisory Committee four years ago and this has provided other such facts.

BNI is interested in any movement in the metropolitan area which promises an expanded market for Negroes and often is consulted in surrounding jurisdictions. When a Baltimore Colt football player moved into a Baltimore County development a few "For Sale" signs went up. Thanks to intelligent dissuasion by a leading real estate broker and a series of neighborhood meetings conducted by BNI, most of the homeowners decided to stay.

A more serious situation developed four years ago when a Negro couple and their three young children moved into a suburb in adjacent Anne Arundel County. First, a pump was tampered with and the basement flooded even before the family moved in; the owner notified police. Then, in quick succession, a rock was hurled through a window the night the family moved in and the next night a steel tipped arrow was shot into the house, while later an oil-filled bottle was tossed on the front steps.

The husband, who had hoped to cope on his own, then called the president of the county chapter of the NAACP to ask how his family could obtain better police protection. As soon as they learned of the situation, the executive director of Baltimore Fellowship, Holmgren of BNI, and members of the Maryland Commission on Interracial Problems joined the NAACP in consulting police and in taking turns visiting the persecuted family every evening. Meanwhile, clergy and others in the community were called on to help the family and to try to calm the neighborhood. Gradually, the community began to accept its new neighbors.

For the most part, panic has been minimal in the communities in both Baltimore and the surrounding counties where Negroes have moved for the first time. In only one instance was a Negro family forced to move out because of violence.

The first Negroes now have moved into more than a dozen Baltimore suburbs.

Real Estate Industry

One of BNI's primary objectives is a single real estate market where every potential homeowner is treated alike, and has access to any area he chooses and can afford. This calls for the cooperation of the real estate and housing industries.

After a year of negotiation, BNI and the Greater Baltimore Committee four years ago won an agreement from the Real Estate Board to make a concerted effort to get members to drop racial designations in classified real estate advertising. Following this, local newspapers, at the request of the Real Estate Board, stopped accepting such advertising sales. Incongruously, racial designations remained in use in rental advertisements.

At the same time, the Real Estate Board asked members to refrain from dropping listings on properties when the racial character of a neighborhood began to change but instead to "extend every effort to obtain a buyer regardless of race, creed, or national origin."

Following this action, William Wilson, past president of the Real Estate Board, wrote BNI's president: "The experience and aid of your Ed Holmgren and your organization have been invaluable to me in developing a better understanding of this most difficult and sensitive metropolitan problem . . ."

In 1963 the Board sent a letter to all newly licensed real estate brokers, soliciting membership. Probably to the surprise of some long time members, there were a few applications from Negroes. After a little low-key prodding from one or two members, the Board took in six Negro brokers at one time. Today, the Board's multiple listing bureau has a Negro on the Board of Directors.

Several members of the Real Estate Board have served as directors and on the Advisory Board of BNI. In 1964 the Board became an organizational member of BNI.

However, the same year, when a committee appointed by the City Council recommended legislative action to outlaw housing discrimination the Real Estate Board was opposed. The next year it moved in the other direction and BNI could note, "The Real Estate Board of Baltimore became the nation's first real estate board to request the expansion of the Presidential Executive Order #11063 to prohibit discrimination in the sale of most new housing." Specifically, the Board asked the President to extend an earlier order on open occupancy, which applied to federally insured mortgages, to all new housing financed with mortgages held by federally insured banks and savings and loan institutions.

But then early in 1966 a spokesman for the Board appeared at a state legislative hearing in Annapolis to oppose a pending open occupancy law. The Baltimore Sunday Sun commented editorially, "Last year's step forward has become a march to the rear."

Nevertheless, the Board amended its by-laws this year to require realtors to show houses to Negro buyers and renters when the original contract with an owner specifies open occupancy.

BNI offers a real estate referral service designed to encourage and assist white buyers to purchase homes in racially mixed neighborhoods and to help Negro families find homes outside the customary ghettos. BNI notes that more brokers will now handle such sales.

City Government

As 1966 closed, proponents of a fair housing ordinance for Baltimore had not succeeded, despite the backing of Mayor Theodore McKeldin and City Council President Thomas D'Alesandro III. In 1964 a nine-member Baltimore City Housing Advisory Commission was appointed. It found clear discrimination in the sale and rental of housing to Negroes and recommended an open occupancy law. Property owners, and not the real estate interests, bore the major blame for discrimination. The City Council passed a civil rights ordinance, but rejected the open housing section.

This year, another try was made. The City Council held a hearing on a fair housing proposal and 2,000 attended a hotly divided meeting. Lawrence Cardinal Shehan appeared to give a strong endorsement to the measure, which was of particular significance since an estimated 45 percent of Baltimore citizens are Roman Catholic. About one-third of those present booed the Cardinal.

The area Episcopal and Methodist bishops spoke in favor of the bill also, as did a rabbi, the president of the Maryland Council of Churches and the president of the Baltimore Jewish Council. James W. Rouse, chairman of the Greater Baltimore Committee, said that GBC, which previously opposed such legislation, now gave it strong backing on both economic and moral grounds.

Despite such endorsements, the Council killed the bill 13-8.

Housing Conference

Two years ago, BNI asked the President's Committee on Equal Opportunity in Housing to hold a meeting in Baltimore on stabilization of racially changing neighborhoods and the need for enlargement of housing opportunities for minorities. The Committee agreed and the third such meeting in the nation was held in Baltimore. BNI's board and staff did a major proportion of the program planning.

Over 600 representatives of industry, labor, banking, religions, civil rights groups, housing, and educators took part in four workshops at an all day session. As a result of the conference and the resulting publicity, a broad segment of the community was made more aware of the urgent need to improve housing opportunities for minorities. The consensus of the workshops was that residents of every section of the Baltimore metropolitan area would suffer if the trend toward the extension of the existing ghetto in the central city and the formation of new ghettos ringed by white suburbia were not halted.

A housing developer and former president of the Home Builders Association told the conference that an all inclusive federal fair housing law was the only practical solution to the growing economic problem of housing discrimination.

Plus and Minus

Where does Baltimore stand today? On the negative side, it still is not covered either by local or state fair housing legislation. The much talked of white backlash appeared in its most virulent form in the 1966 gubernatorial election. However, the candidate who campaigned on the single issue "your home is your castle — protect it" was defeated.

The 35 percent Negro population of Baltimore in 1960 is now about 42 percent and is expected to reach 47 percent in 1970. The Research Advisory Committee of BNI estimates that in the five years, 1966 through 1970, the Negro housing market in Baltimore will require an average of 4,000 additional units a year, or 20,000 units. Demands will stem from new Negro household formations and, to a lesser extent, from demolitions resulting from highway construction and renewal programs, and the hopeless deterioration of sub-standard housing.

As recently as 1962 there was practically no new housing available to Negroes but in the past few years some new middle income housing has been opened to them. This year an estimated 500 new private housing and apartment units will be available to Negro families.

Clearly, the demand will have to be met in large part by an extension of Negro housing in racially changing areas or by greater availability of housing beyond the city limits. Currently, only about one percent of the Negro population is moving to surrounding counties.

There has been a slight change in the "whites only" policy of major apartment owners but this is a problem of continuing concern to BNI.

The housing problem is very closely tied to public schools, which today have a 75 percent nonwhite enrollment. Two weeks after the Supreme Court ruled in the school desegregation cases in 1954 the Baltimore Board of School Commissioners declared the city would henceforth have a desegregated school system. Pupils were given the right to transfer to schools of their choice. However, the plan was better on paper than in practice and change was minimal. The city has a new school superintendent now who seems determined to find answers to the problems of de facto segregation and the quality of education offered in all schools.

On the neighborhood level, a good deal remains to be done. One all white community in the northern part of the city reacted to word of the first Negro purchase there by banding together to collect money to buy the house and then persuading the Negro family to sell. The community purchase was made in the face of BNI warnings that residents would be left open to a kind of blackmail by any opportunist who threatened to sell to Negroes in order to force the community to take a house off his hands. Recently, some change of attitude there was noted. One group of citizens began working to set up a stabilization program and neighborhood religious bodies, silent before, backed this move.

On the positive side, at least 10 associations are working to promote stable, interracial neighborhoods. Some have a scattering of Negro families while other neighborhoods are from 40 to 70 percent Negro.

Ashburton and Windsor Hills are now each one-third white. Another area, Forrest Park, which began changing racially about the same time, had no organization working for stabilization and is today almost entirely Negro. Windsor Hills has upgraded its zoning requirements and the Improvement Association has decided the community has reached the point where it is no longer necessary to put major emphasis on a program to attract white buyers. Instead, the emphasis is now on making Windsor Hills a model integrated community.

Advice

The office of Baltimore Neighborhoods, Inc., is located at One Charles Center, on the eleventh floor of the tall new building which is a focal point of the downtown renewal area. Nearby, in the same building, are the offices of the Greater Baltimore Committee, which extends the use of its conference room and other facilities to BNI. The location is appropriate for BNI, in the center of new Baltimore, next door to community leaders. The view through floor to ceiling windows is of two luxury apartments going up across the street and, in the distance, of neighborhoods both segregated and changing. The suburbs are just out of sight.

In his office here, BNI Director Holmgren was asked what observations and advice he could give other neighborhood groups and cities, based on the Baltimore experience.

First, he emphasized, central city neighborhood stabilization programs must be tied to a metropolitan program to achieve open housing. Without this effort beyond city boundaries, a stabilization program will in the long run be only a delaying action, because of the urgent need for decent Negro housing. Cities, counties, states, and the federal government must pass fair housing laws for ultimate success of the open occupancy concept.

The active support of community leaders is important. Business, government, real estate, labor, banking, and church groups must be persuaded of the need for positive steps to solve housing problems.

Neighborhood groups working to stabilize their communities, Holmgren added, must see that city services are maintained, zoning laws observed, and property maintained in conformance with city codes.

Every effort must be made to improve local schools, for the school situation, Holmgren is convinced, is the "single most tender spot in any community."

In most instances, neighborhood meetings on racial changes should focus on economics, rather than the morals of the situation. Have some hard facts to counter emotion and prejudice.

Asked whether the Baltimore stabilization groups might function more effectively if several smaller ones would join forces in order to finance a paid staff member, Holmgren said yes. He agreed that it is difficult for a voluntary group to sustain the original momentum and for busy homeowners to find the necessary time to coordinate and direct continuing programs.

Some civil rights militants criticize BNI for its middle class orientation, Holmgren said, and added, "They're right, we are geared to the middle classes; so is practically every fair housing group in the country." It was obvious Holmgren felt all such groups, BNI included, must broaden their programs to include measures for helping low income groups.

The Future

Communities which are presently all white will be much better prepared to accept the inevitable appearance of a Negro family if they begin preparations now, Holmgren emphasized. This message, counseling calm acceptance of change, is one of the most vital BNI has communicated to an increasing number of citizens, for, as Mayor McKeldin has commented:

"The principle of equal opportunity in housing will eventually succeed — the only question is how soon, and with how little panic and ill-will. The answer lies, more surely than anywhere else, with the wide range of private individuals and groups throughout our entire Baltimore urban area who care enough to work hard for equality of housing opportunity in their own neighborhoods."

CONCLUSIONS

Citizens working to make their neighborhood racially stable sooner or later have to consider three fundamental questions: Why are we trying to attract white families to our area? Doesn't this imply that they are somehow superior? Isn't this a gratuitous insult to Negro families?

White and Negro homeowners have to discuss these questions freely, if they are to work together. This is not always easy, for years of segregation have left each race distrustful and ignorant of the other.

Negroes in integrated neighborhoods know there is nothing particularly desirable about a white neighbor per se. They may even feel guilty about trying to get more white families into the area, when Negroes need these houses, too. However, they also know that white citizens still control the government, big business, the school boards. Because of this they know from experience that all Negro neighborhoods are apt to suffer from a dearth of money for schools, parks, city services.

Once the conversational barriers are down this can be discussed dispassionately and a clear understanding reached that no one believes there is anything especially superior about a white family or inferior about a Negro family. A neighborhood can be all white, all Negro, or any racial mixture in between and still be a desirable place to live.

The next step is to agree that this particular group likes its neighborhood, and that one of the chief reasons is the fact that it is "inclusive" rather than "exclusive." Once all agree that they prefer living in a diversified setting, where they and their children will know others of different races, creeds, and backgrounds, the question becomes one of keeping it that way.

This is one reason for making a special effort to attract new white families to the neighborhood. An unfortunate comment upon our society is that no special effort has to be made to attract Negro families to a central city neighborhood because their need for housing is so great.

After this delicate, but basic, issue is faced, white and Negro citizens can work together to make theirs an integrated neighborhood. Discussions then can center on method.

First, any group will have to concern itself with a fairly large area; a few city blocks cannot be stabilized. Also, as soon as financially feasible, a group will be better off if it can employ a coordinator or executive secretary to maintain momentum and direction.

Block meetings are important in the early stages of a changing neighborhood but there must be at least one person present who will be armed with facts about property values and speculators.

Very early, special efforts must be made to cope with school problems; parents can provide supplemental books and services, badger education boards for more money and better facilities.

As soon as possible the group must begin to promote a sense of community, emphasizing features which make the neighborhood worth saving and improving. Persons of outstanding stature should be involved in the work. Functions which add a note of prestige also are useful. Some form of newsletter to keep members informed and to counter rumors is essential.

Then other committees can be formed to see that zoning codes are enforced, sanitation laws observed, and city services maintained and improved where needed. This does not imply that interracial neighborhoods have any special reason to fear deterioration or code violations. All good neighborhood associations need such committees.

Eventually, all associations will want to become involved in the housing problems of the entire metropolitan area and to cooperate with other organizations in promoting a real estate market open to all on an equal basis.

Once the market has opened up, neighborhood associations may want to work on programs to encourage Negroes to move into new areas. Almost every metropolitan area has suburbs where white homeowners have indicated they would welcome Negro neighbors, but who have become discouraged because they could find none willing to move in. Perhaps a neighborhood association could sponsor a series of meetings between white suburbanites and Negro city dwellers to help each side understand why this is so.

The year 1966 unfortunately provided ample evidence that this nation is not yet firmly committed to fair and open housing despite the fact that every court decision and every piece of legislation dealing with race for the past 20 years has moved us step-by-step closer to a policy of racial justice. We stand now at a point of great decision that could have far-reaching results for many years to come.

"WHAT HAPPENED AFTER YOU DESEGREGATED THE WHITE SCHOOL?"

BY MARK CHESLER

Mark Chesler is Project Director for Research on Utilization of Scientific Knowledge, the University of Michigan. The recordings upon which he bases his analysis here were made while he was a visiting instructor at Tuskegee Institute in 1966. This analysis together with transcripts of four separate taped interview sessions of Negro students talking about their experiences in desegregated schools will be published shortly by the Southern Regional Council under the title IN THEIR OWN WORDS.

——Every time I get talking about my experience at the white school something happens to me. I can't really express myself and I can't really tell what happens. It's like I was kind of in a trance; I was just walking around from day to day and doing what I thought I was supposed to do and trying not to do what I wasn't supposed to do.

——Sometimes you can say things here and you don't mean it to be a particular insult, but you don't want to step on anybody's toes, so you just have to be careful of what you say and how you say it.

These comments reflect some Negro students' reactions to their experiences in newly desegregated white schools in the Deep South. It is clear that placing Negro youngsters into "white" schools is only the first—and in many ways the easiest—phase of the school desegregation process. In many cases real discomfort, overt discrimination, intimidation and insight begin only when young Negroes enter southern white schools. Physical proximity in the classroom sets the stage for young people of both races to cut through or restore myths, to learn about or hide from each other, to cooperate in friendship or separate in hostility. The hope that social interaction leads to growth is dependent upon the youngsters, their teachers, principals and communities.

This report records the comments of 20 Negro teenagers who were among the first members of their race to attend previously all-white public schools in the Deep South. These youngsters and their experiences are not necessarily typical of the South and the desegregation process. They live in three small rural communities in the black belt South; the most hard core areas of white resistance.[1] Several hours of tape recorded conversation have been abstracted with brief comments, and these direct words of Negro youngsters highlight some of the problems beyond desegregation—beyond the physical introduction of Negro students into previously all-white schools.

Several major themes stand out in these students' reflections and responses to our questions. The character of their teachers and principals seems to be the most important element in their early adjustment to the white school, and vice versa. The reactions of white peers, and the lack of development of positive relations across racial lines, seems to be a most pervasive issue in these rural communities. It is through experiences with their young white classmates that Negro students have now learned some of the practical realities of interracial harmony, trust and progress. Then, too, these youngsters had to deal with their "back-home" relations, with the Negro community's reaction to such pioneering efforts. These seem to be some of the most critical general issues documented by Negro "desegregators," and it is their feelings and perceptions about the school desegregation process, told in their own words, to which we turn for information.

The school staff

The adult whites with whom these Negro students had the greatest degree of contact were their teachers. More than police, vigilantes or roughnecks, who did call upon some of these youngsters, teachers met with them daily in relatively peaceful circumstances. As adult authority, as knowledge transmitter, as arbiter of classroom process, and as legitimate cultural representative, the teacher is in a position of considerable power and influence. He can encourage classroom norms of openness or resistance, of collaboration or isolation. In many ways the white teacher acts as a role model, often emulated by white students. How was this complex and influential role handled?

Teachers apparently defined their goals and designed their classroom approaches in a variety of ways. In some cases it appeared that teachers almost deliberately misunderstood or underestimated the potential problems facing youngsters attempting to bridge the cultural gap between the races.

> ——We were not accustomed to saying "yes ma'am" and "no ma'am" and she wouldn't realize that we couldn't do it overnight. If we made one mistake in English and said "yeah," she would write on a little piece of paper and say, "I am going to have you all put out of school for insubordination." It seemed as if all she did the whole time was to just wait for us to say "yes" so she could make a big thing out of it. It seems like if you say "yes" one time, she won't miss it. She will ask you right away, "What's that you say?" She will ask you questions to try to make you say "yes ma'am." She got fed up at me because I got tired of her trying to make me say "yes ma'am" and I started saying, "I think so," or "I don't really think so," or something like that just to keep from saying "ma'am," because I figured she was doing it on purpose.

——I felt at first that they would expect us to say "yassum" and "noum." It was the idea that I just didn't want to say "yes ma'am" and "no ma'am" to a white woman. I found that this was the way they expected any of their students to address them.

——One teacher, he felt that we were just trying to start things. But we were just trying to get things straight. We ended up arguing most of the time instead of getting much done. It was kind of difficult.

——I forgot I was supposed to say "yes ma'am" to her and was saying "yeah, sure," and so on. She said, "Have you forgotten about saying "yes ma'am?" I said, "No, ma'am, I haven't." She said, "Now let's not forget that." She works around to try to get the opinion of most of the Negroes concerning race. Then she will tell you her opinion and ask you whether you shouldn't feel the same way. Most of the time you don't.

In a number of classrooms, however, it became more apparent that misunderstanding could not possibly be the case. There are many examples where teachers were perceived as abdicating part of their impartial classroom management role, deliberately colluding with white students in isolating or pressuring Negro youngsters, or sometimes taking the lead in such discriminatory treatment.

——Some of the teachers will try to be funny. When they get to a word like Negro, they call it Nigger or else try to make fun.

——When we got in there they started throwing rocks and crayons at us. I told the teacher and she went back there, and they all started laughing, and she was laughing with them. And then they went outside and they brought more rocks and they started throwing them.

——Our home economics teacher would have the new machines on one side of the room and the old on the other side, and would put us into groups to let us use the old machines and the white girls use the new ones. And in cooking she would always give out the recipes and stuff and we would always get the small amount. And she would separate us into three groups so that the three Negro girls were in the same group together.

——I had this teacher who divided the class up into groups. The Negroes sit on one side and the white students sit on the other side. She would teach the Negroes like on one half of the class and then she would go over to the white kids. If we came to anything about communism or something relating to civil rights, she would bring up King's name and say something like, "In a little time our freedom will be gone." Their freedom, the whites. She feels that just because she is a teacher she can talk about anything.

——In history class it was very bad. There were always conversations going on between the teacher and the students about the Governor and integration and the President and the federal government and all such as that. They were talking against the federal government because the government was for integration and like they were talking against integration because they don't see any sense to it. And the teacher was always saying some kind of wise crack just to hurt your feelings and like that. He was always praising the Governor. The students acted the same as the teacher did in their class, you know, there was always something that they could say and try and hurt my feelings.

——My history teacher would call on me to read mostly all the time, and because I couldn't read very well the children would laugh. The teacher would go out of the class almost every day so the kids could call on me and have fun on me. Every time I would call on someone to read the class would laugh. One of the other problems was my English teacher; he would make jokes up about me and some of the other Negro students said that he made jokes up about them.

——Our teacher was always calling on us when we wouldn't have our hands up, and when we did have our hands up she wouldn't call on us; when we'd take them down that's when she would call on us. And then one morning in our first period class, my friend was at his desk, and she called him up in front of the class, trying to embarrass him. He had soap on his face that couldn't come off good and she told him that he had soap on his face and that he hadn't washed his face. Well, they'd make remarks about him and laugh at him.

——If I had a test or something, six-week test or something like that, she would get some of the dumbest children to grade my paper and they would put anything down. And when the children made a mistake she said that she couldn't do anything about it, so I just left them alone until the next day. They kept giving me F's on my paper when I made a B or something like that.

When these youngsters were asked to compare their white teachers with the Negro teachers they knew, there was considerable variation in reactions. Some felt the white teachers were intellectually superior, some not; some felt the white teachers were superior managers, some not. But almost all felt there were important differences, especially in the fairness of the teachers to them.

——The Negro college is not a very good school for teachers. The white teachers have more opportunities and have more challenge than the teachers in the Negro college could have. And the school of the teacher makes a lot of difference.

——I gather that the teachers at the Negro school are more experienced but they are not up to date. Two or three years ago, when they were in college they were, but now there are new techniques. Most of the teachers at the white school, well, they are fresh out of college and they know more and learn more by the modern way. Whereas, the teachers at the Negro school are sort of . . . like, old fashioned. The teachers there have been out of school for quite some time. Some of them don't bother about going back. Here you can learn more because in the classroom you can get more over to the students when you can teach them individually. So therefore, well, both teachers have faults. One such as inexperience and the other who didn't know much about the modern way of work. But basically both teachers are trying to help.

——They're not teaching a lot of the time. They're often doing their monthly report instead of teaching us. And as far as incidents are concerned here, if something happens in the classroom most of the time it goes unnoticed unless the white students get the worse end of it. But at the old school incidents are always given the best consideration and both parties usually go to the office and get it settled. But the teachers at the white school see it different, and only the Negroes go to the office if the white person gets hurt bad enough to report it.

——I think the teachers at the new school are worse than the ones at the Negro school because they don't give you exactly what you make. At the Negro school they don't give you exactly what you make either, but they're worse here. If you make a good grade they'll give you a bad grade and if you make a bad grade then they still give it to you. But they also make it lower and they don't treat you equally. When something happens they put it all on us and they don't do anything about it. They do stay in their room longer but when something happens they still don't know about it because they don't try to find out about anything. At the old school the teachers stayed out of the room more, but still if you tell them about something they do something about it. But here they just don't treat us equally because we are Negroes and the other children are white.

In addition to the direct influence of the teachers, the school principal was often singled out for attention. More than the teachers, the southern principal is in a particularly vulnerable role vis-a-vis the school staff and the local community. In order to maintain an orderly school system he may have to defend racial desegregation against considerable white and perhaps even Negro resistance. If he disapproves strongly, he must try to resist desegregation without openly threatening or obviously endangering the lives of Negro and white youngsters. These role demands must be met regardless of his views; and when the system changes he must still represent it or resign. Furthermore, he must keep his teaching staff in relatively good order and humor, and support their efforts as far as he can without causing direct harm to youngsters of either race. In these turbulent situations he also has some special direct responsibility for creating a school atmosphere that either supports or denies standards of fair play, justice and peace. How were principals seen to perform these various and stressful roles?

Often these Negro youngsters showed remarkable acuity and insight into the principal's behavior and role conflict; at times they manifested criticism and impatience. When helpful things were done, they were often noted and appreciated; and when harmful or unhelpful stances were taken they were decried. Consider:

——The principal never brought up the question of integration; if he did, he tried to hide it. So the kids kind of rejected us. I didn't have any friends; maybe this was because of the principal also.

——I also heard that all the children had to do was get used to you and they would get better, but toward the end of the school term instead of getting better they was getting worse. I would say that the reason for this was because at the beginning of the school term the principal was really rough and tight on them, but he begun to slack up on them and they began to get like they were the year before.

——I went and reported it to the principal and he said, like the Governor said a long time ago, "Do it like you do it with mud, you let it dry and it will shake off better." He always had some slogan like that to say in every situation.

——[These two girls] came into the bathroom and said, "Two of the Negroes in the hall were trying to fight and we told the principal about it but you know he didn't do anything about it, because they are privileged characters. I don't care if I could paint my face black so I could be a privileged character too." Then they started talking: "You know we'll be going to the Negro schools this year" and the other girl said, "Yeah and I'm going to get myself one of those Negro boyfriends, too." They didn't know I was there.

——See, if something happened during the school hour a group of them would go to the office and tell him something, tell something was stolen and try to trip us all up. He didn't know what to believe most times so he just never paid any attention.

——The principal got a refrigerator and put it in there for us. He went and got drinks for us also. He would ask us in the morning what we would like to have and would go out of his way to get it for us. He was pretty nice.

——It's tough on the principal, although I really can't say why I think that. The girl cheerleaders say that the only thing he thinks about is sex going on in the school, but he hasn't said anything to me about that. I can't see he does that. They say that he's mean and forces things on them they don't want to do. Maybe we think differently because he does the things I want him to do and not what they want him to do. They want to get rid of him and talk about it a lot.

——The atmosphere this year is very different from last year, I guess, because of the change in principals. Last year we didn't have as many students come up to us and talk. It wasn't the matter of having so many friends but they wouldn't approach you in any way. I guess this year the new principal doesn't try to hide the situation that is involved like the old one did. You who came in this year are fortunate because he will talk to you about anything you want. He is trying to get the two races to come together. I think that may be what changed the atmosphere. When you hide things it makes people go around not saying things to each other. Now everybody can talk to one another.

Relations with white classmates

In addition to the classroom and building management personnel, the new Negro student learned from his constant interaction with white peers in the classroom. Educational research has demonstrated how important peer influences and associations are for student learning, and recent laboratory research has emphasized some of the important threat and reward influences of white peers upon Negro youngsters' learning performance. But academic lessons are only one part of the total learning that goes on in the classroom. What do Negro youngsters learn about their white peers; what do they learn about their friendship, their fears, their abilities and their potential for working together?

First, let us examine views of the way white students received and interacted with their new Negro classmates; and the ways these young Negroes felt about these reactions.

——[Kids with] real BB guns would stand around the bus and aim at us and threaten us. Boys would ride around on motorcycles and throw rocks at us from the outside. The elementary kids would throw rotten eggs at us. The police would ignore them.

——You also get used to things written on the bathroom walls, a lot of stuff. But this is something you have to take. When you come to think about it, when kids call you a name you laugh and joke it off. When you get down there, it's a little different because it's white people.

——Really, I didn't know how I would take being called a Nigger because I had never been called a Nigger before. I just didn't know how I would take it. I couldn't tell anybody I wouldn't hit anybody when they called me Nigger. But after I got over there and had been called a Nigger about a thousand times during the first six-week period I'd feel a burning inside, and after the third six-week period I'd get over this burning inside, but really a Nigger still seems kind of like insulting to me.

——Sometimes we be going down the hall and if any of the white students was standing in the hall and they see us coming they say here come a black Nigger, you better stand back, or something. They would get back up against the wall. In the morning sometime we'd be standing by our locker and they would get off the bus and come in and try to walk close up by the wall or something pretending that they didn't want to get close to touch us or anything.

——For the most part those children over there want to be friendly, some of them do, but their parents tell them what to do and what not to do and all. You can tell that some of them want to say something to you but they are scared that if they say something to you then the other one is going to call them Nigger lover and all that kind of junk. They just go back and tell 'em and so they just don't want to get involved.

——I found myself not acting myself. They expected a whole lot out of me. They expected me to be different. I had to go along with their crude jokes. They were no good but I laughed anyway. They would run things in the ground but I would keep laughing. Lately I have decided that I really shouldn't try to act different from what I really am. I have decided that I don't have to prove anything to anybody. I lost a few friends by doing that but I've gotten fed up with it. When I first came into the situation I wanted to be friendly. I guess anybody wants to be friends with everybody. We got along okay. We joked about the white and Negro relationship. This was good and okay, but I just got tired of it.

——After you go back and look at both sides of the story, you can't blame them really because after all you don't want people to say, "Oh no, I am scared to touch her because her black might rub off on me." If you were in their situation, you might feel the same way. You have to understand that they're not going to fall in love with you overnight. Nobody likes for his friends to turn their backs on him and laugh at him and all of that. More than likely that would be what would happen.

——And when we'd be in Physical Education class the coach wouldn't be there, he had boys lead the class. We would be playing football. Every day they'd tell the boys to try to hurt us and knock us down and they would do it. One of them would pretend to act nice and tell them not to do it, but he didn't mean it anyway and this other one would tell them to keep on.

——It turned out with three of the characters that were white in the book being played by three Negro girls. There was a scene in the opening part of the play where we had two uncles and the uncles were white boys. When they came in we were supposed to hug them. When we wrote this script, nobody knew who was going to play who so we wrote it just like it was supposed to be written. When the boys found out that we were supposed to hug them, they weren't happy about it; they were pretty upset. One boy said, "I just can't do that." Well, we laughed about it but they were pretty serious. I kept getting the impression that it was because of what would happen when their friends saw them do this, or when their fathers or their relatives saw them.

——I was kind of shocked when two white boys and myself were backstage in the wings together and one of them had a gun that we were to use in the play. He said, "If I had to shoot all the Negroes in the school, I would shoot you last." I said, "Why?" He said, "I like you because you know how to cope with our white jokes."

——This is the first thing that comes over them, intermarriage. Well, it takes two to marry somebody. Nobody wants to marry them; you just want to be their friends, that's all.

——They have been led to believe that the Negro thinks about one thing, sex.

——No, no, I don't think that. They know that they think about getting married. They are afraid that they may find a Negro that they like, not necessarily that a Negro likes them. Maybe they already got a crush on them. I just believe that they are afraid. If they were not afraid of us, maybe they could stand us a little better. But when you have a guilty conscience yourself, things get down on you a little worse.

These perceptions only begin to hint at the distance that typically separates Negro and white youngsters in many desegregated schools. Negroes report a range of experiences with young whites; from physical violence and threats to name calling, and from joking and teasing to awkward attempts at friendliness. The complicity of teachers in maintaining old patterns is again manifest. In some cases it seems that time and contact have decreased the social distance; in other cases contacts have made Negro youngsters wiser and warier. We were interested in knowing whether Negro students' perceptions of the intelligence and decorum of white youngsters had changed as a result of their contact.

——After I got there I wasn't a bit surprised at the attitude of the students there because it had been said before that these kids are absolutely wild. They wouldn't listen to the principal and wouldn't mind the teachers and I wasn't a bit surprised. I was kind of prepared for some of the incidents that happened.

——Some people think that white people are higher class than Negroes, but from the way the children did behave they are lower class people than the Negro. We went in class one day and everybody sat down and when the teacher went out of the room some of the students had spit in the vacant seats that nobody sits in. And they put chewing gum all over the desks. I mean you didn't find too much chewing gum over at the Negro schools; they threw it out the window or trash can. But over there you find the desk packed with chewing gum and stuff like that.

——Before we started school our principal at the Negro school told us to be quiet on the bus, "You should hear how quiet the white children are on the bus and everything." You can't hear anything on that bus, you know, from the time you get on the bus to when you get off.

——I was really surprised as I went to the white school. They say, "Oh, the Negroes are so dumb," but I really found out that the Negroes are not really dumb at all. If they really had the chance and opportunities they would be a lot smarter than the white children because the white children who went to that school ever since the first grade I had caught up with in the first six weeks I went there. Now I was kind of backward on some subjects, like math, because the only time I took that I was in seventh grade and I had a hard time with math. But in all my other subjects I caught up with most of the white children and passed them in the first six weeks. They really get hot with you when you get ahead of them and I really had lots of trouble with that because I was smarter than most of them, most of the other children in my room, especially in the tenth grade. I don't know about the other grades, but I do feel that the white race is not smarter than the Negro. If the Negro kids had the opportunity and would get down to it and work for it, the Negro race could get up with the white race any time.

——There is just one thing I would like to say. We have a lot of dumb people in our class—you know, dumb, white people. It's true! They want to graduate, but they don't want to do anything.

——Well, before I went to the white school I always did think that the white person was smarter than we are. I used to think that they were just born smarter, just because they were white, but I found out this year that this isn't true. There were a lot of them who had more trouble than I had in getting their lessons and they had been in this school and in this situation, maybe not in the same situation, but they had been around their friends and their teachers for eleven years before then. Some of them couldn't do half as good as I could, and I don't see how some of them even graduated. They failed some subjects and took an extra subject, and make D's in that subject and they still passed. I just don't understand it. I think that maybe the reason we think that we aren't as smart as they are is because they've made us feel like we don't know anything.

——I feel that they made us feel that we don't know anything because they always keep us in jobs like in the kitchen or in the yard or on the farms. They never have made us feel like we should be anything; never made me feel like anything.

It is clear that there have been instances where interracial classroom contact has permitted Negroes to break down some of their traditional myths about the superiority of white people. They now see some of the differences among young whites, and can even account for some of their own prior assumptions. What about the other learnings about white people that have occurred? Does it appear that desegregating classrooms has led to cross-racial friendships? Has it led to greater Negro receptivity to white advances, and vice versa? Has it increased interracial trust?

——I wouldn't invite a white person to my house unless I trusted them a lot because I wouldn't just invite anybody to my house. They could just be setting a trap by setting a bomb in the house or something, but if it was someone that I knew well and trusted a lot, I would.

——Well, I trust white people less, because since I've been around them I am more familiar with them and their ways. The only thing I knew about white people was when they came around they would be friendly and all that. When I started school some of those people who I thought would be friendly looked like they were my worst enemies. Every time they smiled in your face they were just trying to get some information, that's all; and when they get that they are gone and they are just like any other white person. Therefore, I trust them less.

——Like in our class, you see the same people every day and they have gotten used to the fact that they have got to talk to us. We have a nice conversation. We laugh at their jokes and everything and then if you see them on the street, the same person that you have been joking around with all day will look the other way and they won't speak. That kind of thing bothers you. They will talk to you when you are by yourself or with just a few people, but if you are in a group with some of their other friends around, they don't know you at all. That kind of thing makes you distrust their friendship at all.

——Sunday we stopped in at the dairy farm and two of the white boys that went to school last year drove up there and they went in. We were standing up there to the window getting waited on and they looked over and waved to us. That's the way they are when they are out of school; when they are in school they act all different.

——I don't trust white people either because you may think that they are being friendly but come to think of it they are not. In other words, when you get around them they'll be friendly, but if a white person is with me and then we see a group of other white people and they see him with me, they will call him a Nigger lover. So you be thinking that he'd be a friend and the white people get mad; so he just quit being friends. Sometimes he'd be friendly and sometimes he won't.

——They all seem to be afraid of what someone else might think. They can't seem to think for themselves. They can't even follow their own moral right. They are always afraid of what someone else might think. There are very few incidences of violence, killings, etc., but they are afraid to take me home after practice. They say, "Somebody might shoot me." "Take you home in broad daylight, you must be kidding." Sometimes they will take me home and sometimes they will make up excuses. They are just afraid. They are afraid of nothing; there's nothing to be afraid of. Sometimes I invite them to come over, but they think that the Negroes just hate white people; they think they will come over here and get killed. I try to explain to them that there are so many white people over here now that it's a thing that is accepted. One man is just another man that you pass on the street. They can't seem to understand that. The white people who associate with us here are what they refer to as "Nigger lovers."

——I feel that we have given the wrong impression that our relationship with the white kids at the high school is entirely a hostile one. This is wrong although sometimes we talk that way. We have conversations and all and often the boys talk about girls. But the thing is that sometimes you may say something and you don't know who you can trust, even those who look like they're being sincere. You don't know whether you can trust them or if they'll say something behind your back.

The Negro community

A number of critical issues developed in the Negro communities when youngsters decided to desegregate white schools. Some Negro community leaders feared white retaliation, and some deplored any desegregation efforts at all. Others encouraged these transfers and went out of their way to support them. When young Negro students changed to white schools they often left behind their old school and neighborhood peer groups. Were they able to return? Did old friends still receive them openly? Or did going to a white school mean isolation from friends as well as from traditions of the past? With regard to the Negro communities' reactions:

——In our community all of them were very encouraging. We had been having small mass meetings around our community to try and encourage people to try to enroll students in this school because you could get a better education there. Everyone was very glad that I was chosen to go there and they was trying to encourage me as much as possible to continue.

——Well, the Negro people in my home community didn't seem as if they were at all for it. They would say that we aren't ready to be with the white people yet; "We should stay and try and get ourselves together first before we try and get with somebody else," integrate the Negro first is what they were saying. But here in this town there were a lot of people who gave me a lot of encouragement and the encouragement enabled me to go on and graduate.

——People in my neighborhood didn't like my going to the white school because they said that I was just trying to be popular and the white school wasn't any better than the Negro school. They said that the Negro school was the newest school. They said that our house was going to be burned and the Klu Klux Klan was going to get us and lots of people was going to get killed. They wasn't going and didn't want those people coming in their neighborhood. Our house did get burned, and when it did people said, "That's what I told you was going to happen."

——Well, the colored people in my community, well, some of the colored anyway, the Uncle Toms, would tell me to stay in my place and that they weren't going to sit near us over there and get throwed at and called Nigger.

——The way I see it is that people want things to happen but they are waiting for somebody else to do it. They will not realize that those who do something have to sacrifice. They don't realize that those who first went down had to sacrifice. They didn't have all the opportunities and all the extracurricular activities that the Negro school had, like ball games, etc. Another thing, a lot of kids came up to me and told me they would like to come but they would like to be on the basketball team. But we don't have a football or basketball team. They are just plain scared and they don't want to give up anything.

Friends appeared and disappeared throughout the semester. The crucible of change fragmented many superficial relationships, but it also seemed to anneal and highlight others. Some Negro peers were jealous, others threatened; some were interested and asked what was going on, others projected their fears and attacked. This seemed to be one of the areas of greatest surprise and hurt for the desegregating students.

——And when I'd come home from school the children would come up to me and ask me, "Well, who did you get into a fight with today?" "What white girl did you beat up?" "And who's your white boyfriend?" They never did try to help us; all they did was try to get funny.

——I noticed that some of the kids at the Negro school would say that we were stuck-up. I asked one person why did she think this and she said that because they expect so much out of us, that we are supposed to be smart and have our names on the honor roll and everything. It seems as if they are the first to say you won't speak to them any more. But they won't give you a chance. They turn away or make some snide remark and that discourages you. They say, "You think you are so big or so important that you can't be around your old friends any more."

——It's the same way with some of your friends who go to the Negro school. Some people think that because you want to go to an integrated school that you want to be white. I have heard a lot of people say this. When you get into a discussion with someone who is not going to an integrated school, or a heated argument when they can't think of anything else to say, they are going to bring up, "You think you are so good because you go to an integrated school; you think you are white." I found that you are not going to ever get around this. This is one of the things that you are going to have to accept!

——She told her friend, "Guess what, I am over to the 'big Niggers' house." I was wondering how could she say "big Niggers." Just because I went to the white school didn't mean that we were "big Niggers." She got the impression that we were "big Niggers" and had a lot of money and everything which we don't.

——I didn't really lose any friends. The people who were not my friends but acted close to me soon stopped speaking. This year it was pretty bad during basketball season. A group of girls said that we thought we were white. They said that we come to their basketball games and sit up and try to act intelligent because we thought we were white. It was just that group of people because our friends are still our friends and close friends and they don't think that way.

And what of the future?

In reflecting about their experiences, these youngsters indicate something of what we may expect about the future of change in the South. As classrooms and schools change, other major institutions will be forced to keep pace. In the face of these prospects and current debates over civil rights activity and strategy, it is illuminating to inquire into these youngsters' feelings about the future. It appears that many of these young Negroes will be followed by more of their race in the school desegregation process. What would be likely to happen if more young Negroes joined them?

——To make the school a better place I think it will take courageous Negro students and some large Negro boys that are big and that have a lot of courage, and an integrated faculty, and that's about all I think it would take.

——I think the situation would be better if more Negro students went because a lot of the students just pick on you because they think they can get by with it. I don't think a student would hit a Negro student if he thought somebody was behind him to give him just that much more. He wouldn't do it even if he thought somebody was behind him that would see him and tell the student who it was.

——They would be afraid to bother you if they knew somebody else was with you, if they knew somebody else was with you and on your side and would help you if you needed that help. But like it is now with so many whites, they can just pick on you and there are not enough Negroes to do them enough harm back.

——I wish I was going back; I just want some of them to pick at me like they did last year so I can get them back. When we have about an equal number of students we'll see if we can get in a fight over there. We will have the same number in our color as they got in their color so we probably have a better chance of fighting. If they're looking for a fight this year then I'm going to fight.

——You have to be in an area where you can be accepted together. It's not like that down here. That's what's wrong, and it'll take time, a long time, to change.

A long, long time indeed. Will we find new means besides getting bigger Negroes and bigger whites? No one knows now, but it is our hope that this sort of constant public examination of the deeds and processes of change may help us learn how to shorten that time, how to make it more peaceful and less painful. Clearly, changes in schools will not come about without change in other social institutions; just as clearly school change sets the pace and tone for community change. One certainty is the need to develop, experiment with, and document new change strategies. We need to develop new support systems in Negro and white communities; new ways of encouraging white and Negro youngsters to face one another squarely and without fear of external sanctions. Youngsters who are willing to reach out to one another must be fortified against the familial and communal pressures that promote separation. We need to find new ways to help the principal deal with changing school-community and teacher-pupil relations. Finally, we need to develop new ways of helping teachers cope with their own ambivalences, with Negro reluctance and white resistance; teachers need new designs to explore the never-never land of social contact between students. The barriers to growth explored in this paper need to be turned into facilitators of justice, peace and progress. The development of such change strategies requires the best minds and bodies of the South and the Nation; it extends the process of change beyond the initial physical desegregation of educational facilities.

PREFACE

This study on the experiences of Negro children in school desegregation in Alabama was conducted by Dr. Mark A. Chesler, Project Director, Center for Research on Utilization of Scientific Knowledge, Institute for Social Research, University of Michigan.

We believe this study has the most serious implications for our hope of the possibilities of one people living together in a democratic society. Certainly, any society which subjects its children to cruelty is in desperate need of taking a new and critical look at itself.

"What Happened After You Desegregated the White School?"

Everytime I get talking about my experience at the white school something happens to me. I can't really express myself and I can't really tell what happens. It's like I was kind of in a trance, I was just walking around from day to day and doing what I thought I was supposed to do and trying not to do what I wasn't supposed to do.

Sometimes you say things here and you don't mean it to be a particular insult, but you don't want to step on anybody's toes, so you just have to be careful of what you say and how you say it.

THESE COMMENTS REFLECT some Negro students' reactions to their experiences in newly desegregated white schools in the Deep South. It is clear that placing Negro youngsters into "white" schools is only the first—and in many ways the easiest—phase of the school desegregation process. In many cases real discomfort, overt discrimination, intimidation and insight begin only when young Negroes enter southern white schools. Physical proximity in the classroom sets the stage for young people of both races to cut through or restore myths, to learn about or hide from each other, to cooperate in friendship or separate in hostility. The hope that social interaction leads to growth is dependent upon the youngsters, their teachers, principals and communities.

This report records the comments of 20 Negro teenagers who were among the first members of their race to attend previously all-white public schools in the Deep South. These youngsters and their experiences are not necessarily typical of the South and the desegregation process. They live in three small rural communities in the black belt South, the most hard core areas of white resistance.* Several hours of tape recorded conversation have been abstracted with brief comments, and these direct words of Negro youngsters highlight some of the problems beyond desegregation—beyond the physical introduction of Negro students into previously all-white schools.

Several major themes stand out in these students' reflections and responses to our questions. The character of their teachers and principals seems to be the most important element in their early adjustment to the white school, and vice versa. The reactions of white peers and the lack of development of positive relations across racial lines seems to be a most pervasive issue in these rural communities. It is through experiences with their young white classmates that Negro students have now learned some of the practical realities of interracial harmony, trust and progress. Then, too, these youngsters had to deal with their "back-home" relations, with the Negro community's reaction to such pioneering efforts. These seem to be some of the most critical general issues documented by Negro "desegregators," and it is their feelings and perceptions about the school desegregation process, told in their own words, to which we turn for information.

The recordings on which this study is based were made while Dr. Chesler was a Visiting Instructor at Tuskegee Institute, 1966. Appreciation is extended to Eric Krystall, Barbara Oppenheimer, and Marvin Burns for assistance in their collection and to Franklin Neff for critical comments on an earlier draft of this paper.

The school staff

The adult whites with whom these Negro students had the greatest degree of contact were their teachers. More than police, vigilantes or roughnecks, who did call upon some of these youngsters, teachers met with them daily in relatively peaceful circumstances. As adult authority, as knowledge transmitter, as arbiter of classroom process, and as legitimate cultural representative, the teacher is in a position of considerable power and influence. He can encourage classroom norms of openness or resistance, of collaboration or isolation. In many ways the white teacher acts as a role model, often emulated by white students. How was this complex and influential role handled?

Teachers apparently defined their goals and designed their classroom approaches in a variety of ways. In some cases it appeared that teachers almost deliberately misunderstood or underestimated the potential problems facing youngsters attempting to bridge the cultural gap between the races.

> We were not accustomed to saying "yes ma'am" and "no ma'am" and she wouldn't realize that we couldn't do it overnight. If we made one mistake in English and said "yeah," she would write on a little piece of paper and say, "I am going to have you all put out of school for insubordination." It seemed as if all she did the whole time was to just wait for us to say "yes" so she could make a big thing out of it. It seems like if you say "yes" one time, she won't miss it. She will ask you right away, "What's that you say?" She will ask you questions to try to make you say "yes ma'am." She got fed up at me because I got tired of her trying to make me say "yes ma'am" and I started saying, "I think so," or "I don't really think so," or something like that just to keep from saying "ma'am," because I figured she was doing it on purpose.

> I felt at first that they would expect us to say "yassum" and "noum." It was the idea that I just didn't want to say "yes ma'am" and "no ma'am" to a white woman. I found that this was the way they expected any of their students to address them.

* * *

> One teacher, he felt that we were just trying to start things. But we were just trying to get things straight. We ended up arguing most of the time instead of getting much done. It was kind of difficult.

I forgot I was supposed to say "yes ma'am" to her and was saying "yeah, sure," and so on. She said, "Have you forgotten about saying 'yes ma'am'?" I said, "No ma'am, I haven't." She said, "Now let's not forget that." She works around to try to get the opinion of most of the Negroes concerning race. Then she will tell you her opinion and ask you whether you shouldn't feel the same way. Most of the time you don't.

In a number of classrooms, however, it became more apparent that misunderstanding could not possibly be the case. There are many examples where teachers were perceived as abdicating part of their impartial classroom management role, deliberately colluding with white students in isolating or pressuring Negro youngsters, or sometimes taking the lead in such discriminatory treatment.

Some of the teachers will try to be funny. When they get to a word like Negro, they call it Nigger or else try to make fun.

When we got in there they started throwing rocks and crayons at us. I told the teacher and she went back there, and they all started laughing, and she was laughing with them. And then they went outside and they brought more rocks and they started throwing them.

* * *

Our home economics teacher would have the new machines on one side of the room and the old on the other side, and would put us into groups to let us use the old machines and the white girls use the new ones. And in cooking she would always give out the recipes and stuff and we would always get the small amount. And she would separate us into three groups so that the three Negro girls were in the same group together.

* * *

I had this teacher who divided the class up into groups. The Negroes sit on one side and the white students sit on the other side. She would teach the Negroes like on one half of the class and then she would go over to the white kids. If we came to anything about communism or something relating to civil rights, she would bring up King's name and say something like, "In a little time our freedom will be gone." Their freedom, the whites. She feels that just because she is a teacher she can talk about anything.

* * *

In history class it was very bad. There were always conversations going on between the teacher and the students about the Governor and integration and the President and the federal government and all such that. They were talking against the federal government because the government was for integration and like they were talking against integration because they don't see any sense to it. And the teacher was always saying some kind of wise crack just to hurt your feelings and like that. He was always praising the Governor. The students acted the same as the teacher did in their class, you know, there was always something that they could say and try and hurt my feelings.

* * *

My history teacher would call on me to read mostly all the time, and because I couldn't read very well the children would laugh. The teacher would go out of the class almost every day so the kids could call on me and have fun on me. Every time I would call on someone to read the class would laugh. One of the other problems was my English teacher; he would make up jokes about me and some of the other Negro students said that he made jokes up about them.

* * *

Our teacher was always calling on us when we wouldn't have our hands up, and when we did have our hands up she wouldn't call on us; when we'd take them down, that's when she would call on us. And then one morning in our first period class, my friend was at his desk, and she called him up in front of the class, trying to embarrass him. He had soap on his face that couldn't come off good and she told him that he had soap on his face and that he hadn't washed his face. Well, they'd make remarks about him and laugh at him.

If I had a test or something, six-week test or something like that, she would get some of the dumbest children to grade my paper and they would put anything down. And when the children made a mistake she said that she couldn't do anything about it, so I just left them alone until the next day. They kept giving me F's on my paper when I made a B or something like that.

When these youngsters were asked to compare their white teachers with the Negro teachers they knew, there was considerable variation in reactions. Some felt the white teachers were intellectually superior, some not; some felt the white teachers were superior managers, some not. But almost all felt there were important differences, especially in the fairness of the teachers to them.

The Negro college is not a very good school for teachers. The white teachers have more opportunities and have more challenge than the teachers in the Negro college could have. And the school of the teacher makes a lot of difference.

I gather that the teachers at the Negro school are more experienced but they are not up to date. Two or three years ago when they were in college they were, but now there are new techniques. Most of the teachers at the white school, well, they are fresh out of college and they know more and learn more by the modern way. Whereas, the teachers at the Negro school are sort of . . . like, old fashioned. The teachers there have been out of school for quite some time. Some of them don't bother about going back. Here you can learn more because in the classroom you can get more over to the students when you can teach them individually. So therefore, well, both teachers have faults. One such as inexperience and the other who didn't know much about the modern way of work. But basically both teachers are trying to help.

* * *

They're not teaching a lot of the time. They're often doing their monthly report instead of teaching us. And as far as incidents are concerned here, if something happens in the classroom most time it goes unnoticed unless the white students get the worst end of it. But at the old school incidents are always given the best consideration and both parties usually go to the office and get it settled. But the teachers at the white school see it different, and only the Negroes go to the office if the white person gets hurt bad enough to report it.

I think the teachers at the new school are worse than the ones at the Negro school because they don't give you exactly what you make. At the Negro school they don't give you exactly what you make either, but they're worse here. If you make a good grade they'll give you a bad grade and if you make a bad grade then they still give it to you. But they also make it lower and they don't treat you equally. When something happens they put it all on us and they don't do anything about it. They do stay in their room longer but when something happens they still don't know about it because they don't try to find out about anything. At the old school the teachers stayed out of the room more, but still if you tell them about something they do something about it. But here they just don't treat us equally because we are Negroes and the other children are white.

In addition to the direct influence of the teachers, the school principal was often singled out for attention. More than the teachers, the southern principal is in a particularly vulnerable role vis-a-vis the school staff and the local community. In order to maintain an orderly school system he may have to defend racial desegregation against considerable white and perhaps even Negro resistance. If he disapproves strongly, he must try to resist desegregation without openly threatening or obviously endangering the lives of Negro and white youngsters. These role demands must be met regardless of his views; and when the system changes he must still represent it or resign. Furthermore, he must keep his teaching staff in relatively good order and humor, and support their efforts as far as he can without causing direct harm to youngsters of either race. In these turbulent situations he also has some special direct responsibility for creating a school atmosphere that either supports or denies standards of fair play, justice and peace. How were principals seen to perform these various and stressful roles?

Often these Negro youngsters showed remarkable acuity and insight into the principals' behavior and role conflict; at times they manifested criticism and impatience. When helpful things were done, they were often noted and appreciated; and when harmful or unhelpful stances were taken they were decried. Consider:

> The principal never brought up the question of integration; if he did, he tried to hide it. So the kids kind of rejected us. I didn't have many friends; maybe this was because of the principal also.
>
>
> I also heard that all the children had to do was get used to you and they would get better, but toward the end of the school term instead of getting better they were getting worse. I would say that the reason for this was because at the beginning of the school term the principal was really rough and tight on them, but he begun to slack up on them and they began to get like they was the year before.
>
>
> I went and reported it to the principal and he said, like the Governor said a long time ago, "Do it like you do it with mud, you let it dry and it will shake off better." He always had some slogan like that to say in every situation.
>
>
> [These two girls] came into the bathroom and said, "Two of the Negroes in the hall were trying to fight and we told the principal about it but you know he didn't do anything about it, because they are privileged characters. I don't care, if I could paint my face black so I could be a privileged character too." Then they started talking, "You know we'll be going to the Negro schools this year," and the other girl said, "Yeah and I'm going to get myself one of those Negro boyfriends too." They didn't know I was there.
>
>
> See, if something happened during the school hour a group of them would go to the office and tell him something, tell something was stolen and try to trip us all up. He didn't know what to believe most times so he just never paid any attention.
>
>
> The principal got a refrigerator and put it in there for us. He went and got drinks for us also. He would ask us in the morning what we would like to have and would go out of his way to get it for us. He was pretty nice.
>
>
> It's tough on the principal, although I really can't say why I think that. The girl cheerleaders say that the only thing he thinks about is sex going on in the school, but he hasn't said anything to me about that. I can't see he does that. They say that he's mean and forces things on them they don't want to do. Maybe we think differently because he does the things I want him to do and not what they want him to do. They want to get rid of him and talk about it a lot.
> * * *

The atmosphere this year is very different from last year, I guess, because of the change in principals. Last year we didn't have as many students come up to us and talk. It wasn't the matter of having so many friends but they wouldn't approach you in any way. I guess this year the new principal doesn't try to hide the situation that is involved like the old one did. You who came in this year are fortunate because he will talk to you about anything you want. He is trying to get the two races to come together. I think that may be what changed the atmosphere. When you hide things it makes people go around not saying things to each other. Now everybody can talk to one another.

Relations with white classmates

In addition to the classroom and building management personnel, the new Negro student learned from his constant interaction with white peers in the classroom. Educational research has demonstrated how important peer influences and associations are for student learning, and recent laboratory research has emphasized some of the important threat and reward influences of white peers upon Negro youngsters' learning performance. But academic lessons are only one part of the total learning that goes on in the classroom. What do Negro youngsters learn about their white peers; what do they learn about their friendship, their fears, their abilities and their potential for working together?

First, let us examine views of the way white students received and interacted with their new Negro classmates, and the ways these young Negroes felt about these reactions.

> [Kids with] real BB guns would stand around the bus and aim at us and threaten us. Boys would ride around on motorcycles and throw rocks at us from the outside. The elementary kids would throw rotten eggs at us. The police would ignore them.
>
>
> You also get used to things written on the bathroom walls, a lot of stuff. But this is something you have to take. When you come to think about it, when kids call you a name you laugh and joke it off. When you get down there, it's a little different because it's white people.
>
>
> Really I didn't know how I would take being called a Nigger because I had never been called a Nigger before. I just didn't know how I would take it. I couldn't tell anybody I wouldn't hit anybody when they called me Nigger. But after I got over there and had been called a Nigger about a thousand times during the first six-week period I'd feel a burning inside, and after the third six-week period I'd get over this burning inside, but really a Nigger still seems kind of like insulting to me.
> Sometimes we be going down the hall and if any of the white students was standing in the hall and they see us coming they say here come a black Nigger, you better stand back or something. They would get back up against the wall. In the morning sometime we'd be standing by our locker and they would get off the bus and come in and try to walk close up by the wall or something pretending that they didn't want to get close to touch us or anything.

* * *

For the most part those children over there want to be friendly, some of them do, but their parents tell them what to do and what not to do and all. You can tell that some of them want to say something to you but they are scared that if they say something to you then the other one is going to call them Nigger lover and all that kind of junk. They just go back and tell 'em and so they just don't want to get involved.

* * *

I found myself not acting myself. They expected a whole lot out of me. They expected me to be different. I had to go along with their crude jokes. They were no good but I laughed anyway. They would run things in the ground but I would keep laughing. Lately I have decided that I really shouldn't try to act different from what I really am. I have decided that I don't have to prove anything to anybody. I lost a few friends by doing that but I've gotten fed up with it. When I first came into the situation I wanted to be friendly. I guess anybody wants to be friends with everybody. We got along okay. We joked about the white and Negro relationship. This was good and okay, but I just got tired of it.

* * *

After you go back and look at both sides of the story, you can't blame them really because after all you don't want people to say, "Oh, no, I am scared to touch her because her black might rub off on me." If you were in their situation, you might feel the same way. You have to understand that they're not going to fall in love with you overnight. Nobody likes for his friends to turn their backs on him and laugh at him and all of that. More than likely that would be what would happen.

* * *

And when we'd be in Physical Education class the coach wouldn't be there, he had boys lead the class. We would be playing football. Every day they'd tell the boys to try to hurt us and knock us down and they would do it. One of them would pretend to act nice and tell them not to do it, but he didn't mean it anyway and this other one would tell them to keep on.

* * *

It turned out with three of the characters that were white in the book being played by three Negro girls. There was a scene in the opening part of the play where we had two uncles and the uncles were white boys. When they came in we were supposed to hug them. When we wrote this script, nobody knew who was going to play who so we wrote it just like it was supposed to be written. When the boys found out that we were supposed to hug them, they weren't happy about it; they were pretty upset. One boy said, "I just can't do that." Well we laughed about it but they were pretty serious. I kept getting the impression that it was because of what would happen when their friends saw them do this, or when their fathers or their relatives saw them.

I was kind of shocked when two white boys and myself were backstage in the wings together and one of them had a gun that we were to use in the play. He said, "If I had to shoot all the Negroes in the school, I would shoot you last." I said, "Why?" He said, "I like you because you know how to cope with our white jokes."

* * *

This is the first thing that comes over them, intermarriage. Well it takes two to marry somebody. Nobody wants to marry them; you just want to be their friends, that's all.

* * *

They have been led to believe that the Negro thinks about one thing, sex.

No, no, I don't think that. They know that they think about getting married. They are afraid that they may find a Negro that they like, not necessarily that a Negro likes them. Maybe they already got a crush on them. I just believe that they are afraid. If they were not afraid of us, maybe they could stand us a little better. But when you have a guilty conscience yourself, things get down on you a little worse.

These perceptions only begin to hint at the distance that typically separates Negro and white youngsters in many desegregated schools. Negroes report a range of experiences with young whites, from physical violence and threats to name calling, and from joking and teasing to awkward attempts at friendliness. The complicity of teachers in maintaining old patterns is again manifest. In some cases it seems that time and contact have decreased the social distance; in other cases contacts have made Negro youngsters wiser and warier. We were interested in knowing whether Negro students' perceptions of the intelligence and decorum of white youngsters had changed as a result of their contact.

After I got there I wasn't a bit surprised at the attitude of the students there because it had been said before that these kids are absolutely wild. They wouldn't listen to the principal and wouldn't mind the teachers and I wasn't a bit surprised. I was kind of prepared for some of the incidents that happened.

Some people think that white people are higher class than Negroes, but from the way the children did behave they are lower class people than the Negro. We went in class one day and everybody sat down and when the teacher went out of the room some of the students had spit in the vacant seats that nobody sits in. And they put chewing gum all over the desks. I mean you didn't find too much chewing gum over at the Negro schools; they threw it out the window or trash can. But over there you find the desk packed with chewing gum and stuff like that.

* * *

Before we started school our principal at the Negro school told us to be quiet on the bus, "You should hear how quiet the white children are on the bus and everything." You can't hear anything on that bus, you know, from the time you get on the bus to when you get off.

* * *

I was really surprised as I went to the white school. They say, "Oh, the Negroes are so dumb," but I really found out that the Negroes are not really dumb at all. If they really had the chance and opportunities they would be a lot smarter than the white children because the white children who went to that school ever since the first grade I had caught up with in the first six weeks I went there. Now I was kind of backward on some subjects, like math, because the only time I took that I was in seventh grade and I had a hard time with math. But in all my other subjects I caught up with most of the white children and passed them in the first six weeks. They really get hot with you when you get ahead of them and I really had lots of trouble with that because I was smarter than most of them, most of the other children in my room, especially in the tenth grade. I don't know about the other grades, but I do feel that the white race is not smarter than the Negro. If the Negro kids had the opportunity and would get down to it and work for it, the Negro race could get up with the white race anytime.

* * *

There is just one thing I would like to say. We have a lot of dumb people in our class—you know, dumb white people. It's true! They want to graduate, but they don't want to do anything.

* * *

Well, before I went to the white school I always did think that the white person was smarter than we are. I used to think that they were just born smarter, just because they were white, but I found out this year that this isn't true. There were a lot of them who had more trouble than I had in getting their lessons and they had been in this school and in this situation, maybe not in the same situation, but they had been around their friends and their teachers for eleven years before then. Some of them couldn't do half as good as I could, and I don't see how some of them even graduated. They failed some subjects and took an extra subject, and made D's in that subject and they still passed. I just don't understand it. I think that maybe the reason we think that we aren't as smart as they are is because they've made us feel like we don't know anything.

I feel that they made us feel that we don't know anything because they always keep us in jobs like in the kitchen or in the yard or on the farms. They never have made us feel like we should be anything; never made me feel like anything.

It is clear that there have been instances where interracial classroom contact has permitted Negroes to break down some of their traditional myths about the superiority of white people. They now see some of the differences among young whites, and can even account for some of their own prior assumptions. What of the other learnings about white people that have occurred? Does it appear that desegregating classrooms has led to cross-racial friendships? Has it led to greater Negro receptivity to white advances, and vice versa? Has it increased interracial trust?

I wouldn't invite a white person to my house unless I trusted them a lot because I wouldn't just invite anybody to my house. They could just be setting a trap by setting a bomb in the house or something, but if it was someone that I knew well and trusted a lot, I would.

* * *

Well, I trust white people less, because since I've been around them I am more familiar with them and their ways. The only thing I knew about white people was when they came around and they would be friendly and all that. When I started school some of those people who I thought would be friendly looked like they were my worst enemies. Everytime they smiled in your face they were just trying to get some information, that's all; and when they get that they are gone and they are just like any other white person. Therefore, I trust them less.

* * *

Like in our class, you see the same people every day and they have gotten used to the fact that they have got to talk to us. We have a nice conversation. We laugh at their jokes and everything and then if you see them on the street, the same person that you have been joking around with all day will look the other way and they won't speak. That kind of thing bothers you. They will talk to you when you are by yourself or with just a few people, but if you are in a group with some of their other friends around, they don't know you at all. That kind of thing makes you distrust their friendship at all.

* * *

Sunday we stopped in at the dairy farm and two of the white boys that went to school last year drove up there and they went in. We was standing up there to the window getting waited on and they looked over and waved to us. That's the way they are when they are out of school; when they are in school they act all different.

* * *

I don't trust white people either because you may think that they are being friendly but come to think of it they are not. In other words, when you get around them they'll be friendly, but if a white person is with me and then we see a group of other white people and they see him with me, they will call him a Nigger lover. So you be thinking that he'd be a friend and the white people get mad; so he just quit being friends. Sometimes he'd be friendly and sometimes he won't.

* * *

They all seem to be afraid of what someone else might think. They can't seem to think for themselves. They can't even follow their own moral right. They are always afraid of what someone else might think. There are very few incidences of violence, killings, etc., but they are afraid to take me home after practice. They say, "Somebody might shoot me." "Take you home in broad daylight, you must be kidding." Sometimes they will take me home and sometimes they will make up excuses. They are just afraid. They are afraid of nothing; there's nothing to be afraid of. Sometimes I invite them to come over, but they think that the Negroes just hate white people; they think they will come over here and get killed. I try to explain to them that there are so many white people over here now that it's a thing that is accepted. One man is just another man that you pass on the street. They can't seem to understand that. The white people who associate with us here are what they refer to as "Nigger lovers."

* * *

I feel that we have given the wrong impression that our relationship with the white kids at the high school is entirely a hostile one. This is wrong although sometimes we talk that way. We have conversations and all and often the boys talk about girls. But the thing is that sometimes you may say something and you don't know who you can trust, even those who look like they're being sincere. You don't know whether you can trust them or if they'll say something behind your back.

The Negro community

A number of critical issues developed in the Negro communities when youngsters decided to desegregate white schools. Some Negro community leaders feared white retaliation, and some deplored any desegregation efforts at all. Others encouraged these transfers and went out of their way to support them. When young Negro students changed to white schools they often left behind their old school and neighborhood peer groups. Were they able to return? Did old friends still receive them openly? Or did going to a white school mean isolation from friends as well as from traditions of the past? With regard to the Negro communities' reactions:

In our community all of them were very encouraging. We had been having small mass meetings around our community to try and encourage people to try to enroll students in this school because you get a better education there. Everyone was very glad that I was chosen to go there and they was trying to encourage me as much as possible to continue.

Well, the Negro people in my home community didn't seem as if they were at all for it. They would say that we aren't ready to be with the white people yet; "We should stay and try to get ourselves together first before we try and get with somebody else"; integrate the Negro first is what they were saying. But here in this town there were a lot of people who gave me a lot of encouragement and the encouragement enabled me to go on and graduate.

* * *

People in my neighborhood didn't like my going to the white school because they said that I was just trying to be popular and the white school wasn't any better than the Negro school. They said that the Negro school was the newest school. They said that our house was going to be burned and the Ku Klux Klan was going to get us and lots of people was going to get killed. They wasn't going and didn't want those people coming in their neighborhood. Our house did get burned, and when it did people said, "That's what I told you was going to happen."

* * *

Well the colored people in my community, well some of the colored anyway, the Uncle Toms, would tell me to stay in my place and that they weren't going to sit near us over there and get throwed at and called Nigger.

* * *

The way I see it is that people want things to happen but they are waiting for somebody else to do it. They will not realize that those who do something have to sacrifice. They don't realize that those who first went down had to sacrifice. They didn't have all the opportunities and all the extracurricular activities that the Negro school had, like ball games, etc. Another thing, a lot of kids came up to me and told me they would like to come but they would like to be on the basketball team. But we don't have a football or basketball team. They are just plain scared and they don't want to give up anything.

Friends appeared and disappeared throughout the semester. The crucible of change fragmented many superficial relationships, but it also seemed to anneal and highlight others. Some Negro peers were jealous, others threatened; some were interested and asked what was going on, others projected their fears and attacked. This seemed to be one of the areas of greatest surprise and hurt for the desegregating students.

And when I'd come home from school the children would come up to me and ask me, "Well, who did you get into a fight with today?" "What white girl did you beat up?" "And who's your white boyfriend?" They never did try to help us; all they did was try to get funny.

I noticed that some of the kids at the Negro school would say that we were stuck up. I asked one person why did she think this and she said that because they expect so much out of us, that we are supposed to be smart and have our names on the honor roll and everything. It seems as if they are the first to say you won't speak to them anymore. But they won't give you a chance. They turn away or make some snide remark and that discourages you. They say, "You think you are so big or so important that you can't be around your old friends anymore."

* * *

It's the same way with some of your friends who go to the Negro school. Some people think that because you want to go to an integrated school that you want to be white. I have heard a lot of people say this. When you get into a discussion with someone who is not going to an integrated school, or a heated argument when they can't think of anything else to say, they are going to bring up, "You think you are so good because you go to an integrated school; you think you are white." I found that you are not going to ever get around this. This is one of the things that you are going to have to accept!

* * *

She told her friend, "Guess what, I am over to the 'big Niggers' house." I was wondering how could she say "big Niggers." Just because I went to the white school didn't mean that we were "big Niggers." She got the impression that we were "big Niggers" and had a lot of money and everything which we don't.

* * *

I didn't really lose any friends. The people who were not my friends but acted close to me soon stopped speaking. This year it was pretty bad during basketball season. A group of girls said that we thought we were white. They said that we come to their basketball games and sit up and try to act intelligent because we thought we were white. It was just that group of people because our friends are still our friends and close friends and they don't think that way.

And what of the future?

In reflecting about their experiences, these youngsters indicate something of what we may expect about the future of change in the South. As classrooms and schools change, other major institutions will be forced to keep pace. In the face of these prospects and current debates over civil rights activity and strategy it is illuminating to inquire into these youngsters' feelings about the future. It appears that many of these young Negroes will be followed by more of their race in the school desegregation process. What would be likely to happen if more young Negroes joined them?

To make the school a better place I think it will take courageous Negro students and some large Negro boys that are big and that has lots of courage, and an integrated faculty, and that's about all I think it would take.

* * *

I think the situation would be better if more Negro students went because a lot of the students just pick on you because they think they can get by with it. I don't think a student would hit a Negro student if he thought somebody was behind him to give him just that much more. He wouldn't do it even if he thought somebody was behind him that would see him and tell the student who it was.

They would be afraid to bother you if they knew somebody else was with you, if they knew somebody else was with you and on your side and would help you if you needed that help. But like it is now with so many whites, they can just pick on you and there are not enough Negroes to do them enough harm back.

* * *

I wish I was going back; I just want some of them to pick at me like they did last year so I can get them back. When we have about an equal number of students we'll see if we can get in a fight over there. We will have the same number in our color as they got in their color so we probably have a better chance of fighting. If they're looking for a fight this year then I'm going to fight.

You have to be in an area where you can be accepted together. It's not like that down here. That's what's wrong, and it'll take time, a long time, to change.

A long, long time indeed. Will we find new means besides getting bigger Negroes and bigger whites? No one knows now, but it is our hope that this sort of constant public examination of the deeds and processes of change may help us learn how to shorten that time, how to make it more peaceful and less painful. Clearly, changes in schools will not come about without change in other social institutions; just as clearly, school change sets the pace and tone for community change. One certainty is the need to develop, experiment with, and document new change strategies. We need to develop new support systems in Negro and white communities; new ways of encouraging white and Negro youngsters to face one another squarely and without fear of external sanctions. Youngsters who are willing to reach out to one another must be fortified against the familial and communal pressures that promote separation. We need to find new ways to help the principal deal with changing school-community and teacher-pupil relations. Finally we need to develop new ways of helping teachers cope with their own ambivalences, with Negro reluctance and white resistance; teachers need new designs to explore the never-never land of social contact between students. The barriers to growth explored in this paper need to be turned into facilitators of justice, peace and progress. The development of such change strategies requires the best minds and bodies of the South and the nation; it extends the process of change beyond the initial physical desegregation of educational facilities.

Reflections on School Integration: I.

(This is a transcript of a three-hour session with eight Negro youngsters who desegregated and are attending a predominantly white school in the Deep South. All students are in the tenth through twelfth grades. 5/66)

QUESTION: Who made the decision for you to go to a white school and how was it made? What were the first days like?

GIRL NO. 1: The first year my parents didn't decide whether they wanted me to go or not. In fact, they didn't want me to go. While on our vacation we heard on the news that teachers were petitioning the county board of education for desegregating the schools in the county. I decided that I wanted to go down and apply. I took it down to the superintendent's office. In about two days they called and asked that some kids come down and take a test in the school library. It took about a half day. Two or three days later we heard on the news that we students had been accepted. They told the number of boys and the number of girls but didn't give any names. The first day we went down in a block, for they wouldn't let us go to the school at first. They passed out papers from the governor stating that we couldn't come. We went back to the superintendent's office and had a little conference with him. We also had a conference with the principal to get our schedules worked out. As soon as we did get in school some of the kids started checking out and some of the teachers approached some of the students and asked them if they had made their phone calls yet. So there were only us left. About the second semester the school closed. We went to the superintendent's office to get things straight. We asked the superintendent if we could apply to go to other schools in the county. He said it was possible; so, we had a conference with the families involved and six decided to go to _____ and six decided to go to _____. One boy didn't go because he was expelled for insubordination. My mother decided I would go to _____ because she was afraid something might happen at _____. That's really where all the excitement was. When we went we had people constantly following us from the Justice Department. They would escort us back and forth. When we got there we had a nice reception with the confederate flag and state troopers standing all around. The first day we went they stopped the bus. They had each of us to stand up as they called our names so they could count us. As soon as we got off the bus at school, the students inside started calling us names. The first two or three days we stayed in the library and didn't go to class. The principal had to give us a conference one by one. He gave us the rules we had to go by. The first thing he asked us was why we wanted to come there. We all said basically the same thing; that we thought it was our constitutional right to go to any school we wanted to, and that we wanted to further our education. He then told us the regulations of the school. He said there would be no corn chunking (throwing corn kernels in the class) and no smoking. He said that any day he might ask a girl to let him see her pocketbook and if he found any cigarettes or liquor, he would throw her out of school. Then he told us that we were to get cups for the water fountain and we had a separate restroom for the girls. I asked him why we were to drink out of cups and he said that students were leaving the school and that he wanted to keep them there; so he suggested that we drink out of paper cups for the time being. Nobody drank out of the cups and nobody went to the bathrooms. When we went to the other bathrooms, to see what separate booth we had, we saw that on the first day they had written "Private." The next day they had written on a big white sign "Nigger" in red lipstick. They tore up the snack machines and everything. Soon everybody left and there were about ten teachers and six students. The lunch program was cut out so we had to bring our lunches. The teachers taught at two schools and they would leave anytime they wanted to. They went to teach at the elementary school and when we had a class they would come down there. They didn't want to stay in class with us but they felt they had an obligation and, of course, they wanted to get paid. Soon we were subpoenaed to go to court. My teacher approached me and asked me to ask my lawyer not to do anything that would hinder the income of the teachers. I told her I didn't have anything to do with that; but still she told me to be sure to tell him. We went to court and the principal told us that he couldn't excuse us because we didn't have a legal excuse from the school. He said we would have to get an excuse from our lawyer. We had a verbal subpoena, and so did the principal. We all went down to court that Friday morning. All the people who were to appear in court stood around in a circle. The next day the principal told us that it was good we told the truth, but he couldn't excuse us for that day from school. We brought an excuse from our lawyer and finally he accepted it.

When school was out the principal came to each of our houses individually. During this time we had received some threats so we told him about them. He told us that one of the teachers at the school was also threatened. He said he had notified the police; but the police didn't do anything. The sheriff came down to the school and he interviewed us and told us that he knew all of our parents and they were nice and everything.

GIRL NO. 2: My experiences were somewhat different. The first day a news reporter rode the bus with us. All around us were state troopers. In front of them were federal marshals. When we got to town there were lines of people and cars all along the road. A man without a badge or anything got on the bus and started beating up the newspaper reporter. You could tell he was hurt because he was crying. They threw the camera all over the bus and broke it, and they threw the reporter all over the floor. Then they picked him up by the feet and took him to the door and threw him out on the ground. He was crying and bleeding. When we got to the school the students were all around looking through the windows and everything. The mayor made a little speech about fire hazards and all that. He said we couldn't come there because the school was already filled to capacity. He indicated that if six of us came in it would be a fire hazard. He told us to turn around and go back. We turned around and the students started yelling and clapping and everything. We went back to the office of the board of education. When I got home, my parents were at work and I got this call from my lawyer saying I was not to go back. It was quite a while before we went back because we had to go to court. After we got there we were called to the stand. At first it was kind of frightening; they asked us what happened. After court they told us that the decision was that we could go back. When we went back there were no students there at all. There were only two teachers left. The rest of the teachers left so they had to bring a couple of teachers from other places to teach. They were very nice considering what had happened. Very often when we came to school we would see things written all over the front of the building and pictures were drawn all over the walls. They would always draw a little black man with a lynch rope around his head. As you go up the stairs you would see stuff written like, "get rid of Robert Kennedy." Our lawyer had told us to take note of these things that went on but the teacher would tell us to come in and not bother about it. He said the people on the other side of the street were taking note of how we acted and we wouldn't want to make it difficult. The principal was pretty nice. He would let us go about things casually. He wouldn't distrust us. They didn't have a milk machine and he would go out of his way to go to the store to buy cookies and things and would just bring them out and tell us to get them and put our money in the box. He didn't stand around and watch us or anything. One day in April we got a call that said the school would be burned and that there would be no school. We had to go back to court. We decided after court to go back to school. Since nothing was burned but the high school department, we had school in the auditorium. We had classes on each side of the stage, in dressing rooms and wings. The principal got a refrigerator and put it in there for us. He went and got drinks for us also. He would ask us in the morning what we would like to have and would go out of his way to get it for us. He was pretty nice. They told us that they had gotten threats during the last part of the year saying that if they gave diplomas to the three seniors that they would kill them or something. They decided to let us get out of school a day early and give the diplomas to us then. The shocking thing was during the graduation ceremonies. All six of the students got together to make a speech. After we finished, I looked around and saw three teachers crying. The principal had tears in his eyes and he got up to make a little speech about us. He told the truth for he said at first he didn't think he would enjoy being around us. You could see in his face that he was really touched. We said something like we really enjoyed school together and that we were glad they stuck it out and all that kind of stuff. There was one boy who constantly bothered our bus driver. We always got out one period early. He would wait for school to get out and get up on his truck and wait for us and when the light turned green he would just sit there and wouldn't move. The police station was right down the street but they wouldn't do anything about it. This continued until our bus driver told him off. Several times when we would come through town in the morning they would have guns out in the hobby shop. One girl on the bus would always get upset and start crying. They were really BB guns and they would stand around the bus and aim at us and threaten us. Boys would ride around on motorcycles and throw rocks at us from the outside. The elementary kids would throw rotten eggs at us. The police would ignore them. The first day at school here there were not many students but there were some. The principal was not very nice. I'm sure everybody had something to say about him. The students in class were having fake reactions, but I guess everybody had those at first. But later in the year we got to know each other pretty well and got into good discussions with teachers.

GIRL NO. 1: Last year, maybe because of the principal, wasn't a good year at all. Maybe, because we didn't have many activities like we had this year. The principal was just teaching there because he couldn't find a better job somewhere else, for he didn't do very much for the school. The first day there was marching and cameramen taking pictures. The teachers were pretty good for most of them were young graduates of the University. I guess they were pretty nice and everything. It was just that we didn't have any activities and that made it a sorry year. The principal never brought up the question of integration; if he did, he tried to hide it. So the kids kind of rejected us. I didn't have many friends; maybe this was because of the principal also.

GIRL NO. 3: We had this strange teacher. In the first part of the year he didn't say anything to us about our grades. Some of us had pretty good grades on tests and everything. I had the feeling that he didn't want us to do that; he wanted them to do better than we did. He seemed to make the tests harder for he figured that if we failed, it actually was difficult. He never wanted us to say that what he said was wrong. In one case he got mad because he was wrong and we said he was wrong. It was a case concerning the male part of the flower and he said they were the pistil. On the chart the name of the thing was stamen. A couple of the white students agreed with him. As far as he was concerned he was right and there was nothing else to say about it. He felt that we were just trying to start things. But we were just trying to get things straight. We ended up arguing most of the time instead of getting much done. It was kind of difficult.

GIRL NO. 4: This year seemed to be entirely different for me, for it was my first year. It was actually almost like any other first day at a new school. We didn't know anybody and couldn't expect for everybody to come up and kiss us and all of that. The teachers seemed to accept me as well as the rest of the students. Although I didn't have any close friends, I never found anybody who acted like they would die if I got close to them. It has been almost a normal year for me.

GIRL NO. 1: The atmosphere this year is very different than last year, I guess, because of the change in principals. Last year we didn't have as many students come up to us and talk. It wasn't the matter of having so many friends but they wouldn't approach you in any way. I guess this year the new principal doesn't try to hide the situation that is involved like the old one did. You who came in this year are fortunate because he will talk to you about anything you want. He is trying to get the two races to come together. I think that may be what changed the atmosphere. When you hide things it makes people go around not saying things to each other. Now everybody can talk to one another. Most of the students are afraid of their parents.

GIRL No. 3: I had this teacher who divided the class up into groups. The Negroes sit on one side and the white students sit on the other side. She would teach the Negroes like on half of the class and then she would go over to the white kids. If we came to anything about communism or something relating to civil rights, she would bring up King's name and say something like, "In a little time our freedom will be gone," their freedom, the whites. She feels that just because she is a teacher she can talk about anything.

GIRL No. 1: When I first came down she compelled me to say, "yes, ma'am." I realize that it is a way of showing respect and adults like children to show respect. But when somebody compels you to say that, and my parents don't require me to say that to them, it kinds of gets on me. If you didn't say it she would take off points from your grades. I also notice that she didn't like people from the East, West, and North. She doesn't like redheads, for they give her the impression that they are mean. Don't let a person have green eyes because to her they are fierce. If there is anything she wants to know about the race problem, she will call you. She used to call me to see what was going on during the summer. I forgot I was supposed to say "yes ma'am" to her and was saying "yeah, sure," and so on. She said, "Have you forgotten about saying 'yes ma'am'?" I said, "no, ma'am, I haven't." She said, "Now let's not forget that." She works around to try to get the opinion of most of the Negroes concerning race. Then she will tell you her opinion and ask you whether you shouldn't feel the same way. Most of the time you don't.

BOY No. 1: Concerning answering, "yes ma'am" and "no ma'am," I find that this is the way almost any teacher will expect their students to address them. If you think about it, if you were someplace else, you would probably address the teachers the same. In our situation, being Negro, I felt at first that they would expect us to say "yassum" and "noam." It was the idea that I just didn't want to say "yes ma'am" and "no ma'am" to a white woman. I found that this was the way they expected any of their students to address them.

GIRL No. 2: I remember the first year one teacher threatened to have him put out of school because he wouldn't say "yes ma'am" and "no ma'am" to her. We were not accustomed to saying it and she wouldn't realize that we couldn't do it overnight. If we made one mistake in English and said "yeah," she would write on a little piece of paper and say, "I am going to have you all put out of school for insubordination." It seemed as if all she did the whole time was to just wait for us to say "yes" so she could make a big thing out of it. It seems like if you say "yes" one time, she won't miss it. She will ask you right away, "What's that you say?" She will ask you questions to try to make you say "yes ma'am." She got fed up at me because I got tired of her trying to make me say "yes ma'am" and I started saying, "I think so," or "I don't really think so," or something like that just to keep from saying "ma'am," because I figured she was doing it on purpose.

GIRL NO. 1: When I first went there, I ran sort of a little test on all of my teachers to see how many wanted me to say "yes ma'am." I found that she was the only one who tried to compel me to say it. She asked me, "Don't you say 'yes ma'am' to your mother and father?" I said, "No, sometimes I might say, 'yes mother' or 'yes father,' or something like that." She thought it was just terrible. That's the reason she thought I was a bad girl.

BOY NO. 2: The first day at school the teacher made it a point that we would say "yes ma'am" and "no ma'am" to her. One day she asked me something and I said, "Yes." She told me that the correct way to speak to her was to say "yes ma'am" and "no ma'am." About three or four days after school had started, a white student came into our class. She was from the North and had an accent to prove it. She had to drop the course because the teacher was very partial toward her. She would stick with us instead of the white kids and the teacher didn't appreciate that. When we were in class doing something, she would ask the white kids questions and if they couldn't answer them she would ask us, "What do you all have to say?" She could not teach. She would ask us to read certain things in economics and the next day she would come and say the very same thing that was in the book. We didn't need to take that over again because we read it that night. What was the use of reading the same thing over again? Actually we didn't learn anything except what was in the book.

BOY NO. 1: Speaking of the inability of the teachers to teach, what do you think about the teachers down there, do you think they are any better or what?

GIRL NO. 1: Personally, I like the teachers in the white school better than any of the teachers I have ever had. From the sixth grade down, my teachers always called me by my first name; from the seventh grade on they called me by my last name. I feel that it is very impersonal. Maybe it is because my classes were very crowded and my teachers didn't have time to help us as it is in a smaller classroom. When I got to the white school, the teachers were much more personal. None of them have ever called me by my last name. They take, or some take, more time with you; therefore, I feel that they are better.

GIRL NO. 3: I don't think they are any better or any worse than any other teacher I have had. People are people and some teachers are good and some are bad. I find that some of the teachers there are better and some are worse.

You can't put the teachers together and say, "These teachers are better," or "These teachers are worse."

BOY NO. 1: What I had reference to was, I found at the Negro school there is much more strictness of discipline or many more strict teachers. The teachers are more experienced and their teaching techniques are different and their presentation of the lesson plan is better.

GIRL NO. 2: It's not necessarily that they are more experienced in teaching techniques, it's just that they have techniques of their own. You are used to their techniques and you have just got to get used to other teachers' techniques. You can't just say that this teacher's techniques are better because he has a better teaching technique because you are used to them. Maybe, after and if, you get used to the teaching techniques that are unfamiliar to you, you might like them.

BOY NO. 1: Once before we did mention teachers being better or worse and everybody else said that you could not compare the teachers actually because every teacher has his own teaching technique. But I would disagree; I would say our teachers at the Negro high school are better. The teachers here are inexperienced—most of them are just out of college and they are not, just do not have the technique. Wait, let me! No, let me finish. At the Negro school, there are teachers who have more class activities, the teacher explains things and we have more class discussions, whereas at our high school, we read the book and have a test. That's about all there is to it. Some people may say that is the teacher's technique, his own technique. You can't say he is worse or better, that's just his technique, but I would say there is a difference.

GIRL NO. 1: Now, mainly he was speaking about just one teacher who is an individual. Again, you can't compare science with English; you will always give illustrations with slides and visual aids and things like that. I feel that English is usually a most boring subject.

BOY NO. 1: But both as far as teaching techniques and what goes on in the classroom, and how the teacher gets lessons over to the students, that's how you tell a good teacher.

GIRL NO. 1: Maybe she is better to you because she was teaching a difficult subject. Take for instance, science, you can always give movies, any visual aid—anything is interesting in science. Those things will always be more interesting to most people. But English is usually boring. Grammar, and how to punctuate, verbs and things like that. And it's usually nothing to worry about too much. Then if the teacher can make him interested, then she is a good teacher.

BOY NO. 1: What I'm saying is that you said you have never been to any other school except the high school and you cannot compare other means and ways of teaching techniques. What I'm saying is that you haven't been a student at the high school so you couldn't compare.

GIRL NO. 4: Now, during the time I was at the Negro high school, we used to go to one man and the classrooms were overcrowded and I'm not saying that the teachers were bad, but we didn't do anything that was not customary. And when I changed schools that was when I found that the work was harder. I guess because classes were smaller and it's according to how the teacher lectures—whether it's boring or whether it's interesting.

BOY NO. 2: I gather that the teachers at the Negro school are more experienced but they are not up-to-date. Two or three years ago, when they were in college they were, but now there are new techniques. Most of the teachers at the white school, well, they are fresh out of college and they are sure they will know more and learn more by the modern way. Whereas, the teachers at the Negro school are sort of . . . like, old fashioned. The teachers there have been out of school for quite some time. Some of them don't bother about going back. Here you can learn more because in the classroom you can get more over to the students when you can teach them individually. So therefore, well, both teachers have faults. One such as inexperience and the other who didn't know much about the modern way of work. But basically both teachers are trying to help.

GIRL NO. 3: The Negro college there is not a very good school for teachers. The white teachers have more opportunities and have more challenge than the teachers in the Negro college could have. And the school of the teacher makes a lot of difference.

BOY NO. 1: Well, what would you rather have, an "A" student with a "B" character or a "B" student with an "A" character? The teachers at the Negro school have more experience, well, they've done it every year. They learn by experience. Each time they make a mistake, they're warned that that's one they've made. Even though these teachers in the white school are new they have just gotten out of college—that doesn't mean too much.

GIRL NO. 1: They have to learn by experience also. So, you've got to give them time to learn too. We just can't say A character or B character and teachers with an A character are better teachers than those with B character. You also have to grade B character over a period of time. You just have to give them time too.

GIRL NO. 1: I knew a lot of teachers at the Negro school before I came here. It seemed to me they were trying to maintain a reputation they had for being tough and for putting students out of class and sending them to the office and all of that. A lot of times things we should have discussed in homeroom, we'd discuss at our English period because we didn't have enough time in homeroom. A lot of teachers at the white school go to a lot of trouble trying to figure out ways of staying out of class so late by taking long coffee breaks. One time our history teacher was out of class so late that he came in at almost the end of the class period and gave us half an hour of notes to be taken in ten minutes. I don't think this is fair.

GIRL NO. 1: The impression that I got of the Negro teachers, maybe because so many students go there, is that they try to build up some sort of big impression for themselves. When I went to the white school it didn't seem that way. I guess because the classes were so small. Everybody has a pretty good impression and the teachers wouldn't go out of their way to help you just to make an impression or practice some discipline just to get back at you.

GIRL NO. 3: I kind of think the way you do. At the Negro school some of the teachers seem to have a complex. They seem to want to show you that they are just as good as the white teachers at any other place. I want to show you I'm great too. They go all out of their way to do little things that really don't help you learn anything; but they think they are making an impression on you. That didn't help me any; I just wanted someone who could teach, who could help me without putting on an act.

GIRL NO. 1: I found this too. When they wanted me to apply for the white school, I was happy and I told two of my teachers. One teacher constantly reminded me that I am a member of the Negro race and that since I was going to school with white children, I would have to change because they are different. She said that if I am going to school down there, I would have to stop being bad. Every time I'd do something she'd tell me I better change because that is why the whites didn't want us down there now because we are so bad. Things like this lead Negro children to think that they are actually in a minority and are different.

QUESTION: Why do you think she did that?

GIRL NO. 1: I really don't know. I kind of think she really thought that. That they didn't want us because we're noisy. After I got over there I found out differently. They're as bad as we are. You just can't say that because we are Negroes and they are whites that we are different. Everything that my instructor told me to look out for was just the opposite of what she had led me to believe.

GIRL NO. 3: The same thing happened to me. Whenever you tell somebody you want to do something different you get this. I told one of my teachers that I planned to apply to the white school and she told me what to do and what not to do. People really make you believe that you are different, you know, "little black girl is stupid," and that we have to act differently around white children. When you get into the situation children are children, they are going to do what they want to do anyway. It kind of makes you feel funny because you don't like to feel that you have to act in a different way because you want to make a good impression on the white kids. I want to be me.

GIRL NO. 1: It's the same way with some of your friends who go to the Negro school. Some people think that because you want to go to an integrated school that you want to be white. I have heard a lot of people say this. When you get into a discussion with someone who is not going to an integrated school, or a heated argument when they can't think of anything else to say, they are going to bring up, "You think you are so good because you go to an integrated school; you think you are white." I found that you are not going to ever get around this. This is one of the things that you are going to have to accept!

QUESTION: Have you lost any friends as a result?

GIRL No. 1: The people that I had in mind were not my friends in the first place.

GIRL No. 2: I didn't really lose any friends. The people who were not my friends but acted close to me soon stopped speaking. This year it was pretty bad during basketball season. A group of girls said that we thought we were white. They said that we come to their basketball games and sit up and try to act intelligent because we thought we were white. It was just that group of people because our friends are still our friends and close friends and they don't think that way.

BOY No. 2: The first year that I went down there, we had this friend who lived sort of out in the country. My father went and picked her up for dinner one day. After we finished eating dinner, she asked me how I was getting along at my new school. I told her. She asked my father if she could use the telephone and he said, "yes." She had known us for the six years that we have lived here and before. She was talking with one of her friends on the phone and she didn't know we were listening. She told her friend, "Guess what, I am over to the 'big Niggers' house." I was wondering how could she say "big Niggers." Just because I went to the white school didn't mean that we were "big Niggers." She got the impression that we were "big Niggers" and had a lot of money and everything which we don't. Actually my father didn't want me to go down there at first. Considering my going to school, I said that actually any Negro child can do this because all he has to do is fill out an application. She still couldn't get rid of the idea that we were "big Niggers." I just can't understand how they can say that. I said I'm no different than you are. Every time we would go over to her house, she would call some of her friends over and introduce them to the "big Niggers." I just stopped going over there. It's not only the children who are that way but it is the grownups also. A few neighbors around my house think it's a crime for me to rake or cut the lawn cause they think I'm so important. Once they learn that we are no different from them, and white people are no different from colored people, the situation will be much better. I'll be glad when that day comes.

GIRL No. 2: That's the way a lady in our neighborhood is. She doesn't think that we are any better than she is but she thinks that we think we are. She will do anything to get us out of the neighborhood. She talks about me when I come down the street. You can tell when someone is talking about you because they look at you from the side and talk out of the corner of their mouth. She told some of the neighbors that we think we are rich just because I was one of the first Negroes who integrated the school. She looked at me and watched me walk down the street and the lady she was talking with told me that she said, "You ought to see her when she gets off the bus, she throws her head up like she is so big." It used to hurt me and I talked with my mother about it and she and I decided to ignore it because you find people like that in every group. It's going to be hard, just as I'm reading a book by Sammy Davis, Jr., "Yes I Can." He didn't know anything about the difference between a Negro and a white because his father protected him. And that was wrong. When he got in the Army the men painted him white and rubbed him with turpentine. They said, "See the white paint comes off but your brown don't." They did awful things to him. He had the talent and wanted to make it big. When he did, the whites got mad at him because he did and the Negroes got mad at him because there weren't any Negroes at his party. That's the way it is here. The whites got mad at us for going to that school and the Negroes got mad too.

GIRL No. 1: I noticed that some of the kids at the Negro school would say that we were stuck up. I asked one person why did she think this and she said that because they expect so much out of us, that we are supposed to be smart and have our names on the honor roll and everything. It seems as if they are the first to say you won't speak to them anymore. But they won't give you a chance. They turn away or make some snide remark and that discourages you. They say, "You think you are so big or so important that you can't be around your old friends anymore."

GIRL No. 3: If you really look at it, I don't know if jealousy is the right word, but it seems as if they want to be a part of it too, and they are angry because you are in it. It doesn't make very much sense because they can do the same thing but nobody has the initiative to do it.

GIRL No. 1: What I have noticed is that many of the kids say they want to change schools or they want to participate in the activities, but their parents say they can't. Some say they are scared or something like that. I believe that a lot of them wanted to but they feel that they don't have the opportunities we had. It was easy for us because we had help.

GIRL No. 3: I was talking to one boy and I want someone to explain to me what he meant. He said he was thinking about applying to the white school but that he changed his mind because he said he thinks he will be intimidated for the school belongs to me now. I didn't understand him but I never got the chance to ask him what he meant. It just didn't make sense to me; I couldn't understand it.

BOY No. 1: He probably felt that since you were among the first who integrated the school and since there was only a few of us that maybe he felt that he would be intruding on something that you had started, that you had begun.

GIRL No. 3: Maybe that is how he felt, but I wish that we or that somebody could make people see that we were not just going there to get our names in the papers. Somebody had to start it sometime. We were not just going to say that we are the only ones that go to the white school. We were going, or rather we were doing this to help everybody. Why can't they see that it's their school too? If they want to go, why don't they just go?

GIRL NO. 1: The way I see it is that people want things to happen but they are waiting for somebody else to do it. They will not realize that those who do something have to sacrifice. They don't realize that those who first went down had to sacrifice. They didn't have all the opportunities and all the extracurricular activities that the Negro school had, like ball games, etc. Another thing, a lot of kids came up to me and told me they would like to come but they would like to be on the basketball team. But we don't have a football or basketball team. They are just plain scared and they don't want to give up anything.

BOY NO. 1: Going back to what you said about representing everyone. A person really can represent no one but himself. When I went, I didn't go for what you might call the Negro cause.

GIRL NO. 3: I didn't mean like that. If I had been one of the first to go, maybe I would have felt different. I am glad I didn't go that first year because I don't think I would have been able to stand up the way you all did. I think that more people should go.

QUESTION: Talk a little about your association with white students.

GIRL NO. 1: Sometimes when we are sitting in assembly we have a few students who don't want to sit by us and they make insinuating remarks like, "I had better not get too close to you," or something like that. You go to the bathroom and you see little notes and everything.

BOY NO. 2: It turned out with us talking about the governor and his administration. They all said that he is doing a good thing. I said, "You are dang right. He is doing a good thing. Had it not been for him, the university wouldn't be as integrated as it is; if he hadn't made a fool of himself trying to defy the federal government." He is always talking about this sovereign state so I asked them what did "sovereign state" mean, and would they refer to our state as being sovereign. They said yes. I asked them how they could possibly think this when we are getting money from the federal government; we are getting food from the federal government; the federal government is practically supporting you. If it were not for the federal government, we really couldn't have anything, schools or anything.

GIRL NO. 3: When I first decided to come to the white school I got a lot of suggestions from teachers and friends; but the best suggestion I got was to be open minded. I had no idea how it would be; I could only come and find out. You tend to form impressions or ideas of what it's going to be like. They are going to think you are going to be a certain way so don't try to be that way. They are going to think you are like this because all Negroes are like this so you have got to try to be different. Negroes can be prejudiced too and can have ideas about whites too. It's just as simple as not knowing what it's going to be like so you got to be open minded. If you are not going to be open minded and try to learn together you can't want to progress. Not being open minded is going to hinder you.

GIRL NO. 2: In our English class we had to try out for all kinds of parts in the play. We got upset at first because our English teacher didn't try out the Negro boys for anything but the part of the Negro. She didn't try any of the white boys out for that part either. We got upset because even though they were Negroes, and they have to be in the part, she could have thought of making us feel a little better by letting the white boys try for the part.

QUESTION: Well, what did you do about it?

BOY NO. 1: We went to the principal and asked him about it. He said that the part did call for a Negro. Well, I agree with this. The part called for a Negro and there were two Negro boys in the class so both of us tried out for the part. However, she might have let us try out for some other parts also. The principal said that if we did let a white person play the part then the thing would become a comedy and everyone would sit up and laugh and the actual meaning of the play wouldn't come out. The play is supposed to build up a better relationship between the whites and the Negroes. The principal suggested that we go on and do it. We never said anything to the instructor about it.

GIRL NO. 2: After the two Negro boys tried out, I began to think that the Negro girls could only play the parts of colored women and Negro slaves. I sort of got a little frustrated. But she had all of the girls both white and Negro to try out for the other parts. It turned out with three of the characters that were white in the book being played by three Negro girls. There was a scene in the opening part of the play where we had two uncles and the uncles were white boys. When they came in we were supposed to hug them. When we wrote this script, nobody knew who was going to play who so we wrote it just like it was supposed to be written. When the boys found out that we were supposed to hug them, they weren't happy about it; they were pretty upset. One boy said, "I just can't do that." Well we laughed about it but they were pretty serious. I kept getting the impression that it was because of what would happen when their friends saw them do this, or when their fathers or their relatives saw them.

QUESTION: Would you have done it?

GIRL NO. 2: I don't think I would have been any less embarrassed than they, but I would have done it. You see I don't really care about what anybody is going to say if they see me hug him. They just gave me the impression that it was more what would happen when their friends saw them do this. They just have to maintain their relationship with their white friends.

Now they have us shaking hands. At first they didn't want us to do anything but just wave at each other. One of the boys was making a big scene knocking down chairs and everything saying, "No, no, I can't do that." One of them was supposed to rub his sister's hair. "No I can't do that." Then he changed his mind and said he might be able to rub her hair but I can't hug her. The other one wouldn't say anything. He said it didn't make any difference with him.

GIRL NO. 1: After you go back and look at both sides of the story, you can't blame them really because after all you don't want people to say, "Oh no, I am scared to touch her because her black might rub off on me." If you were in their situation, you might feel the same way. You have to understand that they're not going to fall in love with you overnight. Nobody likes for his friends to turn their backs on him and laugh at him and all of that. More than likely that would be what would happen.

GIRL NO. 2: In the play I was the daughter and I was the only Negro in the whole family. They go around and call everybody brother and sister and mom and dad and they get to me and call me sister. When we sat around the table, I was expecting them to move their chairs over but they didn't do that. I was kind of shocked when two white boys and myself were backstage in the wings together and one of them had a gun that we were to use in the play. He said "If I had to shoot all the Negroes in the school, I would shoot you last." I said, "Why?" He said, "I like you because you know how to cope with our white jokes." I asked him what he meant and he said that when he tells us jokes we just laugh about them and don't get upset. I didn't know whether to take it as a compliment or not.

BOY NO. 1: I found myself not acting myself. They expected a whole lot out of me. They expected me to be different. I had to go along with their crude jokes. They were no good but I laughed anyway. They would run things in the ground but I would keep laughing. Lately I have decided that I really shouldn't try to act different from what I really am. I have decided that I don't have to prove anything to anybody. I lost a few friends by doing that but I've gotten fed up with it. When I first came into the situation, I wanted to be friendly. I guess anybody wants to be friends with everybody. We got along okay. We joked about the white and Negro relationship. This was good and okay but I just got tired of it.

GIRL NO. 4: What about the junior and senior banquet?

GIRL NO. 2: We had a meeting and the instructor asked how many of us thought we were coming. All of the Negroes' hands went up. There was one white girl whose hand went up. After she looked around and saw all of the other white students who didn't raise their hands, hers went down again. She was the main one who wanted to have it. Just when she saw their reactions, I think she was afraid she might lose her friends if she came. She keeps avoiding the principal so he won't ask her if she's coming. She keeps saying that she is not sure. The instructor said, "Well why don't you want to come?" She said, "I am not sure now." She's not sure but she might be out of town.

GIRL NO. 1: You talk about the reason they don't want to come is maybe because they didn't want to sit next to us. One day we were sitting around talking and I asked some white girls just why they didn't want Negroes to sit next to them or touch them or anything. They came up with the reason that they don't believe in intermarriage. Now, what does marriage have to do with sitting by somebody?

BOY NO. 1: Maybe they feel that if they get friendly with us and sit beside us and talk that might lead to something.

GIRL NO. 1: Well, it takes two to marry somebody. This is the first thing that comes over them, intermarriage. Nobody wants to marry them; you just want to be their friends, that's all.

BOY NO. 1: They have been led to believe that the Negro thinks about one thing, sex.

GIRL NO. 2: No, no, I don't think that. They know that they think about getting married. They are afraid that they may find a Negro that they like, not necessarily that a Negro likes them. Maybe they already got a crush on them. I just believe that they are afraid. If they were not afraid of us, maybe they could stand us a little better. But when you have a guilty conscience yourself, things get down on you a little worse.

GIRL NO. 1: I think they get many of these ideas from their parents. Most of the adults feel that integration results in intermarriage, especially in the elementary school.

GIRL NO. 2: There was one girl in my homeroom who is okay. She would talk to us and when we are in some kind of trouble, she will help us out. I found that she likes a lot of things that I like. She doesn't sit around and keep it to herself and her white friends. Like when we are doing something and you have to pick someone to be on your team, a lot of white students will pick some white students first because they are white. She is different, she will pick you because she thinks you are good.

GIRL NO. 3: As part of being somebody you aren't, I have trouble, because you don't want to be over nice, yet you want to be nice. In one class I have, there are only five of us in there. There are two white boys, two white girls, and myself. Usually, I don't sit with anyone. If we are going to talk or anything our teacher tells us to be quiet. They will start their conversation about anything. It is just boring to me. Someone might say, "Why don't you come and sit with us?" I can't tell them that I don't want to sit with you because I don't enjoy talking with them. I have to laugh at their stupid jokes or they'll think I'm square. It's just that you can't act yourself around them. You want to be with your friends, the Negroes. I can be me more then. If it were a place where whites and Negroes lived together and did things together it'd be different. I guess it's just the situation that makes it that way.

GIRL NO. 2: Like when we had our first party, everybody started running all over the building. It ended up with all of the Negroes having a party in one room and all the whites having a party in another. Everybody enjoyed this because we wanted our music and they wanted theirs. We just couldn't all be together and enjoy the same music. I like to do the "Dog" but to their music all you can do is jump around. Their music has a louder and faster beat than ours. We would end up playing one record that they liked and they would end up playing one record that we liked. I only like one record out of their collection and that was "Hang on Snoopy" and that wasn't too much. So we just ended up having two parties. We all enjoyed it.

GIRL NO. 3: Something else concerning the divided society. There is a girl that goes to choir practice with me. We have something to talk about together sometimes away from school. She is a friend of mine but not that close. If the town were arranged differently, the situation would probably be different.

GIRL NO. 1: We need more activities together so we'll have more in common. Maybe gradually in two or three years we'll do more things together like proms and dances.

GIRL NO. 2: It's tough on the principal, although I really can't say why I think that. The girl cheerleaders say that the only thing he thinks about is sex going on in the school, but he hasn't said anything to me about that. I can't see he does that. They say that he's mean and forces things on them they don't want to do. Maybe we think differently because he does the things I want him to do and not what they want him to do. They want to get rid of him and talk about it a lot.

GIRL NO. 1: Those who say that always break the rules anyway, like smoking. Last year they got away with some of it, but this year it's different. If you get caught, you got to pay the consequences.

QUESTION: Tell us some more about the kids in your classes. Are they friendly . . . are they as smart as you thought they were?

ALL: No! (LAUGHTER)

GIRL NO. 3: In our class one of the white boys decided that he is not going to do anything. He isn't going to cooperate. The teacher asked him to read a poem and he said he would rather not. She would just call on somebody else.

GIRL NO. 1: There's a lot of white students who act like they think they are doing you a favor if they let you be their friends. It's like it is a privilege for you to be their friend. Well, that's not the kind of friend I need. If you are going to be my friend I don't care what you are or what you claim to be. This one girl acts as if it is a privilege, and that you ought to be glad that she is going to be your friend. She acts like a counselor over you. There's a lot more like this too. They will talk to their friends about you, then they will come and get your opinion about something, then they will turn what you said to just the opposite and start something.

GIRL No. 3: What makes me feel sort of bad is when you go to a place out of the South, where there is integration and it is so perfect. People seem wonderful and you just forget about what you are, about your color and everything. Then when you come back you see that it is just the opposite. It makes you sick. You realize how perfect society can be but people just don't care enough to try to start it. It just makes you think. You see a way that you would like for things to be but it just can't be.

GIRL No. 2: I'm so used to white people objecting to many of the things that I do that I think I'll leave. I kind of question myself: "Here is a friend but does she really mean it?" I don't want to be that kind of person. I want to accept someone to be my friend without this kind of doubt. I think it's just being here. I get somewhere else and find white people being very nice and kind and I say to myself: "Look what they're doing." I don't want to feel that, I want to accept it.

GIRL No. 1: Like in our class, you see the same people every day and they have gotten used to the fact that they have got to talk to us. We have a nice conversation. We laugh at their jokes and everything and then if you see them on the street, the same person that you have been joking around with all day will look the other way and they won't speak. That kind of thing bothers you. They will talk to you when you are by yourself or with just a few people but if you are in a group with some of their other friends around, they don't know you at all. That kind of thing makes you distrust their friendship at all.

QUESTION: Are you girls saying that you are more distrustful of white people now than you were a few years ago? Is that the common reaction or not?

GIRL No. 2: If I had been around them all of my days and know how they react with me in school is different from the way that they react with me out, I could go along with it. When I was in the North I went to an integrated group and I didn't think anything about it. Now when some of them are being nice to me I find myself saying: "Look what they are doing for me, going out of their way to do it."

BOY No. 1: I don't know if this is representative of everyone, but I find that in our schools, the white kids will turn on each other. They will be friends and then when something happens, they always point the thing to the other. Even though they are friends, they can't seem to trust each other.

QUESTION: That doesn't happen among Negro friends?

BOY No. 1: I would say it was not as prevalent.

QUESTION: What other things do you see down there among the white kids?

BOY NO. 1: They all seem to be afraid of what someone else might think. They can't seem to think for themselves. They can't even follow their own moral right. They are always afraid of what someone else might think. There are very few incidences of violence, killings, etc., but they are afraid to take me home after practice. They say, "somebody might shoot me," "take you home in broad daylight, you must be kidding." Sometimes they will take me home and sometimes they will make up excuses. They are just afraid. They are afraid of nothing; there's nothing to be afraid of. Sometimes I invite them to come over to some of the activities. But they think that the Negroes just hate white people, they think they will come over here and get killed. I try to explain to them that it is a thing that is accepted. One man is just another man that you pass on the street. They can't seem to understand that. The white people who associate with us are what they refer to as "nigger lovers." I find that this is not only at the school but is characteristic of the entire white population. All of them are afraid of what others will think. I don't know very much about the city council but I think this exists in the city council.

GIRL NO. 2: We were talking about the junior-senior banquet, and —— asked whether the whites and the Negroes would want to avoid each other at the banquet. I said, "Why don't you sit next to me and we'll set an example." He said to me later, "Do you really want to sit by me?" I'm always joking around so I said, "Oh yes, sure, you know I want to sit by you." I was only joking, but maybe he took it seriously. He said to me later, "Do you want to sit next to me because I can't do that—my friends wouldn't like it?" I said, "Oh, that's all right. I will bring my date and we can sit on the other side of you." I was just joking around. I didn't know whether he was taking me serious or not but he asked me again and I said, "No, that's all right."

BOY NO. 1: He was serious—because he asked me. (LAUGHTER.) What do you think about this desegregation for next year? How will it work? That's between Negroes and whites.

GIRL NO. 1: All kids coming down here, they are going to be this, on that and on the other thing. If the whites hear all this half of them will drop out. Many of them have left already. But you can't just turn down the Negroes because parents say, you picked the best kids, you didn't pick my son or daughter and they start this rejection toward the school. Then next year you beg them to come down and they won't. They say you said you picked the best ones and you didn't pick my son or daughter then. I don't know what we are going to do about it. We got problems here.

QUESTION: What kind of reactions do you think white teachers would get from predominantly all Negro schools?

GIRL NO. 2: I know of one teacher who left, but she wasn't a good teacher, that's why.

GIRL NO. 3: They have one now. They said he was accepted fairly well.

You just have to think about personality. I don't know—can't be much worse.

GIRL No. 2: From what I've heard from students about the white teacher that was just the excuse she gave for leaving, that Negro kids don't know how to respect white teachers. Wherever you go kids are going to act like this. Maybe she felt funny teaching a class of all Negroes and not any whites.

GIRL No. 4: Well I think I would have felt the same way had I been in her place. At least some will try to show her we're bad, we don't need you. Negroes are prejudiced too, at least some are. Make her feel different. Nobody wants to feel that way, you know. She is going to think she is different, and she is different. She would think she had a special reason for leaving. I think I would have left too.

GIRL No. 1: Why did she come? She should have gone. Children are going to be children, and they will act like this! I guess it's just the way the teacher has to handle the class. Maybe the way she presents her work. If you send down a Negro teacher to an all-white school, or an integrated school, you send your best Negro teacher and if you send a white teacher to an all Negro school, you send your best white teacher. I don't think that she was their best. If she couldn't cope with the students like the Negro teacher can, she wasn't that good. I heard that she sat around in her chair all of the time. You know most teachers walk around in a classroom. She would still have to discipline her class. If she just didn't make it seem like "I'm white." She wasn't their best teacher. They should have sent one of their better white teachers and it would have worked out.

GIRL No. 3: There is just one thing I would like to say. . . . We have a lot of dumb people in our class . . . you know, dumb, white people. (LAUGHTER) It's true! They want to graduate, but they don't want to do anything. I noticed this before. I was absent a lot and I was behind, had a lot of back work to do in order to catch up. There was one time I didn't finish my short stories. I had seventeen and I turned in sixteen. I noticed that she didn't give me credit but for the sixteen. I know that there are some white kids . . . well this one boy, he never does his homework, he doesn't even bring books to class. He could get an "I" and he can make it up. It should be the same for all. The teacher would always say, "Did you understand it?" and he would say, "No, I didn't." She would say, "Well, see me after class and bring it in later at the sixth period." He is just far behind and yet, he is going to graduate. It's the same way with another girl.

GIRL No. 1: I guess they expect a lot from you. I kind of noticed that when they are in class they don't recite and can't answer questions right. The majority of the white kids in our classroom have a don't-carish attitude. They say I don't care about school. Maybe they feel that they are going to graduate without much trouble anyway, they'll get a passing grade and it seems that they aren't going to college. Probably they are going to get married so it doesn't really matter just so long as "I get my degree."

BOY No. 1: Last night the superintendent, myself, and the coach were discussing this attitude that was in the school and it seems to be the problem with the team. These kids seem to have the idea that if they can't win, they don't care. Coach was saying that actually they don't care and that in home games, this attitude was prevalent in the parents and it rubs off on the kids. It's been like this since she has been here, the white people act like they don't care. They have never been together and they just have an "I don't care" attitude.

BOY NO. 2: What about the boy who comes to class unprepared and has no excuse, does exactly nothing and the teacher asks him why he doesn't have his work? And he answers, "I was sick," "I had to work" or "go to band practice." And she says bring it in tomorrow. Tomorrow comes, then the next tomorrow—all day—and then he still doesn't turn it in. And actually he doesn't do anything in class but yet, he could be making good grades. She is actually giving him grades. She is just doing it, just to pass him. He thinks, I am doing you a favor just by coming to school when he actually isn't doing anyone any good because the time she takes up with him trying to explain things to him, he is actually hindering everybody instead of trying to help them because he actually does nothing in the classroom. He just sits there occupying space. That's all he is doing.

GIRL NO. 1: If he doesn't graduate I think maybe he will go into the armed services. If he doesn't graduate he is not coming back to school another year. He just doesn't care.

QUESTION: What are you people going to do after you finish classes, when you finish high school?

BOY NO. 1: Our plans after we graduate from school . . . I think all of us plan to go to college.

BOY NO. 2: The white kids always talk about getting married or joining the armed services, so I asked one what he is going to do when he gets out of the armed services. He tells me he is going to get a job somewhere. I say get a job doing what? I try to tell him that the world is becoming more mechanized day by day; I mean it's going to be hard to make a living. He tells me that he is going to do this and he is going to do that. I say he's going to be lost. But he says he can find something and I try to tell him that it's not going to work. Then he thinks I am being uppity and all this, so he gets mad and walks off.

GIRL NO. 1: Oh, I think most kids feel that college isn't for everyone—which is true, and that some people are better off in trade school, better off married, some are better off lost.

GIRL NO. 4: In our English class, I believe it was at the end of the semester, our teacher divided the class into two groups—the group that was planning to go to college and the group that was not. And it seems to me that the majority of the kids, well, the kids in college preparatory groups are the ones that have a closer relationship than the ones in the other group. I feel that, they don't have anything to say to the other group. I mean, this was before the division was made as well as now. There is only one girl in the non-college group and the other girls are in the college prep group. This seems to have some relationship to the atmosphere in our class.

QUESTION: You said not many of you were friendly with the white kids after school, I'm wondering if you are friendly with each other?

BOY NO. 1: Yes!! That's all we can do. We have to talk to somebody, so we just have to talk to each other.

GIRL NO. 1: One thing we have different in the white school, we don't have dances. Our main activity should be the high school. The white kids have to go outside and maybe that's why they are not more together. You see, we can go to the other school.

QUESTION: Suppose you were approached and asked for suggestions about going to a white school? What would you tell them?

GIRL NO. 1: I would say that there are really no activities, you should be willing to take the insults they sometimes make, and you won't really be accepted as best friends all the time because sometimes that's not true. But I realize that myself.

BOY NO. 2: I would tell them to be prepared for a change because it's a great change from the other school to this high school and don't form any opinions about the school. Just come and more or less observe. One thing is the change in social atmosphere. I mean that you can joke around, just more freedom. But down here, sometimes you can say things here and you don't mean it to be a particular insult but—you don't want to step on anybody's toes, so you just have to be careful of what you say and how you say it. Really, there's a strain. There also seems to be more homework here.

GIRL NO. 1: You see, there seems to be more activities to take up school periods and I find I talked to one of my old friends and they say that they are way behind in their books. It's just that we don't have so many activities. I think it's up to anyone to come and make their own suggestions because like I found people gave me advice and it was different advice that they gave me even though they weren't in the situation. I don't think I can because I am in the situation and right now if I were to give advice it'd be different from others in this room. I think that the only thing I could tell them would be to make up their minds to want to come and when they get here to be themselves and don't put on a big show. This is not to say you have to be different in order to get along with other people. It's not that way at all. You find that people judge you by your group without getting to know you at first. The Negro group is such and such. After that they get to know you as the individual as you are.

BOY NO. 2: Another thing about impressions, when I was down here a year ago I got the impression that they were trying to push me around and I was called a show-off. I was called this often and constantly. I got to the point where I believed it. So my first year down there I got the attitude, you know, that I don't care about this and that. Well, when I got down there I found out in a couple of months that it wasn't like this. But after I had practiced this for so long, then after I started changing myself it was difficult to change and I couldn't really start changing until this year. I lost quite a few friends that I really didn't mean to, because of my attitude last year. So far as giving people advice on what to do down there, I hardly know how to react myself in certain situations. I would tell them just don't and use your own discretion as far as possible. But I would not tell them, you know, especially, they did this and they did that to me, because this really proves to be a handicap and it's very hard to correct the mistake that you have gotten influenced beforehand.

GIRL NO. 2: I find that you should watch out for a couple of things. My advice is for you not to do things in class that would impress the teacher or impress the students—or maybe impress yourself. And that's one of the things you find later on, just do your job and don't try to impress anybody, and you will get a little better reaction, where you wouldn't try to impress anybody.

GIRL NO. 1: Well, I would like to offer a few suggestions—give them my reaction. Tell them what to expect and maybe some of the things I came in contact with may cause them to be separated and things like that. But they can use it or not.

QUESTION: Do people call you names to your face?

GIRL NO. 1: Yes, not regularly, but maybe after a person gets angry with you and they call you names every week or pass you by without speaking. This makes you angry.

GIRL NO. 2: It's not as much as it was before.

BOY NO. 2: You also get used to things written on the bathroom walls, a lot of stuff. But this is something you have to take. When you come to think about it, when kids call you a name you laugh and joke it off. When you get down there, it's a little different because it's white people.

GIRL NO. 2: I find myself, I don't think about it now. We call each other a nigger right off, y'know we joke about it. But you turn around and a white person call me a nigger I don't know how to take it. When the whites see Negroes calling each other nigger then they use it. So I catch myself and when I'm joking around in the halls I don't say it down there.

GIRL NO. 1: I had this white friend this summer. We were just talking about things, the school situation and stuff, and she asked me what did I think if she called me a nigger. I told her I'd be offended. So she said she could see this because where she went to school some of her friends call her a peck or a cracker and they laugh it off. But if I called her a name like that she'd be offended too.

BOY NO. 1: Well, I'd like to say this. I feel that we have given the wrong impression that our relationship with the white kids at the high school is entirely a hostile one. This is wrong although sometimes we talk that way. We have conversations and all and often the boys talk about girls. But the thing is that sometimes you may say something and you don't know who you can trust, even those who look like they're being sincere. You don't know whether you can trust them or if they'll say something behind your back.

GIRL NO. 2: All in all the situation is not bad. There always is a rotten apple but we expected this. Some people ask what it's like down there and they expect me to say it's tough and mean. But it's not like that at all. It's nice, considering the situation. Things are better than they were last year.

QUESTION: Have any of you had any of your white classmates to your homes, or have you gone to any of theirs?

BOY NO. 1: I've been to the front door. (LAUGHTER) When I invited one over he was cautious about it. I had four or five over on some business to check on some studies. After the first visit the ice was broken and some of them came by again. And once he was cautious about going into the house. I said, "C'mon, nobody else will know." (LAUGHTER) I got him into the house and we had a good time. He came by once on a friendly visit, and they stay outside sometimes and blow their horns.

GIRL NO. 2: One day this girl took me home and when we got there she just sat in the car and I said, "If you want to come in, come in." She said, "Sure." She walked in through the house and looked into every room. So I took her around and told her this was the living room, and this was the kitchen, and this was the bedroom and so on. She just looked and stared. She said, "Your house is really nice," in a surprised tone. I said, "Thank you." There was another girl who associated with us last year when things were pretty hot. Sometime later I saw her in school and she said she wanted to come over but it was hard. I invited her and didn't tell anybody. So she came and we talked and joked. She brought all her brothers and everything.

BOY NO. 1: A lot of them were surprised to find that I lived in a better house than they did. I almost got into a fight one day over this visiting bit. I asked _____ about would he invite me over for a visit. He said, "No!" And I asked, "Why not?" He said, "Going to school is okay, but that's the limit." I said, "What do you mean?" At first I was joking around because I didn't expect him to invite me to his house. But I said, "I'll tell you what I'll do. I'll come over and pretend like I'm cutting the hedges and I'll go around the back and come in the back door." (LAUGHTER) Well, we got serious about it and he said he just couldn't invite me to his house. So I said, "Well, I invite you to come to my house anytime you want." He said, "I won't do that either." And I said, "Well, why not?" He finally said, "Let's face it, a spade is a spade." I swear I almost hit him. I was mad. I stopped the conversation and walked away right there. If I had said anything else I would have hit him. Ooooh! (LAUGHTER)

GIRL NO. 2: You see, a lot of things start off joking around and digging about race and stuff and then it suddenly gets serious. They sometimes do things just to see my reactions; and I try to keep them to myself. They once in a while come up behind me and say, "Boo! I'm a segregationist."

BOY NO. 1: I think actually some of them are trying to make fools of us. They make a joke out of race and are grinning and laughing at us. It's not a joke. But I don't get sucked in, I know what it is. I go along, because I go out of my way to make somebody happy. But I tell them, I know what's going on and nobody's pulling the wool over me.

GIRL NO. 1: We were sitting in class one day and a boy said, "White for the right." I said, "What makes you say that?" He said, "Don't take me seriously. I'm only fooling." But he wasn't laughing or even smiling.

BOY NO. 1: Sometimes we come back from a weekend and talk about girls and stuff. Then we have a regular conversation. Then sometimes it goes back to joking about race like, "Hey, nigger boy, c'mere and shine my shoes." And then I joke right back.

GIRL NO. 2: One day in the school bus we were going on a trip. Most of us got in the front and the white kids were in the back. And someone said, "Hey, isn't it supposed to be the other way around?"

GIRL NO. 1: Then some of them really express how they feel, and they don't hide it from us. I like them better because you know what to expect from them. Like there's one boy, he'll tell you he likes the governor and believes in the governor. He says it in a joking way but he means it. He's telling the truth and you know what to expect from him.

GIRL NO. 3: There's a problem when you talk about the society again. I have a close white friend. She was in camp with me, and camp is different y'know; we were tight together there. I was thinking of inviting her down here but I can't because our society wouldn't accept her here. And I can't go to her society because she lives with white folks . . . I guess that's right because she is white folk. (LAUGHTER) You have to be in an area where you can be accepted together. It's not like that down here. That's what's wrong, and it'll take time, a long time, to change.

Reflections on School Integration: II.

(This is a transcript of an hour and one-half session with seven Negro youngsters who desegregated and are attending a predominantly white school in the Deep South. All students are in the ninth through twelfth grades. 8/66)

QUESTION: Who made the decision for you to go to a white school and how was it made? What were the first days like?

GIRL NO. 1: Well, last year we got these applications to fill out, it was a freedom of choice thing, and you chose the school that you wanted to go to the next year. I chose to go because I felt that I could get a better education here. I knew that the school that I was then attending wasn't giving me exactly what I should have had. We needed more materials and things there that we didn't have. As far as the Science Department was concerned, it just didn't have the chemicals we needed and I just decided to change. When I went over the students there weren't very friendly and when I graduated they still weren't. They didn't want us there and they made that plain, but we went there anyway and we stuck it out. The lessons there were harder, lots harder, but I studied and I managed to pass all my subjects. I had the most trouble in Physical Education, that's where we'd play games. They'd get dirty in the games and try to hurt us. I was outside one day, as a typical example; we were playing and the teacher had gone inside. The boys started calling names and I tried to ignore them, I had been instructed to do so by my parents. I tried to ignore them, but you know there's only so much you can take. So when they called me nigger or black nigger, well I just called them yellow nigger or something back. And that just leads from one word to another and pretty soon we had a pretty heated argument started and, you know, I just tried to forget it, just forget that they were talking, ignore them again. That's when they started throwing green pecans, they were on the trees there. I reported it to the teacher and she acted as if it wasn't anything. I went and reported it to the principal and he said, like the Governor said a long time ago, "Do it like you do it with mud, you let it dry and it will shake off better." He always had some slogan like this to say to us. I would always get into a lot of trouble in P.E. but I don't think that I would get into the trouble really, the trouble would come to me. They'd always start something, throwing something at me, or calling me names. In Physical Education, I was the only Negro in their class. It was a class of three grades, kids out of the tenth, eleventh and twelfth grades. And everytime I reported something to the teacher she acted as if it wasn't anything, so then I just started hitting them back if they hit me. One day this girl and I started throwing books, she hit me with a book and I picked it up and I hit her back, then she threw a purse and I picked it up and threw it back, and everything she threw I hit it back. Then the next thing the P.E. teacher heard about it and called us into the shower room, and I don't think this other girl liked that. So we went into the shower room and she talked to us and she told me that I brought a lot of these things on myself and she talked as if it was my fault that the girl hit me. Well, I told her that I didn't think it was my fault. She got real angry with me that day and at the end of that six week period I had a D. I got a D. in P.E., the easiest subject there was; when I got an A in Biology for the same six weeks, and B in Chemistry and like this.

GIRL No. 2: One of our worst problems was the lunch system. Our cooks were very rough; I would go through the lunch line and they would fix my food up sloppy. We reported this to some of the people in the community and they talked with the principal about it. One of my other problems was that my history teacher would call on me to read mostly all the time, and because I couldn't read very well the children would laugh. Everytime I would call on someone to read the class would laugh. The teacher would go out of the class almost everyday so the kids could call on me and have fun on me. One of the other problems was my English teacher; he would make jokes up about me and some of the other students said that he made jokes up about them. I decided to go because I had no experience with going to school with white children before and a few of my friends were doing it so I decided I would too.

GIRL No. 3: I made my decision to go for one main reason, even though I was kind of popular at my old school. Most of the children who were valedictorian or salutatorian at the old school went to college. They had to study very hard and some of them couldn't even pass their entrance examination. I decided I wanted to go to college after I finished high school, so what I wanted to do was go to a school so I could get the proper education so when I went to college I wouldn't be embarrassed by my fellow students who thought I was so smart. That was the reason I made this decision to go to a white school and I think that is my main reason for going. After I got there I wasn't a bit surprised at the attitude of the students there because it had been said before that these kids are absolutely wild. They wouldn't listen to the principal and wouldn't mind the teachers and I wasn't a bit surprised. I was kind of prepared for some of the incidents that happened. Really, I didn't know how I would take being called a Nigger because I had never been called a Nigger before. I just didn't know how I would take it. I couldn't tell anybody I wouldn't hit anybody when they called me Nigger. But after I got over there and had been called a Nigger about a thousand times during the first six-week period I'd feel a burning inside, and after the third six-week period I'd get over this burning inside, but really a Nigger still seems kind of like insulting to me. Anyway I got over being called a Nigger but I didn't get over being hit with paper. I just couldn't take that. I had one very mild and calm teacher. Well one reason I say this was he didn't want me to tell him anything out loud and I had to be sure to go back and whisper to him if I was telling him anything about the students. One day I had to call him and tell him the students were hitting me with paper and but he didn't hear, so I called to him louder and he answered, but he still didn't make any mention of the kids throwing paper. I also heard that all the children had to do was get used to you and they would get better, but toward the end of the school term instead of getting better they were getting worse. I would say that the reason for this was because at the beginning of the school term the principal was really rough and tight on them but he began to slack up on them and they began to get like they were the year before. Well, we went to the graduation and there were incidents at the graduation, and it was just like the students said. The principal wouldn't take anything serious; everything would go so calm with him. He would make some joke about it or have some kind of slogan or motto to make about every incident. My sister was in that one incident and we went to the office and I think that was pretty serious, blood on the coats and shirts and everything and he took it so calmly. He told us that everything would pass over easy, well, we just could leave it there. Well, we could see that he wanted to rest there, because he said that that would be the end of it. But later he decided he wanted to go further because he called the superintendent's office, but he didn't know who was in the superintendent's office and that's why he got into it, because some men from Washington were down asking questions and going on and they came right over to the situation. But, in all, I think I got what I was going there for, even if it was only for one year. I think if I was sent back to school this year I don't think it would do any good because what I wanted to go there for would be the whole three years, tenth, eleventh, and twelfth grades. I think that's the only way it would help me in college. I did get a great deal of what I was going for. The lessons are harder, especially our English and Literature. The school is better than the old school, for instance, the library and the typing room. They have more typewriters and more books in the library; you could double it from the school we went to before. In the home economics classroom they have more machines; and this is another place that we found that we were discriminated against. Our home economics teacher would have the new machines on one side of the room and the old on the other side, and would put us into groups to let us use the old machines and the white girls use the new ones. And in cooking she would always give out the recipes and stuff and we would always get the small amount. And she would separate us into three groups so that the three Negro girls were in the same group together. In the lunch room we had trouble also. Near the end of the school term a girl's plate was shattered with something a boy threw in it. The principal just looked at that and I think just passed it over. Anyway it was a great experience for me and I think all the other children that went.

GIRL NO. 4: Well, I decided to go because I figured that I could get a better education there and there would be better facilities for me than at the other school I went to. When I started it seemed as though it was going to be pretty nice. At least the first day the students and instructors were pretty friendly, but after about two weeks of school trouble began for me. The first of the week I just ignored everything as I had been instructed to do, but one day about the last of the week I was hit in my back by a rubber band. I turned around and I didn't see anything, everyone looked so innocent. There were two Negro girls sitting in back of me so I asked them "Who hit me?" and they told me the boy who hit me. I hit him back, and it went on. We were going to a pep rally, and the pep rally was pretty nasty, for me at least, because the students were throwing spit balls around, shooting rubber bands that would hit you in the back, and sailing airplanes in the bleachers. They were at the top of the bleachers and they would sail things down that would hit you in the back of the head and everything. The instructors were down there but they were acting like nothing was going on, so we just ignored it. I missed school on Monday because the busses that had been picking us up at our home had been stopped because of the man that lived next door to us. He owned the land and said the bus was travelling over his private property, so we didn't go to school because the bus didn't come for us. But Tuesday I was in school, and after lunch I was going to my class and one of the students shot me and hit me in my back with a rubber band, so I turned around and hit him back. I went to my classroom and approximately fifteen minutes after I got into the classroom the principal came and asked the instructor if he could speak to me. So after I went into the office I found that this boy that I hit was in the office too. The principal asked me if I hit this boy, and I said yes. Then he asked me why and I told him why — all the trouble that I had had with this boy in the beginning — and so he asked this boy had he had any trouble out of me. This boy said no, he had never seen me before. I knew that that was untrue because I was an unusual person over there, he would have noticed me before just because of the color of my skin and all. Another way I found out he was telling a story is that I had hit this boy back once before and then he still told the principal that he had never seen me before. So the principal told me that it was settled, and I went back to my classroom. The next day at school I was called out of my classroom during the first period and we went to the counseling room. They told me that they wanted to talk to me and wanted me to tell them what happened. So I told them and they wanted to know whether I was telling the truth. They also wanted to know whether I was being paid to do the things that I did — such as go to that school — and was I being informed by anyone to do those things. I told them no. They were also recording the things I said on a tape recorder. All the other Negro students were called in and they were taped too about this incident and asked if they knew about this boy hitting me and anything. Some of the students said no but they knew about them being hit themselves; well, they told them that that wasn't the point. And so they told me first period that it was settled, but third period I was called into the office again. I went into the office and the principal told me that I was suspended by him for five days and he said after that it was out of his hands, but it might be further suspended by the board of education. So after my five day suspension was up I thought I would come back to school, but I never did, not during that semester. As I was leaving the office there was a deputy standing there; as I started to go down the hall he said, "Hey," so I just kept on walking because my name wasn't hey. He said come and go with me for you are under arrest. I said for what. He said for assault and battery. I said who was the arrest made by and all and he told me. So I went along and stayed all night in jail; my parents tried to get me out but they failed; it wasn't possible for them to do so. At first they were not going to let my parents sign the bond, then they were going to let people who were eligible sign the bond. So my parents went home and they were back early next morning and they got me out of jail. I had to go on trial too so the lawyer that we got told us that we would have to go on trial. When the day of the trial came and we went into the courthouse, the counselor said that there wouldn't be any need of going through a trial since my main point was getting back into school. So they didn't have the trial and I thought I was going to get back into school pretty soon, and my mother kept trying to catch up with the superintendent. My mother made several trips to his office but never could get in touch with the superintendent to find out when I was going to go back to school. He never was there, and she also make an appointment but he wasn't there at the time of the appointment. So by this time it was near the end of November, I think, the first of December, when a man from Washington came and interviewed me. He told me that I would get back to school pretty soon and I was informed by the superintendent of the school that I could come back in school in January. He said there wouldn't be any need of me coming in the first semester because I wouldn't get any grades for it. So I started school January 3rd and tension was high there. The students were still yelling and everything and some of the instructors were pretty nasty but some of them were pretty nice. This typing instructor was real bad. When my books would be misplaced or put in the trash can and I would ask her about them she would say you should keep them in your own place, I'm not responsible for them. I couldn't even turn my back and some of my books were missing and moved. I'd have to go around the room and she doesn't even know anything about it. For an example, one day I was carrying my books to the room and I had to go out. When I came back my books were gone and my bag also. I didn't say anything, I asked her if I could go to the office. She said is it important and I said yes it is, and she said well what do you want. I said I want my books and she said oh, your books, I think they are in the trash can. She left the room before the class period was all done and I assumed that she had gone to the office, because by the time the bell sounded and I went to the principal's office the principal was already informed about what happened. He said you'll just have to ignore those things, the best way to solve the problem is to ignore those things. That was his usual saying. So, some more incidents that I had in typing was that everytime I would come in the room the typewriter would have a staple in the machine or my desk would have powder from the eraser. I went back to the principal and he must have called the instructor about it because it didn't happen any more. Another incident I had after I got back in school was a terrible fight I had. I was getting off the bus and one of the guys hit me in the face and of course I got off the bus behind him and he just turned, that's what he said. But he later changed it and said that I pushed him and so that's why he hit me. I went into the office myself, and the principal had to send for this boy. When he got into the office he acted like he still wanted to fight me and wanted to jump on me then. The principal had to talk to him and then sent him out for a few minutes to get control of himself but I still was in the office telling him what happened. When this boy came back he told his side of the story and the principal asked him what he called me. He told him he wouldn't like to repeat what he said so the principal told him that he knew what he said anyway. Well, I wanted to call my mother but the principal insisted that I shouldn't call my mother because he didn't want any trouble aroused. If it was, he said, it probably would be in Washington by tomorrow that I called my mother. I said I still wanted to call my mother because the first time that I got in trouble things were done over her head and she didn't know anything about it. I said that I just insist that I call my mother. He said no don't call her so I didn't call my mother. So about third period the superintendent and two men from Washington were there and they interviewed all of us and asked what had happened. So this time both of the students were suspended for three days. Those were about the worse incidents that I had, after that I still decided that I would go back because it had been a great experience.

Boy No. 1: Well, when they gave out the choice to decide on which school you would go to I decided I would go because I would get a better education. When school opened a group of us went over there into the auditorium and we stayed in there for a while until they made out the forms and things for which class we were going to go to. Our teacher was always calling on us when we wouldn't have our hands up, and when we did have our hands up she wouldn't call on us, when we'd take them down that's when she would call on us. And then one morning in our first period class, my friend was at his desk, and she called him up in front of the class, trying to embarrass him. He had soap on his face that couldn't come off good and she told him that he had soap on his face and that he hadn't washed his face. Well they'd make remarks about him and laugh at him. And then he went and took his seat. And when we'd be in P.E. class the coach wouldn't be there, he had boys lead the class. We would be playing football. Every day they'd tell the boys to try to hurt us and knock us down and they would do it. One of them would pretend to act nice and tell them not to do it, but he didn't mean it anyway and this other one would tell them to keep on. So one day, we was playing football and this one boy hit me and I hit him back and then I wouldn't play football no more that day. I told him that I wanted to go see the coach and he told me to run five laps around, and I ran five laps, and then he took me to the coach's office. He wasn't in so he told me to come back and run the rest of the period and I wouldn't run. He told me that if I didn't run he was going to whup me and I told him he wasn't going to whup me and I wasn't going to run. The period was nearly up then so we changed classes and he told me to come back the next day. So I went back the next day and then he asked me what I had to tell him. I told him that I didn't have nothing to tell him today since he didn't want to listen to what I had to say yesterday. So then when my card came up I had an F in P.E.

BOY NO. 2: Well, I thought I would get a better education here and learn more. The first day I went here and I had trouble with the teachers. She would call on me all the time and when I wouldn't be ready she would call on me. Like if I had a test or something, six week test or something like that, she would get some of the dumbest children to grade my paper and they would put anything down. And when the children made a mistake she said that she couldn't do anything about it, so I just left them alone until the next day. They kept giving me F's on my paper when I made a B or something like that, so I went and told the principal. He said that he had to look into it, so he looked into it and told the teacher that from now on she's suppose to grade the paper. And then another problem I had was when I was going to the lunch room after I got my arm broken playing P.E. You see my arm was broken and I couldn't pick up nothing with one hand. When she gave me something I didn't want she'd say get what I give you and go ahead on. And when I see the white kids get in they say to her that they don't want that and she doesn't give it to them. When I sit down, sometimes I would be the only one in there and they'd throw cups and everything. Once when I was with a group of other Negroes someone threw something in a girl's plate next to me and I went and told the principal. He stood up and that next afternoon those boys who I told on trailed me all the way home and stopped me and asked me why I told on their friend. I said because I wanted to and they pulled out a knife and said if you tell again we gonna cut your neck off, and then I just went off. And then the next day they started saying that's the nigger that I'm going to cut his head off and all that. I went and told the principal and he said there was nothing he could do about it. Everyday when I come home they follow me and try to run me off the road or something like that.

GIRL NO. 5: I went because I knew that the curriculum was greater and they had more equipment and better facilities. When I first went I had trouble with Physical Ed; I was the only Negro in that class because I was the only Negro in my grade. When I was playing, the teacher, the coach would tell the P.E. instructor that he would let the boys play with the girls. We were playing bombard, and all the boys said they must all try and get the nigger. They would throw the ball and always hit me, so next time I said I wasn't going to play. I went back and sat down on the bleachers and the teacher said for me to go back out there and play. I said that I wasn't going to play because they kept hitting me with the ball too hard. She said that they weren't hitting me any harder than they were hitting the white children. So I went back out there and played and the next thing this white girl hit me real bad. And when we first started school we didn't have a bus to ride, so we had to walk, and my brother would take me in his car. Then his car stopped working then and we had to walk home. And this one evening some boys followed us home and he tried to run over one of my sisters. We told the principal the next day and he said that he couldn't do anything about it. And when we were walking home my mother picked me up and she called these Washington people and they came down and he told me to write a report on it and send it to Washington. I told them about everything but my letter didn't get to Washington because people in the post office did something to it. When these men came back they asked me why I didn't write to them and I told them I did, but they said that they didn't get my letter. I guess they went to the post office and checked on it. They would hold up a lot of our mail and it would never get to us. One day I was walking down the hall and this boy shot me in the back with a rubber band. I went to the office and told the principal. He asked me who did it, and I said that there were lots of kids walking behind me and I didn't know. He said that there wasn't anything he could do about it. When we went to court and I had to testify about this girl who stuck this boy with a pencil, I told him that I didn't know anything about that but that they had shot me. He said he didn't ask me about that and he had asked me about this girl and this other boy. And one day I was the only person in my class and this boy threw a pencil and it hit me. This policeman's boy was picking up these pencils and crayons and handing it to this boy. He threw and he hit me and I told the teacher. She asked me if it hurt and I said no, but this boy shouldn't have hit me with it anyway. She said well, just forget about it then. When I was going to study hall this boy was throwing rocks at me and this other girl. This Negro girl was already in the study hall and they locked me out of the class and she couldn't open the door. When we got in there they started throwing rocks and crayons at us. I told the teacher and she went back there, and they all started laughing, and she was laughing with them. And then they went outside and they brought more rocks and they started throwing them.

QUESTION: Are the teachers at your new school any different, any better or worse, than at your old school?

GIRL NO. 5: I think the teachers at the new school are worse than the ones at the Negro school because they don't give you exactly what you make. At the Negro school they don't give you exactly what you make either, but they're worse here. If you make a good grade they'll give you a bad grade and if you make a bad grade then they still give it to you. But they also make it lower and they don't treat you equally. When something happens they put it all on us and they don't do anything about it. They do stay in their room longer but when something happens they still don't know about it because they don't try to find out about anything. At the old school the teachers stayed out of the room more, but still if you tell them about something they do something about it. But here they just don't treat us equally because we are Negroes and the other children are white.

GIRL NO. 1: Well, I don't know what teachers are the best but I know the teachers over at the old school, some of them, do the best of their ability. They teach us what they can, some of them, and the white teachers over here are better educated and they have better ability to teach us than some of the Negro teachers. That's the only way that I can say that the teachers are better at the white school than at the Negro school. The grading system was that if you make a high grade, like if you made an A you would get an A. But over here you would get a B, and if you made a B you might get a D minus or an F. I know in one class that I thought I got a B and this one teacher always gave me C's, and I improved in my class but still the highest mark in that class was a C minus.

BOY NO. 2: Well, I think the teachers are worse here because they don't give you what you make. When you have a test one teacher gives some of the students your paper to grade and then she would go over it and she would take off for spelling. I had a teacher who was real nice; she helped you out with your lesson and if they was bothering you she would make them stop and punish them. She would give you what you make, and if you didn't make it then she would help you out and give you a few points to make you pass.

GIRL NO. 4: I think the teachers at the white school are better than the ones at the Negro school because they teach you better and they do stay in the classroom.

GIRL NO. 5: I think its hard to say which teachers are better because teachers here and at the old school both have their bad points. For that matter at any Negro or white school they all have some good points and some bad points. The teachers at the Negro school could teach more than they do, but like it has been said, they don't spend enough time in their classroom. When they do they're not teaching a lot of the time. They're often doing their monthly report instead of teaching us. And as far as incidents are concerned here, if something happens in the classroom most time it goes unnoticed unless the white students get the worse end of it. But at the old school incidents are always given the best consideration and both parties usually go to the office and get it settled. But the teachers at the white school see it different, and only the Negroes go to the office if the white person gets hurt bad enough to report it.

GIRL NO. 3: It is kind of hard to compare the teachers at the school because each has their bad points. I think at the old school the teachers would do better if they'd get more education and more facilities and equipment to work with. They don't have these things and just don't care. I think that they would prefer to be in the lounge. And at the white school they do stay in the room more. I had a few just teachers over here, about two, that would give you just what you make. They really were better teachers, especially, as I said before, in English; they had more materials because they would send out for these work books and they could explain the lessons better than the Negro teachers. But as far as their personalities was concerned the teachers at the old school were the best and I think everybody should know that and the reason for that. But there are some things that can improve at the Negro school I went to, because I think they'd do better if the teachers had stricter rules they would go by. But at this school now we went a great deal further in our books than we did in the former Negro school I went to.

QUESTION: How did the Negro community react to your going to a previously all-white school?

GIRL NO. 2: I think the Negro people in our community gave us quite a deal of encouragement because when our house was bombed they really went in and helped us a great deal. But I guess you can see there the whites' attitude from our house getting bombed; they weren't too cooperative in our going to the white school. But the Negro people were really cooperative because when we had problems in school they got a civic leader and went together and formed this committee to go and see the principal at school about some incidents that happened in the lunch room and that really improved.

GIRL NO. 4: Well, the Negro people in my home community didn't seem as if they were at all for it. They would say that we aren't ready to be with the white people yet; we should stay and try and get ourselves together first before we try and get with somebody else; integrate the Negro first is what they were saying. But here in this town there were a lot of people who gave me a lot of encouragement and the encouragement enabled me to go on and graduate and be the first Negro girl to graduate from a previously all-white school. They were very nice to me because I had a very hard time getting to school and I had to catch ways of getting to school. The people in this community drove me to school and then I could catch the Negro school's bus back. But in my community they weren't at all for it, and now that I've graduated they still say I don't see any good that you've done, any reason why you went there. Talking about my graduation, everything inside went fine but after I stepped out the door after the line marched out somebody hit me with a raw egg and the egg slid down my gown. I didn't know what to do then. I didn't want to run because they would say that I was afraid but I should have, I just stood there. I just had to think and get myself together and then I walked around to the car and waited to meet my mother, but she got mixed up and went to the wrong door looking for me. So I went to the car and she saw what had happened so she, my father, and my aunt took the robe to the principal and the senior advisor and showed it to them so they couldn't say that I just said it happened. They saw what was on the robe and he said I sure do hate it that that happened, that's all he could say, the principal, we sure are sorry about that. Commencement exercises, well, things weren't too bad; a man from the Health, Education and Welfare Department in Washington drove me to the exercises. He was waiting at the door of my dressing room to get me, and he and my mother and this white lady who's working with group desegregation were waiting for me. I didn't have any trouble getting out of there.

GIRL NO. 1: The Negroes in my community didn't have too much to do with it but the whites would ask the older heads of the community who was the girl. I don't think that they ever found my house, but no one would tell them who it was. But they were picketing my uncle's house because that was where I caught the bus. My uncle stays at the end of the road from my house, and my house is sort of back up in the hills. That's why they never found my house. And the whites would watch the bus every morning when I went to school, and this man who runs the store, he would watch the bus every morning and I would turn my head so he couldn't see me.

BOY NO. 1: Well, in my community the people was all for me going to the white school, but in other parts of town they would say we shouldn't be going over there and they would be frightened to send their children because they would be afraid that their house would get burned, or bombed, or either they would hurt their children. So they wouldn't send them over there. But even though in my community they was all for me going, only a few still sent their children to the white school.

GIRL NO. 2: Well, in comparing the opinions of the two races the Negroes in my community gave me a lot of encouragement but still they didn't want to send their children. They would want to wait until the barriers were broken down, and then I think they would send their children. But yet they thought it was nice that I was going and they hoped that I didn't have any trouble. That was in the community where I stayed, but the people in the city and around here gave me a lot of encouragement and also helped and also tried to do things like having us get to school and helping us solve problems that arose. The white people, well, they stopped speaking and just looked at you real hard and they didn't say anything. And as I said we had hard stares and they stopped speaking to us, like we had committed a crime, I guess.

BOY NO. 2: Well the colored people in my community, well some of the colored anyway, the Uncle Toms, would tell me to stay in my place and they weren't going to sit near us over there and get throwed at and called Nigger. The white people would pass by at night and throw bombs like the fourth of July. One time a carload of white people passed by and throwed a cherry bomb up on the house and this scared us.

GIRL NO. 5: Well, people in my neighborhood didn't like my going cause they said that I was just trying to be popular and the white school wasn't any better than the Negro school. They said that the Negro was the newest school. They said that our house was going to be burned and the Ku Klux Klan was going to get us and lots of people was going to get killed. They wasn't going and didn't want those people coming in their neighborhood. Our house did get burned, and when it did people said that's what I told you was going to happen. And when I'd come home from school the children would come up to me and ask me, well, who did you get into a fight with today? What white girl did you beat up? And who's your white boyfriend? They never did try to help us, all they did was try to get funny. They would ask well, who rode the Negro bus yesterday, you just ride your white bus and stay off our bus. There aren't many more people going to the white school this year, and there's only two going; the others stayed up at the Negro school.

GIRL NO. 1: The only trouble we were having was the first day the bus brought us home. Our mother carried us to school that morning but the bus brought us back that afternoon. The next week this man in front of us told us that he didn't want the bus coming over on his property even though the Negro bus had been coming over it for two years and he hadn't mentioned it. He said this bus, because it was supposed to be a white bus, was destroying his land. So we had to meet the bus out the road after that, it was about a mile and a half out there. We had quite a few incidents on the bus, like throwing paper. We sat in the front of the bus because he said we would be more protected because we would be sitting closer to the bus driver and it would be safer for us to sit in the front seat. But I think that was just another disadvantage because we couldn't see behind us and we was just a target up there in front. The bus driver couldn't keep his eyes in the mirror all the time because he had to watch the road. He was a nice bus driver and everything but he was quite nervous, and when he got mad he really got nervous, and he would drive all across the road. But he was real good and tried to help us solve our problems, because he carried some of the children to the office. After the white children get off we was just afraid and we was just the first ones that got on. It kind of improved from the first term on the bus, it kind of improved.

GIRL NO. 4: Well, at the beginning of the school year the bus driver was an old white friend of my family and he was very nice, but some of the white kids made a report that he couldn't control the children. So they took him off and they put a horrible bus driver on.

QUESTION: How was he horrible?

GIRL NO. 4: Well, she never did bother the kids when they bothered me but she just would say that she wished that these Niggers would get a bus of their own or something like that.

GIRL NO. 1: Well, the first day of school I rode the formerly all-white bus and it wasn't any trouble at all for me. Well, in about two weeks we had to walk to the road because the bus was transporting over private property. The Negro bus had been going over it for two years and I don't see how the white bus could have been doing any more damage to the property than the Negro bus, unless it, the reason it was doing damage, was that it was better than the Negro bus. So in other words, we had to walk to the road. They stopped both busses and we had to walk to the road and ride it.

QUESTION: Do you trust white people more or less now that you've been to school with them?

GIRL NO. 5: Well, I trust white people less now because you can never tell about them. They try and act friendly but when they get behind your back they'll start talking and they'll stretch everything you said farther and they'll add more to it and they'll take it around until it gets to their parents. Then the parents will take it to their friends and their friends might be Ku Klux Klan. You can't hardly say much to the white students because they are slick and sly and you can't hardly trust them.

BOY No. 2: Well, I don't trust white people either because you may think that they are being friendly but come to think of it they are not. In other words, when you get around them they'll be friendly, but if a white person is with me and then we see a group of other white people and they see him with me, they will call him a Nigger lover. So you be thinking that he'd be a friend and the white people get mad; so he just quit being friends. Sometimes he'd be friendly and sometimes he won't.

GIRL No. 4: Well, I trust white people less, because since I've been around them I am more familiar with them and their ways. The only thing I knew about white people was when they came around they would be friendly and all that. When I started school some of those people who I thought would be friendly looked like they were my worst enemies. Everytime they smiled in your face they were just trying to get some information, that's all, and when they get that they are gone and they are just like any other white person. Therefore, I trust them less.

BOY No. 1: Well, I don't trust white people at all, because they'll pretend that they are your friend and when you turn your back then they'll hit you and call you some silly name. They'll turn their back and pretend that they don't know nothing about it.

GIRL No. 1: I trust white people less because there was this white lady that my mother knew and she had promised to send my sister to college, but after I attended the white school she wouldn't have anything to do with my mother.

GIRL No. 2: Well, I trust white people less now than I did before and it's just that you can't be sure about them. You can't be sure where you stand with them ever. Some of them will smile in your face, and some of them really mean it, I think, but they don't want any other white person seeing them talk to you because they are afraid that they'll be called Nigger lover or something. Then, too, there are very few Negroes now that you can trust.

GIRL No. 3: Well, I don't know whether I'd trust them less or more than I did before because the white people in our community wasn't really close with us but you really found out what the white people's attitude was by going to school with them. I don't trust too many white people and I don't think that they trust me either. For instance, I don't say anything to them. Like this teacher asked me one question but to get the whole information she had to ask me five more and that really made her mad with me. I wouldn't tell them anything but yes and no and sometimes not that. But you really know how to act more intelligent around a white person if you are with them every day. I think some Negroes just get excited when they are around a white and they laugh in his face, and at his little funny jokes, and at what he says. He can give you the twinkle in his eye so that it makes Negroes go crazy. Well, I think you really find out when you go to a white school that when I see one do that it makes me mad instead of friendly. I know that now I get madder quicker with a white person since I went to this school. You really find out his attitude; you know that he didn't mean anything he says because he smiles at you one minute and he's ready to cut your neck off the next. So it really makes you mad when you really find out about him. They really try to take advantage of you with their smiles and their funny words, they really try to take advantage of you.

QUESTION: Are the white kids in your classes as smart as you thought they were?

GIRL NO. 3: On that question, I was really surprised as I went to the white school. They say, "Oh, the Negroes are so dumb," but I really found out that the Negroes are not really dumb at all. If they really had the chance and opportunities they would be a lot smarter than the white children because the white children who went to that school ever since the first grade I had caught up with in the first six weeks I went there. Now I was kind of backward on some subjects, like math, because the only time I took that I was in seventh grade and I had a hard time with math. But in all my other subjects I caught up with most of the white children and passed them in the first six weeks. And I was so surprised with the white children that made F's, and they would be thinking that the teachers were so hard. Most of the children hated my English teacher because she was hard and I think a great many more white children made F's than I did. They really get hot with you when you get ahead of them and I really had lots of trouble with that because I was smarter than most of them, most of the other children in my room, especially in the tenth grade. I don't know about other grades, but I do feel that the white race is not smarter than the Negro. If the Negro kids had the opportunity and would get down to it and work for it the Negro race could get up with the white race any time.

GIRL NO. 1: Well, before I went to the white school I always did think that the white person was smarter than we were. I used to think that they were just born smarter, just because they were white, but I found out this year that this isn't true. There were a lot of them who had more trouble than I had in getting their lesson and they had been in this school and in this situation, maybe not in the same situation, but they had been around their friends and their teachers for eleven years before then. Some of them couldn't do half as good as I could, and I don't see how some of them even graduated. They failed some subject and took an extra subject, and make D's in that subject and they still passed. I just don't understand it. I think that may be the reason we think that we aren't as smart as they are because they've made us feel like we don't know anything.

GIRL NO. 4: I feel that they made us feel that we don't know anything because they always keep us in the kitchen or on the yard or on the farms.

They never have made us feel like we should be anything; never made me feel like anything.

GIRL No. 4: Before I went to the white school I had a feeling that white students were smarter than I; I don't know why, maybe I heard that white people are so smart. But after I went to school with them I learned that the white students really aren't as smart as we are. Comparing the chance that the Negro has had and the chance that the white has had they aren't as smart as the Negro. If the Negro had had the same opportunity as the white has had I would say that they would be smarter than the white. But as it stands the Negro is just as smart as the white if he really gets right down to it.

QUESTION: Why do you think it is that some white people don't want you to go to school with them?

GIRL No. 5: I think they don't want us over here because they have better equipment and they have more facilities and things and they know that we can catch on real fast. When we catch on then we can get better jobs and we will be up with them and maybe we'll pass them. Like they want us under them now and they want to be over us; later on in the future we might be over them and they'd be under us and they are afraid of that.

GIRL No. 1: Well I think it's just a deeply rooted custom in their bones that the Negroes are and should be under them. I guess when they brought our foreparents from Africa they just don't ever think we'd be compared with them. It's hard to get in their heads that the Negro will be equal to them one day.

GIRL No. 2: I think that the whites don't want us to be in school with them because they think or have read in the Bible that one day a black nation will rise up from the East and conquer the world. I think that they think that we might be that black nation. And I think that they think that we think we might be that black nation.

GIRL No. 4: The only reason that I can see is that they think that we will excell over them. They don't understand the Negro and naturally when you don't understand something you're afraid of it. They are afraid of us and don't want us with them. They're afraid of what we can do if we just get what they have—you know the opportunities they have, the facilities they have—just think what we could do.

GIRL No. 3: I think the whites don't want us at the white school because after we get through telling them all our business and doing everything that they want us to do, if we are not doing that then they don't understand it. And if we're not working in the kitchen or in the yard, and if we get up and want an education, well, they just don't understand this. They just won't know what else we'll be wanting to do after we get over here so they really don't want us over here to find out. They want us to stay in our place and they don't want us to get out of our place; they think our place is in their yard or their kitchen or something like that.

QUESTION: What do you think about Negro fellows being drafted to serve in the army in Vietnam?

GIRL NO. 3: Well, that is a confusing subject, but I know that the Negro is improving in the United States, he's getting more now than he has been getting, and I think that if a person is getting what he's supposed to, if he's being treated fairly, he's supposed to help defend his country. Say, for instance, if a parent is feeding a child in a house and is giving the child the correct amount of food and not neglecting it, the child should be able to help defend the household. He should help do the things around the household and obey his parents and I think that's the way it is with the Negro being drafted into the army. I wouldn't say it would have been fair a while back, but if the Negro really gets what he should in America, then he should help defend his country. On the same subject I think that they should give the Negro more than they are now. For instance they are helping the Vietnamese people and those people aren't even in America. They should spend all the money they are spending, as Senator Kennedy said, on the Negro people to help them improve their race. I do think that they should be giving them more than they are now.

GIRL NO. 1: I think that the Negro should be drafted into the army as well as the white man. I mean the Negro is living in this country and he's just beginning to get some of the things he's supposed to have and he should want to fight for his country. But that's not enough, because the Negro people have been behind for so long in this country that they should draft all the white people and let us catch up. (LAUGHTER)

GIRL NO. 3: Well, you have to look at it both ways. For a long time the Negro has been deprived of opportunities that should have been given to him a long time ago. If he couldn't go to a restaurant and eat here in America then he shouldn't go somewhere else and fight for his country. But if he's going to fight for his country then he should be able to eat where he wanted and sit anywhere he wanted. I think he should defend his country if it's necessary, but I think he should be defended in his country also before he goes to try and help defend people outside of his country.

BOY NO. 1: Well, I don't think the Negro should be drafted. The white people want to rule the world and I think they should go and draft all the white people if they want to rule the world.

GIRL NO. 5: I think that the Negro should be drafted into the army, because it's like when you go to school, you have to participate in the activities. The army is like activity and he should participate in it. He should because he's fighting for his country and if he don't fight then they might say that its not his country. He should go into the army and prove to them that it is his country. He should go and fight.

QUESTION: What kind of reactions do you think white teachers would get from predominantly Negro schools?

GIRL NO. 5: I think that if a white teacher went to the Negro school that we would have to give them the best courtesy. We would have to respect them, probably more than we did the colored people. I guess because the teacher would go back and say that we were ignorant, the principal would probably be saying that we would have to respect them and show our courtesy and show how intelligent we are because they go back and tell these other people. Probably if a colored teacher goes to the white school then they treat this teacher the same way.

BOY NO. 2: Well, if a white teacher came then they would have a great respect for them. They won't holler and they will be saying Yes Ma'am and all that and the place will be so quiet.

GIRL NO. 3: I think that if a white teacher would go to a Negro school they'd be accepted in a bundle of arms, because the Negroes so easily accept a white person. You know Negroes do accept white people quicker than white people accept Negroes. Look at the Negro as a whole, if they hadn't been affiliated with the white man they think they just won't get the white person to like them and they do just anything if they can get them to like them. That's why I think a white teacher would be accepted readily in a Negro school by most students.

GIRL NO. 1: I think a white teacher wouldn't be accepted with the students any more than any other instructor. It has been stated that Negroes don't know how to react to white people, but I think as the generation grows older and the students are more familiar with this racial problem that they would know how to react toward her. I think they would react toward her no more than any other teacher.

QUESTION: Do you see, or are you friendly with, your white classmates outside of school?

GIRL NO. 5: I received a telephone call when I went to school and this girl asked me to meet them in front of the school. When I went back to school I told the principal about it and they said she hadn't called, that it was somebody playing a joke. When I went to school in Physical Education class this girl wrote me a note and told me to come to a party. I didn't know where so I told her something and then this other girl wrote me a note and told me that they were telling stories, that they weren't having this party. I wouldn't invite a white person to my house unless I trusted them a lot because I wouldn't just invite anybody to my house. They could just be setting a trap by setting a bomb in the house or something, but if it was someone that I knew well and trusted a lot I would.

QUESTION: What are your plans after you finish high school?

GIRL NO. 1: Now that I have graduated I plan to enter college in September. I don't know as of yet what my major will be, I'll probably decide that in my second year.

GIRL NO. 3: When I finish high school I'm not sure what college I would go to, I'm not decided but I am decided on my career. I want to be a social worker, that's why I want to take up social work in college after I finish high school.

GIRL NO. 4: After I finish high school I would like to go to the white college and I would like to major in math and in science.

BOY NO. 2: After I finish high school I haven't decided which college I want to go to but I would like to major in Engineering.

GIRL NO. 1: I am definitely undecided on what I'd like to be but I have thought about being a social worker in and around the community after I finish school. Lately I've been thinking about the Peace Corps and working in foreign countries.

QUESTION: What do you think it will take for race relations to get better down here?

GIRL NO. 1: Well, what I think it would take to improve the condition is more students and integrated faculty and that most Negro students act like they know what they're doing. They should not be afraid and act like they're down to business and then the situation will improve.

GIRL NO. 5: I think to make school a better place I think it will take courageous Negro students and some large Negro boys that are big and that has lots of courage, and an integrated faculty, and that's about all I think it would take.

QUESTION: What do you think would happen if more Negro students went to the white school?

GIRL NO. 4: I think the situation would be better if more Negro students went because a lot of the students just pick on you because they think they can get by with it. I don't think a student would hit a Negro student if he thought somebody was behind him to give him just that much more. He wouldn't do it even if he thought somebody was behind him that would see him and tell the student who it was.

GIRL NO. 1: I think it would be better if more Negro students were at school because, like she said, they would be afraid to bother you if they knew somebody else was with you, if they knew somebody else was with you and on your side and would help you if you needed that help. But like it is now with so many whites, they can just pick on you and there are not enough Negroes to do them enough harm back.

QUESTION: Were you allowed to join any of the organizations this year?

GIRL NO. 1: When we got there they already had the cheering squad and the band picked out and they had been practicing during the summer. If you want to do anything you really got to start on it this year, you know sign up this year before and you get on it the next year.

GIRL NO. 3: Most of the clubs and organizations they have, most of the students were elected in these clubs and organizations and you know I wouldn't be nominated, not last year anyway. To go back to the question on changes down here I think that depends. Now some of them you can change by nonviolence but some of them you just going to show them that you're going to knock something out of them before they'll let you alone. It just depends on the kind of student it is.

GIRL NO. 1: Well, as before stated I think that depends; at first they have to try you and find out what kind of person you are and after they find out what type of person you is well then they will leave you alone. It doesn't matter whether it be violent or nonviolent after they find out what type of person you is.

GIRL NO. 3: Referring to Negro students going to white schools, if they want to play they can stay over at the Negro school, but if they want to make the grade they're going to work when they come. If they're ready to work then they can come but if they're ready to play on every football team every game that comes up and every dance, well then they can stay because they give you time to do it.

QUESTION: How have your Negro friends reacted? Have you gone back to see them at school?

GIRL NO. 1: Well, some of my friends made a lot of wise cracks like, you know, why don't you go over there and play with your little white boyfriend, are you talking to me, golly. But I don't think they really meant anything, if they were really my friends I'd think that they were, you know, just kidding. Most of them around my age were still nice to me, it was just the adults in my neighborhood that acted real snobbish and everything.

GIRL NO. 4: Well, from some of the people I got real encouraging words and that helped me to go on over. In some cases some of the old people that didn't know any better, they felt that we were out of our place. Some cases stated they felt that it was all right. "You can be the first to go on but I wouldn't want my child to go. I think it's nice that you're going and I hope you have a nice time and all."

GIRL NO. 5: Around my neighborhood my friends would call me "Cracker," and they would say "go on little white girl" and I would tell them that the color hadn't rubbed off me yet. They'd be telling me to go down the road and play with my white friends and asking me who I was going to the prom with, what white boy was taking me to the prom. And when they see a white boy up the road they'd say come up here and get your girlfriend, here she is and all that.

GIRL NO. 4: Everytime I get talking about my experience at the white school something happens to me. I can't really express myself and I can't really tell what happens. It's like I was kind of in a trance. I was just walking around from day to day and doing what I thought I was supposed to do and trying not to do what I wasn't supposed to do. As far as the things that I was studying, I won't know until this year after I enter college whether I really learned them or whether I just memorized them.

GIRL NO. 1: I went away up North and there I attended school. There it's already integrated and everything. I have an inferior complex toward some Negro and some white. While I was there in school, you know when you're down South you don't want to get too close to a white person for fear that they'll turn on you or something and you feel kind of like you got to stay by yourself. When a white person talks to you it kind of strikes you kind of hard. Up there they aren't trying to ask you anything or anything like that. They aren't trying to get any information from you, you are just going to school. But anyway, after I left this school I still felt the same way, that these white children were prejudiced toward me, that they didn't want to be around me, even though they were friendly. I just couldn't get it through my head that they were just being nice without trying to get anything from me.

GIRL NO. 4: I can be a witness to her experience, but it's not only with the whites, it's with Negroes too. I had a greater number of things than many of them—I feel that I don't know who to trust. Sometimes I don't know if someone's being nice and sincere or not. I guess its because when I was out the first semester so many people told me they were trying to get me back in school. The leading people in the community sometimes did things that leave me confused.

Reflections on School Integration: III.

(This is a transcript of an hour and one-half session with five Negro youngsters who desegregated and are attending a predominantly white school in the Deep South. All students are in the tenth through twelfth grades. 8/66)

QUESTION: How did you go about deciding to go to the white school, and what were some of the experiences you had there?

BOY No. 1: I heard it was a better school, and had better equipment and facilities than the Negro school that I was going to.

GIRL No. 1: Well, I understood that you had a chance to get better prepared, a better education than at the Negro school.

BOY No. 2: Not only that, it was a better equipped and higher educated school, an all around better school than the Negro one. My parents asked me if I wanted to go, what did I think about going to this school, and I told them I would like to go and they said I could go.

GIRL No. 1: I wanted to go and decided myself. My parents wouldn't make me go if I didn't want to. But I wanted to and then they let me go.

QUESTION: Did they call you any names?

BOY No. 2: Well not the first day, but later they called us names such as Niggers and all that.

GIRL No. 1: They would stare at you and look at you hard and they wouldn't say too much.

BOY No. 1: Most of the first day if the teachers asked you a question and you answered they mostly laugh.

QUESTION: How were the teachers compared to the teachers you had at the Negro school?

GIRL No. 1: I would say they were more prepared than some of the Negro teachers. I would say that most of them were nice, most of them. Some of them, about two or three, would always make a spectacle of Negroes, you know, would say something about Negroes. Especially one teacher would always try to say something to the kids and they would get a conversation up and all they would do is talk, look back at us and laugh.

BOY No. 1: Yeah, the first day of class I walked in the room and she said, "Have a seat." She said today we have a new student, today, today all day. It was different and that's all.

BOY No. 2: They are not better than Negroes. Most Negroes wear dresses but they are no better here. They may wear better things because they're more able because they've taken all the Negroes' money and stuff from them.

BOY NO. 1: Some of the teachers will try to be funny. When they get to a word like Negro, they call it Nigger or else try to make fun. When my father got a ticket for driving or something they talked about that and made wisecracks about it and asked how come they have to pay a ticket and he didn't have to pay out.

BOY NO. 3: And again there is the problem of overcrowding classrooms in the Negro school; especially in the seventh grade there'd be about 60 students in the classroom. Over here our home-room teacher got mad at me the day after the election. The children started talking about the election and so we told them that we would have a colored sheriff and all that. We started talking about how many Negroes there were and the black camouflage and he got mad. The next day didn't nobody go to school but me and he told me he didn't want to hear no more about the election and no other kind of party, not in his room.

BOY NO. 2: The same day the election was, he brought the same things up in his classroom while I was in it. He wanted to find out who was running for offices and things like that. He wanted to make out that he was now kind of intending to go with the Black Panther movement. And so that's why he is trying to find out everything — he's saying he might want to come down and decide if he'll vote in the party.

BOY NO. 3: The history teacher had a little election in her room and the children voted. But we didn't vote because we didn't want to.

GIRL NO. 2: During the election the children would take stickers and stick them on our seats on the bus and when we got up off the bus they would start clapping their hands and stuff like that.

BOY NO. 3: And they would trade their stickers for Black Power or Black Panther stickers.

BOY NO. 2: I just gave him one and they would trade them. Except they won't trade with us.

GIRL NO. 3: In history class it was very bad. There were always conversations going on between the teacher and the students about the Governor and integration and the President and the federal government and all such that. They were talking against the federal government because the government was for integration and like they were talking against integration because they don't see any sense to it. And the teachers was always saying some kind of wisecrack just to hurt your feelings and like that. He was always praising the Governor. The students acted the same as the teacher did in their class; you know, there was always something that they could say and try and hurt my feelings. They said anything, like how they was 'feared of all of us, what they thought of the way things were running about integration, or anything like that. They would come right out and say it, especially in that class, because they knew that nothing could be done to them in that class.

GIRL NO. 4: You asked why did I go to the white school. Well, I don't see why I shouldn't go there since we don't have a school that big to attend and they don't have anything in the Negro school for equipment. My parents were getting taxed and they planned to use most of that money in the white school and they get all that equipment. I don't see why I shouldn't go there and get some benefit from it. You know, that's the primary reason for going over there, to get a accurate education. But the students weren't friendly at all and I didn't have any white friends.

QUESTION: What about your friends in school, do you have any white friends in school? Do any of them try to be friendly with you?

BOY NO. 3: If they try to be friendly then a gang of them get up and talk to that one and then they try and push him. Then he tries to be funny or smart, too.

BOY NO. 2: And, you don't never have anything to say regardless of what he's doing.

BOY NO. 1: I was in the bathroom one day and a boy pushed me down, I mean pushed me. He went running down the hall and I went to the principal. I also told you one day I was walking down the hall and a boy tripped me and my friend told the assistant principal. I got tripped and he told the assistant principal and he just didn't do anything about it and when the principal came the assistant told the principal.

BOY NO. 2: The assistant just jumped me once and then told the principal that I would have killed him. I didn't want to fight him. He said I told him I'd kill his damn head and was cussing him or something. But I didn't cuss him. He made it much worse the way he told it to the principal. But he's a dirty man anyway. He told my friend straight out, "Nigger you go to the office for chewing gum." Another friend of mine went to this class he taught and she said that he was always trying to bring on all of this stuff about Negroes and stuff just so they could talk against us.

GIRL NO. 2: Right after you got tripped in the hall that day I went to the bathroom and a lot of girls was talking. They said "You know this Nigger got knocked down in the hall." And some of them said "Yeah, somebody ought to knock all of them down." And one day, two of them went and told the principal that they were fighting in the hall but he didn't do anything about it. They came in the bathroom and said: "Two of the Negroes were in the hall trying to fight and we told the principal about it but you know he didn't do anything about it, because they are privileged characters, I don't care if I could paint my face black so I could be a privileged character too." Then they started talking, "You know we'll be going to the Negro schools this year" and the other girl said, "Yeah and I'm going to get myself one of those Negro boyfriends too." They didn't know I was there.

QUESTION: How did the principal seem? Did he seem fair toward you?

GIRL No. 1: He was nice.

BOY No. 1: The trouble was he was just as strict on the white children as he was on us.

GIRL No. 2: I think that he was more strict on them than on us.

BOY No. 2: That's what made it worse. See if something happened during the school hour a group of them would go to the office and tell him something, tell something was stolen and try to trip us all up. He didn't know what to believe most times so he just never paid any attention.

QUESTION: How did the teachers at the Negro school react when you told them that you were going to transfer to the white school?

BOY No. 2: Well, we didn't know that we were going to transfer until about the middle of June. We definitely went to register earlier but we didn't know that we were going to transfer until this part of last year. The Negro music teacher over there, he was friendly and he told me to try and get the best out of it and they was pretty nice to me.

GIRL No. 3: Yeah, all the teachers at the Negro school was very nice and they tried to encourage us and told us to do the best that we could.

QUESTION: Well, how did your friends react to you since you changed schools?

GIRL No. 3: Well, they were encouraging us too and trying to encourage us to do the best that we could. Some of them were trying to get into there too next year and they were trying to encourage me last year.

BOY No. 1: They used to play a lot and tell us don't let the white children whup us and all like that.

BOY No. 3: This year the principal wrote a paper to everyone that had attended another school and wanted to transfer school through the year of 1966-67. He told them they should come Friday and enroll. I went on the school bus but the school bus was packed with children and they turned the school bus around right after we got into town and I had to get off and go and enroll. They said that no Negro student could go in and enroll but those few that went last year. Everybody else that wanted to go didn't have to register. They were just supposed to go over there in September and start school.

GIRL No. 3: Then the principal told us that he wasn't registering any student that did not attend the school the previous year before and all the students that wanted to come over and register could come but he wasn't registering anyone until the board of education decided what number he could register to go over there. Everyone who came over there, except us, from the year before, he turned them around.

GIRL No. 2: The way the letter was written it could have been interpreted that all the students that went last year and wanted to go this year, too, could come; but he really meant for ones that went last year. Then we read the letter over and mother interpreted it as being just the students that went last year.

BOY NO. 3: Yeah, and he told my mother that the children that had filled out the sheet to go said they were going to get them another sheet and if you didn't want to go you didn't have to go there but if you still wanted to go they could put it right down there.

QUESTION: Now you've told us about your schools, why don't you tell a little bit about your association with the white students?

BOY NO. 2: Some people think that white people are higher class than Negroes but from the way the children did behave they are lower class people than the Negro. We went in class one day and everybody sat down and when the teacher went out of the room some of the students had spit in the vacant seats that nobody sits in. And they put chewing gum all over the desks. I mean you didn't find too much chewing gum over at the Negro schools, they threw it out the window or trash can. But over there you find the desk packed with chewing gum and stuff like that.

GIRL NO. 2: My association with the white students, you know you can get along with them as long as they didn't have anything to do with us, until they called us names or something like that. They always pick at you and whenever they do something to you they always dare-devil you with a crowd behind you or something like that. Personally they never did anything to me. When all the Negroes was out together standing out in the hall, when they saw that none of us was looking they would throw something at us and like that. I remember once going to class and somebody put stickers all over my desk. When I got in there I found them all over the place, one down where I sit and one about where I write at and then I took it off and put it in the trash can. You know they are always putting something on my desk or doing something like that.

BOY NO. 1: Well, they usually stay away and just like she said if they are going to do anything they do it in a crowd just about. She told you about it, but one day in the halls just before the spring holidays in March I got off the school bus one Friday and I was a janitor in a church and was going to clean the church up. I saw two boys in the car and they had a girl friend of theirs with them and they stopped and asked me if I wanted to fight. I told them "Yeah I'll fight," if they fight why not? I had another friend with me too, and he picked up some rocks and started throwing them across the street. They said that they ain't playing with no rocks and so those kids talked and then they wouldn't get out. So I told them "Let's go" and the other reached for his seat and gave him a shotgun. He pointed it at us and all that. When we got back to school they didn't say anything about it. But on Tuesday or Wednesday they said, "We could have killed you." I said, "Yeah, you all say if you all meet one of us in the road you'll blow our brains out but that's one you all missed." (LAUGHTER) You see I was brave after they missed me. The sheriff came over to the school to see about it and so they got so worried one of them just didn't say nothing after that. He kept quiet.

GIRL No. 1: There weren't too many friends but we were in gym class where we dress up every day. We took our shoes off and left them in the gym and we were playing. They hid them so we couldn't find but one of them, and they had the other one hid on their feet, and they pretended that none of them knew anything about it. The principal came over, finally, he must have talked to them about it. Another afternoon we were going to our history class. We would usually come up to the room everyday and start studying before classes began and one day they had spread some crayon dust in the seats that we sit in. I told the teacher and she didn't say anything to them, but she gave me this old nasty rag to clean it with and told us that that was all right. I got some tissue from my pocketbook to clean it with. I wanted to tell her about it before I said anything to anyone else. One morning we were standing in the hall and some of the boys brought some bee-bees, you know, shots, and we were standing by the lockers and they threw them all over the hall and mostly to the front by the principal's office. All the teachers came running down the hall and I think they found out who did it though . . . some of the boys.

BOY No. 1: I wouldn't exactly call them friendly but there was a sister and a brother that would ride our bus. They went to school in December. But when we came back they weren't there any more. The girl was in the same class we were in and the boy was a senior. But they were just about the only children that would try to talk to us and try to have anything to do with us. After they stopped nobody else did. One day they shipped all these clothes down to our place and I found an old hat and I sewed up the rim. I wore it to school. I just wore it for the devil of it. The teacher honked her horn and she got mad and she told me to leave it in my locker. So I put it in my locker and when I went to eat lunch and came back somebody had stolen the hat. I reported it to the principal and none of them wanted me to wear the hat to school. The principal told me he couldn't be responsible for it, the hat, because it was something that you weren't supposed to wear to school. He told me if I could get the hat all well and good, but if I couldn't there wasn't anything that he could do about it. And another day I went to school I was wearing a pin, it wasn't a "Black Panther" pin, it was an "End the War in Vietnam" pin. My teacher read what was on it and I think he didn't like what was on it, so he went and told the principal. The principal had been reading the pin for about five days every time when I went to lunch. Later that day I was in study hall and he called me into the office and told me not to wear the pin to school no more. He couldn't fine me for wearing the pin but he said he could punish me for not obeying him. Around the last part of school, when these boys say something we would say it back to them so they started cussing us. One day we started cussing them back and they thought we were going to fight, at least the teacher did, and he went and told the principal and the principal called us to the office and he told us if he had any more trouble he would had to put us out of school.

QUESTION: Before you came to the white school did you think that most of the white students would be smarter than you? Tell me why and what about now?

BOY NO. 1: Well, I didn't have too much thought about it myself, some of them are smarter but they ain't all that smart. Some of them are real dumb.

GIRL NO. 1: You know, I thought some of them would be smart and some of them would be dumb and that's just the way it was. Some of them are smart and try to get the lesson and some of them are dumb just like the Negroes. I think that anyone could go over there if they studied and they could do just as well as the white children do.

BOY NO. 2: I did think at least the majority would be pretty smart except for one or two of them in the classroom. But in the class I was in about half of them was pretty bad.

GIRL NO. 2: Well I thought I could do just as well as most of them if I tried and I did try. Some of them are smarter and some of them are just as dumb as some of the Negroes are. I guess most of them just don't try. I think I did do just about as well as some of them did.

BOY NO. 3: Well, the teachers are very hard about the lesson because they would try to flunk you all they could and if a white person had the same answer as you had and it wasn't a full answer they took five points off your paper and like took off two off his paper.

QUESTION: Now that they are building a private school for the white students how do you think that would affect things at school?

GIRL NO. 1: Well, for myself I don't care if there be a private school for the whites; I wouldn't mind if all of them would go over there, but I know that all of them aren't going over there. Maybe the ones that have enough money will go but that's not going to be too many of them. Maybe some of them might go to other public schools. I don't think that too many of them are going to be going to the private school. I think over half of them that went over should be over there next year.

BOY NO. 1: Well, about my thought about private schools I don't know how it'll stack up. I wasn't too much for going to this school because it was a white school. I went because it was a better school and a higher school and we have accomplished what we was trying to accomplish. We wanted to get some colored students because it was better equipped. If they go to a private school it won't make too much difference because the Negroes will still be going to a higher school and a better equipped school.

BOY NO. 2: Well, I don't think that it will be too bad as it is, and it don't make too much difference if they don't associate with us or anything. I believe that they may act a little better than they did last year. This would be because there aren't too many of us here and probably a lot of white friends left that made them not to say anything and pick at us. Some of them won't be here and they'll probably like the private school a lot better.

GIRL No. 2: Well, I guess the white community, the ones that they would go, I guess they are glad that they can get their children out from around the Niggers as they call them. You know they can get them away from us but I guess those that are unable to send their children, they don't have any feelings toward it since it won't help them any. Around where I live the Negro community don't mind as long as they will be more for the Negroes to go and get a better education.

BOY No. 2: The Negroes in my community hardly say too much about it but they are saying that the white people have been in the school of their own and they are entitled to go to school. That's what they say — let them be alone.

QUESTION: How did the people in your community and your neighbors react when you decided to transfer schools?

GIRL No. 1: In our community all of them were very encouraging. We had been having small mass meetings around our community to try and encourage people to try to enroll students in this school because you could get a better education there. Everyone was very glad that I was chosen to go there and they was trying to encourage me as much as possible to continue.

BOY No. 2: Everyone was encouraging me too and telling me that if I needed any help that I could come to them. If they could help they would. And they were kind of glad that I was going.

BOY No. 1: During the time that we was told that we was eligible to go just about everybody was in the mass meeting movement. I was attending mass meetings and just about everybody I saw would shake my hand and encourage me. Just everybody was encouraging, there wasn't anybody discouraging me.

QUESTION: Why do you think the white folks don't want their children going to school with Negroes?

GIRL No. 2: Well, myself, I have no idea. I've heard that they think their children are too good to go to school with us and we're a bad influence upon their children. That's some gossip I've heard; I really don't know.

BOY No. 1: I just think they're stupid.

GIRL No. 3: For the most part those children over there want to be friendly, some of them do, but their parents tell them what to do and what not to do and all. You can tell that some of them want to say something to you but they are scared that if they say something to you then the other one is going to call them Nigger lover and all that kind of junk. They just go back and tell 'em and so they just don't want to get involved.

BOY No. 1: One day we found out it was mostly a big act because in the lunch room they had Negro cooks. They pretend they hated Negroes so bad but some of the girls would even help the Negro cooks serve the plates and all like that.

BOY No. 2: And they would be laughing and talking to the cooks and even having fun.

GIRL No. 1: A lot of the students that went last year, if you see any of them this summer around home in the fields working, they have Negro children working with them or people cooking for them and all that.

BOY No. 2: Yeah, and you see some go to Negro houses and play and Negroes go to their houses and play. But when you all go to school they are all different then.

GIRL No. 1: I just think they are stupid.

BOY No. 2: It's just that I haven't been brought up around too many white people myself and I never play with them. But from my part it don't make no difference if I play with them or not now, because they don't know any more than me. It don't make no difference if they don't speak to me, then I don't speak to them and that's just it.

GIRL No. 2: Well, Sunday we stopped in at the dairy farm and two of the white boys that went to school last year drove up there and they went in. We was standing up there to the window getting waited on and they looked over and waved to us. That's the way they are when they out of school; when they are in school they act all different.

QUESTION: Have any of your ideas changed any since you've been going to that school?

BOY No. 2: At least some of mine have because I thought they were all pretty close and clean, but the way the children act they are nasty. They're not trustful. If you turn your back you get knocked in the head or something and then you don't see some of them so you have to keep on the watch for some of them and find out who did it or what. I heard people say that Negro children don't act their age but the white children is the children that don't act their age. White boys in the eleventh and twelfth grade will be riding around playing and hollering and kicking like children in the first and second grade.

QUESTION: Did you all ride the bus? How were things on the bus?

GIRL No. 1: Noisy. Before we started school our principal at the Negro school told us to be quiet on the bus, "You should hear how quiet the white children are on the bus and everything." You can't hear anything on that bus, you know, from the time you get on the bus to when you get off.

BOY NO. 1: Just about twice every week the bus driver had to stop the bus to quiet everything down.

GIRL NO. 1: Fighting and doing everything else.

BOY NO. 2: On the bus I ride they just keep up so much fuss, they just throw paper and stuff like that. One afternoon they threw paper at me, they just kept hitting and hitting me with it so I didn't say anything. The next time I got on the bus things started balling up and I said if you hit me I going to fight you this evening. One boy threw and he hit me so I hit him back and we throwing paper by the hour. (LAUGHTER) I sat back down and he didn't say anything so I just went on back to the front of the bus. Once in the winter time when its gets real cold they'll try to let all the windows down in the back of the bus and freeze you. See, the bus driver asked me to sit on the back seat and he put all the girls up to the front and all the boys to the back.

GIRL NO. 2: We had special seats but it was a front seat. You know we couldn't see anything so when you get hit with a piece of paper we just look back.

GIRL NO. 1: I was getting most of the hits 'cause I was in the seat behind them and there wasn't anybody in the seat but me. When we first started school he told them to leave those two seats, don't let anybody sit in those seats. But probably the children would stop sitting there probably for about two evenings and then by third afternoon mostly the small children, they would come up front and sit there. I guess he would tell them not to sit there but they ended up sitting there. A lot of the children who lived near the school came home with a lot of white students and in the morning the bus was real crowded. Our bus would pick them up, in the morning our bus would be real crowded and this little white girl she came in and she sat down next to me. The bus driver was looking in the mirror and he saw that she was sitting there and he told her to take a seat in the back. When we got to school the children started talking about it and saying that the little girl sat down in the seat beside me.

GIRL NO. 2: And as someone sits down next to you everybody would holler here's a seat, come back down here and sit down. The bus driver would look up and see that she was sitting down beside her and he told her get up and go down back and find a seat. He tickled me and I laughed. When we first started school everyone on the bus would speak and say good morning and he would never say anything. We did this for about a week and he never said anything, so from then on we didn't say anything.

GIRL NO. 1: And then one morning our bus was broke down and all the parents took the children to school in their cars. He (the bus driver) came along in his car and picked us up and carried us to school and he opened the door just as nice for us, the back door. He spoke to us just as we spoke, nice good morning, and he spoke back. We didn't say anything. We got out and went to school. He was talking about the bus, he didn't know what was wrong with the bus, but he was talking nice and all.

BOY NO. 2: Well, I go on the school bus, but the bus driver and I haven't spoke since I started riding the bus. I don't think I ever will speak to him. I think that if I speak to him I don't think he will return the answer, the way he reacts. One day I wanted to get off, and he said he don't let anybody off where they don't supposed to get off. And so I say that I see you letting children get off where they don't suppose to get off; they get off any place they want to get off when they tell you to stop.

QUESTION: What kind of reaction would white teachers get from predominantly Negro schools?

GIRL NO. 1: Well, I don't think any of them from around here would go to an all colored school to teach. Maybe one from up North would come down here and maybe he'd go over there to teach or something like that. Probably he'd be all right as far as the students are concerned, but I don't think any of them around here would. If the only school they could teach in was a colored school I don't think they'd teach around here. Honestly, I think they'd do him or her anyway they could, you know, to flunk them and anything like that. I think they'd do anything to her, or him, or whatever it would be.

BOY NO. 2: I think that it would be ordinary because most of the Negro children are used to the way white children act by the way we tell them and by the way the teachers act but last year there probably would have been a lot of fuss raising.

QUESTION: Were you allowed to participate in the organizations at school?

GIRL NO. 3: For most of the organizations they had in school you had to maintain a certain grade to be on it. I think if you had a high enough grade you could be on it.

BOY NO. 2: Most of the plays and that they had at night and you know, it wouldn't be too neat to go because you'd need a lot of bodyguards.

QUESTION: Did any of you ever go back to the Negro high school for anything? How did you feel?

ALL: Same way.

BOY NO. 1: Yeah, I went over there about four times.

BOY NO. 2: Well, you could go over there and sit in the classroom and the teacher probably wouldn't even know it.

BOY NO. 1: Most of them knows you and asks you how you are doing and they say get the best of it and do the best you can.

QUESTION: Suppose some friends at the Negro school asked you for some suggestions about the white school, what would you tell them?

Boy No. 1: It probably be all in their favor because there ought to be a hundred Negroes or more going.

Girl No. 3: I think that for myself I'd tell them something about the students, and the way the teachers treat them. I'd tell him maybe some of the teachers would treat him ordinary the way they treat the white students, but some of them try all they could to fail you. I'd encourage them to do the best they could and to study hard. There are many of these affairs or certain incidents, such as throwing paper at you, or calling you Nigger or talking from gossip, but they wouldn't do anything really big to you besides throwing paper or something at you. They wouldn't really hurt you in a big way.

Boy No. 1: I don't even believe in that this year myself. There will be about as many colored children going to school as white. Last year they did things because they outnumbered us about twenty to one, but I think now it will be a different story.

Boy No. 2: I wish I was going back; I just want some of them to pick at me like they did last year so I can get them back. When we have about an equal number of students we'll see if we can get in a fight over there. We will have the same number in our color as they got in their color so we probably have a better chance fighting, if they're looking for fight this year then I'm going to fight.

Boy No. 1: Some of the white children must respect a colored child as being more powerful and as stronger or something, because every time one of them come up to us to fight it wouldn't be one of us backing down.

Girl No. 2: You don't fight many small boys, most of them would be big and they walk over and they say you all boys want to fight?

Girl No. 1: Myself, I don't think they're going to let as many Negroes over there as the white. If they let any more go it would only be about five or ten. I don't think that they'll accept half as many Negroes as white.

Boy No. 2: I believe that they will accept as many because President Johnson said that they will cut out segregation this year. There will be integration this year and anybody can go to any school of his or her choice.

Girl No. 1: You see, the school isn't very large and they are going to say that the school is overcrowded and all this. They don't have that many white children over there and I don't believe that they're going to let that many colored children go there.

Boy No. 1: I mean the school will hold over five hundred students. I don't know about how many will register but there ought to be about a hundred Negro students over there.

Boy No. 2: For the school, they had some rooms in the school that they wasn't going to use. I believe that the school ought to hold about 500 students. There will be more room with children going to the private school.

GIRL No. 2: In the Negro school our classroom had mostly about sixty, just about the same number of students in each class.

BOY No. 2: We went for about three six-week periods this way with about 93 children in the classroom. When they divided it they had about 50 or 60 students in the class.

BOY No. 1: The Negro school is the largest but they don't have a gym, they don't have a cafeteria, they don't have a library, and they don't have no kind of equipment in the laboratory, and they don't have no kind of gym clothes to put on when you go in the gym or outdoors when you go out to practice football.

GIRL No. 1: Matter of fact they don't have anything in that gym but a wall and a few seats sitting in it and they have them broken down.

BOY No. 2: Sometime you have to stand up to take tests.

QUESTION: If the Negro candidate wins the election in November how do you think it will affect things in the community?

BOY No. 1: I would be so glad. I mean it would probably help the Negroes because there is a Negro running for sheriff and running for just everything in the county election. If the Negro wins for sheriff it probably be the first one in any county. They got some Negroes who call themselves deputies but they don't wear the clothes that other men wear, they wear khakis and are out in the field. If the Negro wins we probably will have it better, like now, if they catch you driving without a driver's license they will probably give you a twenty-five dollar ticket and if they catch a white person they will probably give him a ten or maybe a twelve dollar ticket.

BOY No. 2: They are not going to stop no white people. When they deputize them I think they told him you a Nigger sheriff, for the Niggers. Those Negro deputies even shot a Negro. They are not trustworthy, I'll tell you. I don't like them myself and I don't fool around with them, you may get shot right quick.

BOY No. 1: They had a bodyguard the first day that we went. When the white kids started fighting their canes started beating us, that's what they did. They wouldn't have the white kids. You know they thought they could fool the Negro people that they was doing something and that the people was on our side.

BOY No. 2: One night I think he was in one of the churches and they come out there and they asked what happened. And one of the leaders said they should get out there so he don't go back and tell his white folks there. One day we was in school in history class and the teacher started talking about the white children and she said that they ought to start thinking about the Negro, the day they came over and the first day and the second day. They had Negro guards and they had forgotten about that.

QUESTION: Well, how did the Negro deputies act while they were guarding people?

BOY NO. 1: They wasn't even on the school campus. They stood outside the road and three of us came in a car together, and we passed on by them. The two on the left looked and the two on the right looked and they turned their head and looked the other way and then we went on into the school. At least they didn't even come on campus, they just stand out there in the road. If everyone want to jump on us they would be behind on the road and we had to go to school.

GIRL NO. 2: I think if everyone wanted to jump on us they would have killed us, it wouldn't have done any good. That's what they wanted to do to us, beat us or jump on us or do what ever they wanted to do.

BOY NO. 2: Because we was on the other side and the guards was on the other side of the building.

BOY NO. 1: If the white kids had jumped up the deputies would have helped them maybe.

GIRL NO. 3: They might not have come.

BOY NO. 1: They might have come but you can bet that they wouldn't have hit anyone, because by the time I knowed I was going, until the day I went, I got discouraged one time. That was the time that they had that killing. People told me that you better not go. At least I didn't know that they was going to have deputies and all like that, and I didn't look for it the first day. The principal told us not to come the first day so we went the second day. I guess they wanted to tell the students what to do or how to act or something.

GIRL NO. 1: I heard the same thing, that he had conference with the children, told them just how he stood, what they could do and what they couldn't do. He said it might just be better if you all didn't come the first day. He told us he couldn't tell us not to come but it might be better if we waited to the second day.

QUESTION: Now you said the white kids would always do things behind your back but did any of them come up to your face and tell you things or call you names?

GIRL NO. 2: They may call you names to your face but they wouldn't hit you when you could see them. You know, they call you a Nigger or curse you or something like that.

BOY NO. 2: At least, every time one of them call me something I call him something back. When they call me Nigger I call them a cracker or something. You're not white, you're red.

GIRL NO. 2: Most times they call you something, you know, they curse you and call you old damn Nigger or something, anything they want to call you.

BOY NO. 2: Yeah, they made a sling shot one morning and they shot pecans here on the bus. They actually shot pecans off a sling shot.

GIRL NO. 2: But you know in the hallways you would hardly ever see any boys their size come up to them and say you want to fight. You see these great big boys that are about this wide and all around are these great big old boys. Way bigger than you so they looking down on you asking you if you wanna fight.

BOY NO. 2: Even in the class and on the bus we didn't have no big boys that size. Well, in the cafeteria one day one big boy did ask me for my ice cream. Now sometime they will beg in the cafeteria, some of them. I gave it to him that day but they won't get nothing else from me though. (LAUGHTER)

GIRL NO. 3: Sometimes we be going down the hall and if any of the white students was standing in the hall and they see us coming they say here come a black Nigger, you better stand back, or something. They would get back up against the wall. In the morning sometime we'd be standing by our locker and they would get off the bus and come in and try to walk close up by the wall or something pretending that they didn't want to get close to touch us or anything.

BOY NO. 2: And when they did walk up side close to the wall we'd begin laughing and everything. They think they're so much that they can't walk beside us, but when they go down to the cafeteria they're standing and they'd be eating and the Negro cooks could be putting their hand all over the rolls, especially. And they'd be eating out of their hands.

BOY NO. 1: I know you been talking about a black power party if we get a Negro sheriff. I know they having a basketball game out to the school one night and some boys come up here to the store and get some beer, you know, under age. Somebody caught up with them, the sheriff or somebody, and he didn't do anything to the boy, but he took the lady's license and if it had been a Negro boy he probably would have them expelled from school and all.

QUESTION: Did any of you have any doubt whether you are going to pass to the next grade?

BOY NO. 2: I doubt it myself. I didn't study as hard as I should have.

BOY NO. 1: I doubted it myself the first part of it.

GIRL NO. 1: I failed.

BOY NO. 2: Well, none of the boys are promoted.

BOY NO. 1: I mean if we have a test and we get a 70 the teachers would bring it down to a 60 or 68½ on my card.

BOY NO. 1: At least in history, you see, we have about a week to study one subject but the teacher sit up there and talk about integration so much the four days. Then on Friday she come up and give one big whole week's lesson and have us get that and have a test on it that Monday. It's different for the white kids because they get the kids that had her last year and get the notes and you see they already know what happened and she would help them anyway.

BOY NO. 2: And they already know the majority of the questions on the test because they would go down to her house at night and she would tell them.

GIRL NO. 2: Walking down the hall some children out of their class would say what are you going to have on the test, is it going to be hard. She'd say, well you know those notes I gave you the other day, just study those real good, I heard her.

BOY NO. 2: Yeah, I've seen actually some students would have special notes and they'd be typed out by her. She'd say something about getting us some notes, the ones that failed, but she never said anything about giving me no notes and I was failing. I never asked her for no notes but I went and asked her some questions and she acted like she didn't want to answer them. She said what's the matter with you, what's you doing in class for the reason why you couldn't get it and all that.

GIRL NO. 2: I had a lot of trouble in history. That's the only class that I really doubted, you know, I flunked the first semester but I passed the last semester. I have to take my first semester over next year. I was kind of surprised he passed my last semester because I was kind of sure that he had flunked me.

BOY NO. 2: We could go to summer school and pay $15 a month to make it up.

BOY NO. 1: I mean I have to go next year and make that grade up and, you know, go and take it over.

GIRL NO. 1: If I was absent when I got back to school the next day the teacher would probably have my notes typed or written up for me and I didn't have to ask her for them.

QUESTION: Can anyone think of anything else that would happen if Negroes got elected?

GIRL NO. 1: I think things might be a little better in the school situation. It could do something about the Negro school especially; it could get equipment and at least they need to build another school if they are not going to let the colored children go to the white school. They need to build another school because that school is entirely overcrowded, I think. They can't do anything out there and they don't have the equipment either; they don't have anything out there.

BOY No. 2: Well, I'll feel more free to talk to the sheriff and tell him how I feel about certain things, you know. You may be afraid to tell a white person what you want to tell him, actually, you can hardly talk to a white person like you talk to a Negro person, you know someone from your own race. If we get all Negroes they probably wouldn't have too much to say neither. If we have control for many years then maybe the children come up being afraid of law like most Negro children being afraid of law.

GIRL No. 3: Probably everything would be better, you know, better schools and the board of education. Probably we can get some of the things that we want, you know, better schools and things that the whites have.

INTRODUCTION

You've heard about the problems of slum housing, urban blight, and decay in our cities. You've heard of the Senate and Congressional hearings, the national legislation, the newspaper headlines, and the racial ghetto outbreaks. You've heard about the problems of urban renewal and public housing, side by side with growing deteriorated and overcrowded neighborhoods. And you've heard that new housing programs are being proposed. Yet, you may not be familiar with the government and private housing programs that already exist. That's what this booklet is about: the present programs you can use to help eliminate poor housing and slum neighborhoods now.

Take a look at the housing programs in your community. Are they piecemeal projects, too small to be effective, and lacking in overall planning? The comprehensive planning and community renewal programs in Part One tell you how to plan for housing programs in your community.

Are there families in your community who need help in adjusting to their new housing? Relocation assistance for these families is described in Parts One and Two.

Are your community's housing programs isolated from other public programs? See the sections on relocation assistance and on coordination with anti-poverty programs in Part Two.

Do the needs of your community's ill-housed citizens for employment and education also go unmet? The section on coordination with anti-poverty programs will help here, too.

Do your housing programs fail to involve community leaders or private agencies? The sections on the city human relations commission and on urban renewal neighborhood organization in Part Two can help you.

Are your housing programs planned without involving the residents who will be affected by them? The sections on neighborhood organization in Parts Two and Three show you ways to involve people in the plans for their own neighborhoods.

Do the residents of neighborhoods in your community know how to participate in housing programs? Part Four explains how residents can take part in government and private housing programs.

Have private groups done little to help improve homes and neighborhoods in your community? Part Three explains the many ways private groups can work for better housing in your community.

The Housing Act of 1949 set as a goal: "a decent home and a suitable living environment for every American family." Today, we're still a long way from reaching our goal of good housing and good neighborhoods. We know that Federal, state, and local governments, and private community groups all must help. You, too, can help. For you have more programs today than ever before for better homes and neighborhoods.

HUD-(or DHUD) Department of Housing and Urban Development, created September 9, 1965; formerly the Housing and Home Finance Agency (HHFA), which was created in 1947.

The five agencies of HUD:

FHA-Federal Housing Administration, created in 1934.

URA-Urban Renewal Administration, created by the HHFA Administrator in 1954.

CFA-Community Facilities Administration, created by the HHFA Administrator in 1954.

HAA-Housing Assistance Administration, formerly Public Housing Administration (PHA) which was created in 1947.

FNMA-Federal National Mortgage Association, a government corporation, originally chartered in 1938.

H.U.D. PROGRAMS YOU CAN USE WITHOUT HAVING URBAN RENEWAL

Don't let the 21 programs for better homes and neighborhoods in Table 1 scare you. Just take them one at a time, from left to right. Take the sixth program, rental housing for the elderly. The first column at the left of Table I says, "Section number of national housing law." The section number for this program is 231.

The second column from the left of Table I says, "agency that administers." The agency in HUD that administers the 231 program is FHA. When you want information about a particular Federal housing program, you'll save time if you know the section number of the national housing law for that program and the agency in HUD that administers the program. Then, you can write to FHA about 231 mortgage insurance and FHA knows you mean that program of rental housing for the elderly.

The third column in Table I says, "type of aid." The type of aid for this 231 program is mortgage insurance. Other Federal housing aids, besides insurance, include loans, advances (See Table II), grants, and subsidies.

The fourth column in Table I says, "Program." Many times, Federal officials use the section number right along with the name of the program. They'll say, "231 rental housing for the elderly."

The fifth column in Table I says, "who receives the aid." The profit or nonprofit sponsor who builds rental housing for the elderly receives the Federal (231) mortgage insurance on his loan from the bank. FHA allows easy terms on the loan to encourage sponsors to build rental housing for the elderly.

The sixth column in Table I says, "special provisions." In the low-rent public housing program, for example, there are special provisions for the elderly and the handicapped.

* See front of this Part on Federal Programs for list of initials and what they stand for, page 1.

 You can use FHA mortgage insurance on your loan to buy an individual unit in a multifamily building (condominium.)

The last column on the right of Table I says, "requirements." This is very important, because there are some Federal programs you can't use unless your city meets certain requirements. You can't use the rent supplements program, for example, unless your city has a Workable Program. (See the sections in this booklet on the Workable Program and on the comprehensive planning requirements your city has to have for certain Federal programs.)

How do you use the Federal housing programs in Table I?
Insurance programs. Look at the programs in Table I according to the type of aid (third column) they give. Start with insurance. FHA insures loans for property improvements (Title I) and insures mortgage loans for home improvements (203(k)), experimental housing (233), rental housing for the elderly (231), homes (regular program) (203(b)), multifamily rental housing (regular program) (207), cooperative housing (213), and condominiums (234). You can use these FHA insurance programs yourself, without your city taking part. How? You go to the bank (or savings and loan association or finance company) and apply for FHA insurance on the loan you want to get from the bank.

Now, the bank or other lender, you go to for an FHA-insured loan has to be a bank approved by FHA. If you are getting a loan for property or home improvements, you can let your building contractor take your application to the bank for you. If you're going to sponsor experimental housing, rental housing for the elderly, multifamily rental housing, cooperative housing, or condominiums, you visit an FHA insuring office before you go to the bank. If you don't know where the nearest FHA insuring office is, write to an FHA regional office and ask. (See the list of agencies at the end of this Part on Federal Programs.)

Other FHA insurance programs require your city to take part. If you want FHA mortgage insurance for land development, your city (or other local government in your area) has to have a comprehensive plan. And the land development you want to do has to fit in with the comprehensive plan for your area. So, check with your City Planning Commission before you apply for your mortgage loan for land development. Insurance now covers not only mortgages for new subdivisions, but also insurance on mortgage loans for developers of entire new towns and new communities. The maximum amount of a single mortgage is $25 million for seven years (or longer, if permitted by the Secretary of HUD). The developer's application to FHA for mortgage insurance first has to be approved by the local governing bodies of adjoining localities and by the state Governor.

Besides the rent supplements program, three other FHA mortgage insurance programs in Table I require your city to have a Workable Program: 1) homes for low and moderate income families (221); 2) rental housing for low and moderate income families, market interest rate program (221(d)(3)); and 3) rental housing for low and moderate income families, below market interest rate program (221(d)(3)). If you want to use any of these three FHA mortgage insurance programs, check with your city's local public agency (LPA) before you apply for your mortgage loan. (See the section in this booklet on the Workable Program. For more information on 221(d)(3) programs, see Part III. Community Group Programs, Nonprofit housing.)

A new FHA home mortgage insurance program (not listed in Table I; write HUD for information) waives requirements for economic soundness of loans in areas where violence or civil disorders have occured or are threatened. The property can be an acceptable risk giving "due consideration to the need for providing adequate housing for families of low and moderate income" in the area.

Remember, FHA doesn't lend money. You get your loan from a bank (or savings and loan association or finance company). You pay a premium for FHA insurance. Then FHA insures your loan from the bank. FHA insurance protects the bank or other approved lender in case something happens that you can't pay back your loan.

- Direct loan programs. There is a Federal housing program in Table I that does give direct Federal government loans. That is the senior citizens housing loan program (202). As a nonprofit sponsor, you can apply to your regional office of the Department of Housing and Urban Development for a loan to build or rehabilitate rental housing for moderate income elderly and handicapped people. Nonprofit sponsors of senior citizen housing can be church groups, labor unions, and fraternal and civic clubs. Nonprofit sponsors have to be able to finance the housing project themselves or through their national organizations.

- Grant programs. As a public or private nonprofit agency, you can apply to your regional office of the Department of Housing and Urban Development for a grant to do a low income housing demonstration (207) project. You can demonstrate how to build low income housing or how to design it or how to finance it. For example, the idea of the rent supplements program was tested in a demonstration project. Your city doesn't have to take part in the low income housing demonstration program.

- Grants for urban planning assistance (701) go to your city, a group of cities, your county, your state, or your metropolitan planning agency. You use these grants to prepare comprehensive community plans. (See the section in this booklet on comprehensive planning.) A city over 50,000 population or a group of cities over 50,000 that want urban planning assistance grants have to have a metropolitan planning agency. And a metropolitan planning agency has to be set up by your State law. Your state planning agency and your metropolitan planning agency apply to the Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) regional office for urban planning assistance grants.

  If your city is under 50,000 population, your city applies for urban planning assistance grants to your State planning agency or to your metropolitan planning agency, if you have one serving your city. Your county, no matter what size, also applies either to your State planning agency or to your metropolitan planning agency, if there is one serving your county.

  A group of cities that add up to less than 50,000 population can apply to the HUD regional office for urban planning assistance grants. But the group of cities has to form an organization of the public officials from each city. A group like this might call itself a council of local governments or an area-wide planning agency.*

- A local public body can apply to your regional office of HUD for grants for neighborhood facilities; these are projects like community centers, youth centers, health stations, and recreation centers. Your city (or other local government in your area) has to have a comprehensive plan. And the neighborhood facility has to fit in with the comprehensive plan. You use the neighborhood facility to serve low and moderate income families and as part of a Community Action Program. (See the section in this booklet on housing programs a Community Action Committee can use.) Neighborhood facilities are good to use with urban renewal projects; they give the renewal neighborhood a lift.

- A local public body or a State agency can apply to your HUD regional office for grants for open space land and urban beautification. You use the grants to buy and put up parks, malls, historic sites, and scenic spots. Your city (or other local government in your area) has to have a comprehensive plan. And the parks and malls you want have to fit in with the comprehensive plan. Open space land and urban beautification programs are a good way to get the parks you need in an urban renewal area.

- Any size city or county can apply to your HUD regional office for grants for code enforcement and for demolition of unsafe buildings. Your city has to have a Workable Program. The nice thing about these programs is you can use the grants to enforce housing codes and to demolish unsafe buildings both within and outside of urban renewal project areas. Both programs include grants for relocation payments to people who have to move. The code enforcement program also includes rehabilitation loans and grants, as well as funds for public improvements like streets and sidewalks.

- Subsidy programs. What's the difference between a subsidy and a grant? You get a grant from the Federal government in one or two lump sums; you get a subsidy in several payments spread out over a period of time.
  - The rent supplements program is a subsidy program as well as an insurance program (221(d)(3)). The Secretary of HUD makes the subsidy payments for low income tenants to the owner of the housing where they live. The tenants have to be people who qualify for public housing.

    The housing has to be financed under the (221(d)(3) market interest rate program.* And the owner of the housing has to be a private nonprofit sponsor, a limited distribution company, or a cooperative in order to get rent supplement payments for low income tenants. The owner of the housing chooses the tenants. (See under PART III. COMMUNITY GROUP PROGRAMS, Nonprofit housing.)
  - Low-rent public housing is the other subsidy program in Table I. Your city's Housing Authority has to charge tenants enough rent to pay for operating the public housing, but without competing with private standard housing rents. To pay the cost of building new public housing, your city pays 10% in cash or in kind, the Federal government pays the other 90% in annual contributions.

    Low income families and elderly individuals apply to your Housing Authority to live in public housing. Families displaced by urban renewal projects and other government programs get priority on vacant units in public housing.

Besides building new housing itself, your Housing Authority can also buy new housing from a private builder (Turnkey Method), buy and rehabilitate existing buildings, or lease housing from private owners to rent to low income tenants. Also, some tenants can buy their units in public housing.

- There are a lot of other HUD programs not included here, as well as programs of other Federal departments, that can help you get better housing and neighborhoods. See the list of publications at the end of this Part on Federal Programs.

H.U.D. PROGRAMS YOU CAN USE WITH URBAN RENEWAL ONLY

- You can use the 21 programs in Table I either with or without having urban renewal. But you can use the 12 programs in Table II with urban renewal only.* You saw that the last seven programs in Table I required your city to have a Workable Program. All 12 programs in Table II require the Workable Program. (See the section in this booklet on the Workable Program.)

- How do you use the Federal housing programs in Table II? Insurance programs. As you can see in the third column of Table II, there are three insurance programs you can use with urban renewal: 1) mortgage insurance for housing in urban renewal areas (220); 2) mortgage insurance for home improvement loans in urban renewal areas (220(h)); and 3) mortgage insurance for housing for displaced families (221).

Before you go to the bank to apply for your FHA-insured mortgage loan, check with your local public agency (LPA) to see if your city has a Workable Program. Your LPA might be called an Urban Renewal Agency, an Urban Renewal Department of your city government, or it might be your city's Housing Authority. FHA won't insure your 220, 220(h), or 221 loan from the bank unless your city has a Workable Program. And the Workable Program has to be certified by HUD.

The Federal National Mortgage Association (FNMA, often called "Fanny Mae") buys the 220, 220(h), and 221 mortgages from the bank, under the FNMA Special Assistance Program. That way, a bank that makes a mortgage loan for urban renewal can turn around and sell the mortgage to FNMA on the secondary mortgage market. Once the bank sells the mortgage, then the bank has money to make more loans.

- Direct loan programs. Your local public agency (LPA) can get a temporary loan to start buying and clearing land in an urban renewal project. (See the next section on Urban Renewal Projects, Loan and Grant, Part II.)

- If you live in a building in an urban renewal project, and the building isn't beyond repair, you can get a Federal loan (312) through your LPA to rehabilitate your building. Your LPA tells you whether or not your building is beyond repair.

- Advances. Your City's LPA uses planning advances for urban renewal to pay for survey and planning work before the urban renewal project begins. The planning advances are part of (Title I) urban renewal project funds from HUD.

- Grant programs. Besides grants for urban renewal projects, your city can get grants from HUD to make general neighborhood renewal plans (GNRP). The advantage of the GNRP is this: within one neighborhood in your city there could be one or two areas where you can use urban renewal, according to your State laws. But the whole neighborhood may need help: it may need a new school or better streets or housing code enforcement or new zoning. The general neighborhood renewal plan is a way for your city to study and help a whole neighborhood, even though only parts of it can have urban renewal projects.

- Another grant program your city can use is the Community Renewal Program (CRP). These grants let your city study all the renewal projects and neighborhood plans your city needs for years to come. And your city can then decide which urban renewal projects it should do first and how your city can pay for the better housing and neighborhoods it has in mind.

- If you have to move because of an urban renewal project, your LPA will pay your moving expenses. Your LPA gets the money from a 100% relocation grant from the Federal government. So, your city doesn't pay for relocation out of its own funds. Relocation is the only grant program in Table II where your city doesn't share the cost with the Federal government.

In addition to moving expenses, low income families and elderly individuals can get a relocation adjustment payment (RAP) from your LPA. This payment helps people who can't get a unit in public housing to find other standard housing.

Your LPA also helps businesses that have to move to get Small Business Loans, rental payments, or Small Business Displacement Payments.

Your LPA also makes relocation payments to people who have to move not only because of urban renewal, but also because of Federal highway construction or other construction programs.

- State and local public bodies can apply to HUD for urban renewal demonstration grants (314). Kentucky used one of these grants to help communities with their Workable Programs. (See the section on State assistance for community improvement.)

- If you are a low income property owner in an urban renewal area, and your building is not beyond repair, you can get a grant to rehabilitate your building. See your LPA about getting a rehabilitation grant (115).

See page 10 about code enforcement and demolition grants.

URBAN RENEWAL PROJECTS

What is urban renewal?
Who does urban renewal?
What is the procedure for urban renewal?
How long does urban renewal take?
Why might urban renewal fail?

- What is urban renewal?

Urban renewal is your city's trade-in of slum housing (or businesses or industries) for decent housing (or businesses or industries.)

There are two main ways you make the trade-in: 1) clearance: your city buys all or part of the slum property, clears and improves the property, and sells the property to private builders; and 2) rehabilitation: your city makes loans or grants to slum property owners and tenants to repair their buildings.

Whether your city uses clearance or rehabilitation or both, your city also uses conservation to keep the neighborhood from becoming a slum again. Conservation means your city puts in community facilities like streets, sewers and utilities, parks and playgrounds, branch libraries, and fire stations.

- Who does urban renewal?

Your community has to have a local public agency (LPA) to do urban renewal. Your LPA can be a public agency separate from your city government, can be your local housing authority, or can be a department of the city government itself, depending on your State law. Your LPA uses Federal advances, loans, and grants (Title I) to plan urban renewal projects; to buy, clear, improve, and resell urban renewal property; to give slum property owners and tenants loans or grants to rehabilitate their buildings; and to make relocation payments to people who have to move. The city supplies part of the funds as well, either in cash or in improvements (community facilities).

Both cities and counties can use Federal grants for code enforcement and for demolition of unsafe buildings in (or outside of) urban renewal areas. Your city can also use grants for neighborhood facilities, open space land, urban beautification, and preservation of historic structures in urban renewal projects.

Property owners and tenants in urban renewal areas get rehabilitation loans (312)* and grants (115) from the city's LPA to repair their buildings and use FHA mortgage insurance for housing (220) and home improvements (220(h)). Families displaced from urban renewal areas also use mortgage insurance (221) to finance decent housing.

Private builders buy the improved urban renewal land and build housing (or businesses or industries) according to your city's plan. Nonprofit groups can also sponsor new or rehabilitated housing in urban renewal areas.

- What is the procedure for urban renewal?

There are five main steps to an urban renewal project: 1) choosing the urban renewal project area; 2) Survey and Planning; 3) Loan and Grant, Part I; 4) Loan and Grant, Part II; and 5) the project itself.

1) Choosing the urban renewal project area. Before you can have urban renewal, your city has to have a Workable Program for Community Improvement (see the next section on the Workable Program) approved by the Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD).

   Next, your city chooses an area for urban renewal. Your State statutes tell what can be an urban renewal area; for example, a statute might say that at least 51% of the buildings in an area have to be substandard before you can have an urban renewal project.

* Section number of the national housing law for that program; See Table II, page 14, and explanation following.

2) Survey and Planning. After your city chooses a project area, then your city government passes a resolution. The resolution is to make a Survey and Planning Application to HUD for Federal funds for advance planning. Your city may choose to pay for advance planning of the urban renewal project without Federal funds and then use Federal funds only for the rest of the urban renewal project.

Your city's Survey and Planning Application tells what the urban renewal project area is like, what your city plans to do in the project area, and how much the urban renewal project might cost. After HUD approves your city's Survey and Planning Application, then HUD advances planning funds to your city.

Your city uses Survey and Planning funds (whether Federal or not) to survey and to plan the urban renewal project area. One survey tells you what condition the buildings are in, how many people and businesses will have to move, and what housing there already is in the city for the displaced people to move to.

Another survey tells you who owns each parcel of property in the urban renewal project area and how much each parcel of property is worth. Your city pays appraisers to decide how much the property is worth.

The plan for the urban renewal project area tells how you can use the property in the project area after urban renewal: for example, how much of the property to use for businesses, how much for homes, how much for schools, and/or how much for industries. Congress now says the residential reuse of any urban renewal area must provide a "substantial" supply of standard low and moderate income housing. And the residential redevelopment must show "marked progress in serving the poor and disadvantaged people living in slums and blighted areas." Also, urban renewal plans must give "consideration" to development of effective systems for the control of storm and sanitary wastes. HUD requires that the new uses for the urban renewal property pay your city more property taxes than the old uses.

3) Loan and Grant, Part I. After your city surveys and plans the urban renewal project, then your city government passes a resolution. The resolution asks HUD to approve the city's Part I of an Application for Loan and Grant of Funds.

This Loan and Grant Application has to tell HUD your city's whole plan for the urban renewal project: how your city will buy the property, how you can use the property after urban renewal, what community facilities your city will put in, how your City will relocate the people who have to move, and how your city plans to resell the property.

HUD reviews the Loan and Grant Application, Part I, and returns it to your city. HUD may then ask your city to add more information or to change the plan.

4) Loan and Grant, Part II. After your city gets Part II of the Loan and Grant Application ready (which is actually Part I revised), then your city government passes--whoops, not yet. Your city government holds a public hearing. After the public hearing, then your city government passes a resolution. The resolution approves the urban renewal project.

Now the only thing left to do before the urban renewal project itself is to get the money. If your city is over 50,000 population, you pay 1/3 of the cost of the urban renewal project (total cost minus sales of urban renewal land to private builders). However, if your city paid for the Survey and Planning out of its own funds, then your city's share for the rest of the urban renewal project is 1/4.

If your city is under 50,000 population, you pay 1/4 of the cost. Your city doesn't have to pay in cash. Instead, your city can put in community facilities, or, public improvements to serve the project area. These improvements are called noncash Grants-in-Aid. Noncash Grants-in-Aid can also be up to 25% (but not over $3.5 million) of the cost of:

1) public facilities for cultural, exhibition or civic purposes,
2) city halls or public safety buildings or
3) medical treatment or research facilities.

After approving Part II of your Loan and Grant Application, HUD sends your city a contract for the Federal 2/3 or 3/4 share of the urban renewal project cost. After your city approves that contract, you're ready to start the project. Your city uses a Federal loan at the beginning and gets a Federal grant at the end.

5) The project itself. The city uses the appraisals made in the Survey and Planning stage to set a purchase price for each parcel of property in the urban renewal area. Next, your city hires a negotiator to make each property owner an offer for his property. If the owner accepts that offer, then a title company closes the sale. If the title to the property is not clear or if the owner won't accept the city's offer, then the city has to go to court and condemn the property in order to buy it.

If your city buys urban renewal property that you live on, you have at least 90 days to move, and the city has to help you find standard housing. The city pays your moving expenses and also gives you a relocation adjustment payment, if you need it. (See the grant programs following Table II, page 16.) If you decide to move to a substandard house, your city can't give you any relocation payments.

After buying a parcel of property, the city has a demolition company demolish the building. Next, the city has an engineer put in street and sewer improvements. Next, the city goes to the planning commission to have the property rezoned according to the urban renewal plan.

If you own a building that has to be rehabilitated, the city tells you what you have to do to bring the building up to standard, according to the city codes. The city also helps you get the loan or grant you need to do the work, if you can't afford all the repairs yourself.

When the land the city bought is ready, the city sells it to private developers, except the land for public uses like schools, parks, utilities, and fire stations. The private developers have to build according to the urban renewal plan. The price for the land has been set by the appraisers.

When your city sells all the urban renewal land, the Urban Renewal Administration of HUD makes an audit. The audit is to see exactly what the project did cost after your city sold the urban renewal land. If your city spent more than it expected to, then your city has to come up with more funds to pay its share. If your city spent less than it expected to, your city gets a refund from URA. Finally, the Urban Renewal Administration makes your city a capital grant for the Federal share of the project cost.

- How long does urban renewal take?

How long your city takes to do an urban renewal project depends on several things:

1) whether your city's Workable Program is acceptable to HUD;
2) whether your city has done urban renewal before and knows the procedure;
3) whether HUD has a backlog of applications piled up from other cities when your city applies;
4) whether the people living in the project area stay there between the time of the Survey and Planning until the project begins; you see, it will take the city longer to find people relocation housing if they aren't the same people who lived in the project area when the City made the relocation survey;

5) whether the property owners are willing to sell at the price the city offers;
6) whether much of the urban renewal property has clear title; it takes a long time for the city to go through court and condemn the property for title; and
7) whether the city can find ready buyers for the urban renewal land.

Choosing the project area takes at least long enough for the city to inspect possible renewal areas and to talk over a possible project with city government departments, other local government agencies, and private agencies. How long this takes, it's hard to say.

Then, to prepare the Survey and Planning Application takes anywhere from a few hours to several weeks, depending on how much information your city has collected on the project area.

If your city's Workable Program is certified, HUD approves the Survey and Planning Application in about three to four months.

The Survey and Planning stage of urban renewal takes two years.

HUD takes about three to four months to review and return Part I of the Loan and Grant Application. After the city revises the Application (about four months) and turns in Part II, HUD approves the urban renewal project in about two to three months.

Cities take about five years to execute an urban renewal project, that is, to buy all the property they planned to buy in the urban renewal project, improve the land, and sell the land after all the improvements are in.

All in all, an urban renewal project in your city takes about eight years from start to finish. Of course, you can have more than one project going on at a time, so that it might take only 11 years to finish two projects.

- Why might urban renewal fail?

- One reason an urban renewal project might fail in your community is that the public doesn't understand it. People in your community may have the wrong idea about Federal aid for urban renewal. They may think the Federal government comes in and tells your city what to do. Not so. Your city chooses to have the urban renewal project, your city plans the project, and your city carries it out.

  Another common misunderstanding about urban renewal is that people in the project will be cleared out and have no place to go. Not so. Your city has to help the people from the project area to find standard housing at a price they can afford to pay. What about people moving to another slum, you say? Your city can't stop anyone from moving to a slum. And your city can't help anyone move before the Federal contract for urban renewal is approved. But if people living in an urban renewal area remain there until the project begins, the city has to find them decent housing.

  Many people think an urban renewal project has to be all clearance. No project has to be all clearance. Your city may decide on clearance to get enough land for a city-wide facility, such as a stadium or a civic center. But where your city doesn't need a large land area, you can draw any project area boundaries to include some housing that the owners can rehabilitate.

- A second reason that urban renewal might fail in your community is because the people living in the project area aren't involved in planning the project. You know, the plans for an urban renewal project have to include plans for relocation. So, even if none of the people move back into the project after renewal, the people still have a stake in the project plans.

  There are many ways people who live in project areas can be involved in the planning. One way is through the Citizens Advisory Committee. Your city is required to have this committee under the Workable Program. Often the difference between a successful urban renewal project and a failure is the difference between a Citizens Advisory Committee that is active and one that is idle. People in project areas can work through the Citizens Advisory Committee to get the kind of project that meets their needs for better housing and neighborhoods.

Often the Citizens Advisory Committee isn't enough. People in project areas may want to do their own housing surveys. They may want to show the city that new housing alone won't meet the needs of the people, but that they also need jobs, job training, and adult education programs as well. (See the section on Your Own Programs under Part IV.)

People in project areas may want to form a neighborhood organization and hold meetings to explain and discuss the urban renewal program and other programs in the community. They may publish a newsletter to keep all the people in the project area informed. Efforts like these--the housing surveys, the neighborhood meetings, and the newsletters--can mean the difference between the success and the failure of urban renewal in your community. (See Part II, City Programs.)

- A third reason urban renewal might fail is because your city does a piecemeal or one-shot job, as if an urban renewal project alone could solve all the city's slum housing problems. Few cities are that lucky. Your city has to work for good housing in every part of the community. That means enforcing the housing code, putting in public improvements, encouraging private builders and nonprofit sponsors to put up more housing, and possibly using other Federal programs for more and better housing. One isolated project won't do the job.

WORKABLE PROGRAM*

You wouldn't build a house where you couldn't get a road to it, where there was no school, no grocery store, and somebody could put up a factory next door. You wouldn't put a house in a neighborhood like that.

On the other hand, you wouldn't tear down a bad house until you found a good house to move into. Nor would you move people out of one slum neighborhood only to have them move into another slum neighborhood.

Who sees to it that people who move out of bad houses then move into good houses in good neighborhoods? And who sees to it that good housing gets the roads, schools, stores, and zoning it needs? Your city sees to it. How can you tell if your city is doing its job? By your city's Workable Program.

The Workable Program is a set of requirements. The requirements show that your city is doing its job. That's all the Workable Program does. You don't get any money out of it. But your city has to have a Workable Program to get in on the following Federal programs: all the HUD programs you use with urban renewal only (Table II); grants for code enforcement and demolition of unsafe buildings; housing for low and moderate income families (221) and(221(d)(3)); and low-rent public housing.

What are the Workable Program requirements?

- The first requirement is codes and ordinances. The housing code is especially important, since your city uses it to get property owners to repair and rehabilitate their buildings and clean up their yards. The housing code also tells how many people can live in a building, how many bathrooms the building should have, how many windows, and what is an adequate heating system. Your city can use code enforcement grants (Table I) to help pay for enforcing the housing code.

* The full name is Workable Program for Community Improvement.

Aside from buildings that have to be condemned, your city usually enforces the housing code in certain parts of the city at a time. This way, a particular neighborhood can repair all its buildings at the same time. The city doesn't enforce the housing code in areas that will be cleared by urban renewal since the cost of the repairs would make the property more expensive for the city to buy. Besides, it wouldn't make sense for the owner to spend money on a major repair if his building would be torn down in a few years. However, your city can require that the buildings are at least not dangerous to the people living in them. Your city can set minimum standards and require temporary repairs on buildings that will be cleared in urban renewal areas.

Besides the housing code, your city has to have building, plumbing, electrical and fire prevention codes. These four codes set health and safety standards for new buildings and major building repairs. So, while the building code covers new buildings, the housing code covers existing buildings.

Your city enforces building, plumbing, electrical, and fire prevention codes on new buildings. In addition, your city has a codes review committee to keep all the codes up to date and to decide how and where the city should enforce the housing code. This committee makes a report in the Annual Review of Progress your city sends to HUD to get your Workable Program recertified each year.

- The second Workable Program requirement is the comprehensive community plan. See the next section in this booklet on Comprehensive Planning.

- The third requirement is Neighborhood Analyses. This means your city divides the community into neighborhoods--residential, commercial, and industrial--and studies each neighborhood at a time. One neighborhood might need the housing code enforced there. Another neighborhood might need its street layout changed. Still another neighborhood might need many of its buildings cleared away. From neighborhood analyses, you can see where your city needs urban renewal projects first, where you need to enforce the housing code first, and where you need to put in community facilities, or, public improvements, like streets and schools. Your city can use the Urban Planning Assistance Program (701) in Table I to help pay for its neighborhood analyses.

If neighborhood analyses sounds to you like the Community Renewal Program (Title I) in Table II, you're right. They're the same idea of planning for more than one urban renewal project at a time. The Community Renewal Program (CRP) is usually a bigger study than neighborhood analyses and has more detail. A large city might use a CRP to make one of its studies just on relocation housing. Another study might look at the needs of displaced families for jobs and education.

You remember in the section on urban renewal, we said your city has to have a local public agency (LPA) to do urban renewal. Your city may also have a local planning agency. Your local public agency (LPA) is probably your Urban Renewal Agency. Your local planning agency is probably the Planning Department of your city government. Now, your Planning Department--or a planning consultant, if your city doesn't have its own planner--does your neighborhood analysis, or your Community Renewal Program, if you have one. Your Urban Renewal Agency (LPA) carries out your urban renewal projects. Confused? Wait, there's more.

An agency usually has paid professional people who work full time. Then, with the agency, such as your city's Planning Department, there will also be a planning commission or board. Your Urban Renewal Agency also has an urban renewal commission or board. The people on the commissions or boards serve without pay. Your mayor and city council appoint them.

Why do you want to know about these boards or commissions and agencies? Here's why: Say you want to know where your city plans to do its next urban renewal project. You go to your Planning Department (local planning agency). Say you think this next project should be someplace different. You go to your planning commission or board. You would want to go to the planning commission, since it makes recommendations on plans for urban renewal to your city council.

Say you want to know how far along a certain urban renewal project is. You go to your Urban Renewal Agency (LPA) and ask. Say you think more of the property in that project could be rehabilitated than the city has planned. Even though your city council has adopted an urban renewal plan for that project, plans, like codes and ordinances, can be amended. So, you go to your urban renewal commission or board, since it makes recommendations on urban renewal projects to your city council.

To meet this third Workable Program requirement, your local planning agency makes a report on Neighborhood Analyses in the Annual Review of Progress your city sends to HUD.

- The fourth Workable Program requirement is administrative organization. By now, you've noticed your city needs more than one Agency or Department to do its Workable Program. Yet, all seven Workable Program requirements go together. So, what your city has to do is have a program coordinator. This coordinator might be called your Urban Renewal Coordinator. Or it might be your mayor. Or it could even be a committee.

The program coordinator would be the best person for you to talk to if you wanted to know how your city's Workable Program was coming along. The coordinator makes sure the city has enough staff people to do the jobs, especially the jobs of code enforcement and of enforcing your city's zoning and subdivision regulations (see the section on Comprehensive Planning). If your city needs to hire new people to work on the Workable Program requirements, your program coordinator tells the mayor and city council.

- The fifth requirement is financing. How will your city pay for the urban renewal or public housing or code enforcement or public improvements it plans to do in your community?

Under your city's comprehensive plan, you have a public improvements program, that is, a list of the streets, sewers, schools, parks, utilities, fire stations, and public buildings your city will need for many years to come.

Also, under your comprehensive plan is a capital improvements budget. This is a six year budget of the public improvements your city needs (according to your public improvements program) along with how much each improvement costs and how much money the city expects to have each year to pay for the improvements.

Finally, looking at the public improvements program and at the capital improvements budget, your city adopts an annual operating budget. What HUD checks in this Workable Program requirement is to see that your city really is looking ahead at the improvements it will need in the future and how your city plans to pay for them.

The sixth Workable Program requirement is housing for displaced families. That means your city has to help displaced families find decent housing at a price they can afford. Displaced families are people who have to move not only because of urban renewal and highway or other government construction, but also because they lived in an unsafe or overcrowded building (according to the housing code) or because their income got too high for them to stay in public housing.

Your city has to help relocate all these displaced people. You may have a special relocation office, or, housing referral service. Whatever agency handles relocation, your city has relocation assistants to work with each family that has to move. Relocation assistants help families fill out forms to get their relocation payments of up to $200 for moving expenses, to get their relocation adjustment payment (RAP) of up to $500 if they need it, and to find a decent place to live.

To meet this sixth Workable Program requirement, your city has to have records of how many people will be displaced in the next few years and of what housing there is for them to move to.

- The seventh Workable Program requirement is citizen participation. Your mayor appoints people to an official Citizens Advisory Committee (CAC). The people are supposed to represent all community interests: business, labor, civic, church; education, health and welfare agencies; minority groups and neighborhood groups. And your mayor also appoints people to an official Subcommittee on Minority Group Housing. The people on this committee are supposed to represent minority groups also, and builders, lenders, realtors, and housing officials.

A Citizens Advisory Committee (CAC) and its Subcommittee on Minority Group Housing, and any other subcommittees your CAC sets up will have anywhere from a dozen to ninety members or more. The size of the CAC depends on the size of your city.

The Citizens Advisory Committee is a way for private citizens to help your city government work for better housing and neighborhoods. There are two ways the CAC works. First, the CAC works as a group. The CAC might recommend new public housing to the mayor to help relocate displaced families. Or the CAC might hold meetings open to the public to explain urban renewal.

Second, members of the Citizens Advisory Committee work as individuals. A CAC member might talk with a City Councilman about a housing code enforcement program, asking the councilman his views and giving him information about how a nearby city enforced its housing code. Another CAC member might talk with a lender about making mortgage loans to people who want to rehabilitate their homes.

The Subcommittee on Minority Group Housing also works as a group to hold meetings and to make recommendations to the Citizens Advisory Committee. And members of the Subcommittee work as individuals to help minority families find housing, land, and home loans.

The Citizens Advisory Committee has a secretary to keep minutes of its meetings. CAC's generally meet once a month. Subcommittees also keep minutes. Subcommittees generally meet more often than the CAC. The Citizens Advisory Committee chooses a chairman and may also have an Executive Committee to coordinate the subcommittees. And the CAC chooses the chairman for each subcommittee. Besides the Subcommittee on Minority Group Housing, you might have subcommittees on public information, on home financing, on downtown development, and on urban renewal.

The mayor sees that the Citizens Advisory Committee and the subcommittees have staff assistance. The staff may be city employees or volunteers or both. The staff people help the Citizens Advisory Committee and the subcommittees get the information they need. For information on comprehensive planning, zoning and subdivision regulations, and the public improvements program, your city can use Urban Planning Assistance (701) grants to prepare materials for city public meetings. The CAC can use the materials for its own meetings as well.

COMPREHENSIVE PLANNING

What is comprehensive planning? What's a comprehensive community plan? A master plan? A general plan? A future development plan?

Planning has been different things at different times. At one time, a plan was a map of streets, utilities, and public buildings that the city planned to build in the next five years. Later the plan included private land use as well as public: residential, commercial, and industrial land.

Then, to find out how much land the city would need for homes, businesses, and industries, the plan included a study of what the future population might be and how many people would be working in the businesses and factories.

The time came when the city had to protect the land people used for homes and the land for businesses and industries. So, along with the plan was a zoning ordinance.

The city had traffic problems. So, it had to plan the streets as well as the land uses. And the city had to plan for the schools and parks and fire stations the people would need, too. So, the plan included these community facilities.

To m ake sure the new homes people bought had streets and utilities and large enough lot sizes, the plan included subdivision regulations.

And because the city couldn't afford all the new schools and fire stations it needed at once, the plan included a public improvements program to tell which community facilities the city would build first. The city was growing so fast, the plan had to cover not just the next five years, but the next twenty.

Now, the comprehensive community plan, as required under the Workable Program, has these six parts:

1) Land use plan
2) Major street plan
3) Community facilities plan
4) Zoning ordinance
5) Subdivision regulations
6) Public Improvements Program

The land use, street, and community facilities plans are based on studies of the population and the economy of your community. Some comprehensive plans also include a housing study or neighborhood analyses. Some plans also include an annexation study. Your city, county, state, or metropolitan planning agency can use urban planning assistance (701) grants (Table I) to help pay for preparing your comprehensive community plan.

Your city government has to adopt the zoning ordinance and the subdivision regulations as law. The zoning ordinance tells which land, by zone or district, you can use for a single family home, a duplex, an apartment, a retail store, a warehouse, a cleaners, a factory, a school, a park, or a farm. The zoning ordinance also tells you how much of your property you can build on, how far back from the street, side and back of the lot, and how high your building can be. And the zoning ordinance tells you how many parking spaces, on and off the street, you must have. The zoning ordinance doesn't tell whether you can build with brick or wood; that's in the building code.

The subdivision regulations tell you what size lot, layout of lot, streets, sidewalks, sewers, curbs and gutters, and utilities you have to have.

Your city council uses its police power to enforce the zoning ordinance and the subdivision regulations. First, your planning commission reviews subdivisions. Then they are approved by your city council. And your planning commission or zoning commission, if you have one, reviews petitions to amend the zoning ordinance. For example, a person may want to build a carwash in a residential zone. Then, the decision whether to amend the zoning ordinance for this person is up to the city council.

Under the Workable Program, your city may or may not adopt the other four parts of the plan, since the land use plan, major street plan, community facilities plan, and public improvements program don't have to become law. Your city may adopt an official map that shows where future streets will go. Your city uses the public improvements program to make a six-year capital improvements budget and, from that budget, your city adopts its annual operating budget.

FEDERAL COVERAGE OF EQUAL HOUSING OPPORTUNITY

There are two ways the Federal Government prohibits discrimination in Federally-aided housing: 1) President's Executive Order No. 11063, EQUAL OPPORTUNITY IN HOUSING and 2) Title VI of The Civil Rights Act of 1964.

TABLE III. FEDERAL COVERAGE OF EQUAL HOUSING OPPORTUNITY

Executive Order	Title VI	not covered
HOUSING OWNED OR OPERATED BY THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT, e.g., FHA- and VA-acquired properties (repossessed).	Also covers housing owned or operated by the Federal Government.	FHA and VA housing that is one- or two-family owner-occupied before foreclosure (repossession) or after foreclosure by lender but before Federal government has acquired title to the property. Lenders benefitting from the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation or the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation: (conventional housing loans by) savings and loan associations, commercial banks, and mutual savings banks. Even if Federal coverage were extended to FOIC and FSLIC lenders, the following lenders would still not be covered: (Conventional housing loans by) insurance companies pensions funds, non-financial corporations, and individuals.
HOUSING PROVIDED FEDERALLY INSURED OR GUARANTEED LOANS, e.g., FHA-insured and VA guaranteed housing except one- or two-family owner-occupied, after Nov. 20, 1962. This covers builders and developers who sell to FHA and VA buyers, and home financing institutions making FHA and VA loans (mostly mortgage bankers).	Does not cover FHA-insured and VA-guaranteed housing.
HOUSING PROVIDED ON FEDERALLY-ASSISTED URBAN RENEWAL PROPERTY after Nov. 20, 1962: This covers local urban renewal agencies (LPA's). This does not cover conventionally financed private builders.	Covers urban renewal property after Jan. 3, 1965, including conventionally financed private builders in urban renewal areas.
HOUSING AIDED BY FEDERAL LOANS, GRANTS, ADVANCES, OR CONTRIBUTIONS (SUBSIDIES), e.g., public housing, college housing, senior citizens housing, after Nov. 20, 1962. Agencies of HUD are supposed to end discrimination in existing Federally-aided housing by using their good offices and other action permitted by law.	Covers existing public housing, as well as new public housing, college housing, senior citizens housing.

Many people think the Civil Rights Act prohibits discrimination in the sale, rental, or use of FHA-insured or VA guaranteed housing. It does not. Title VI excludes Federal programs involving a contract of insurance or guaranty. But the Executive Order does cover FHA-insured and VA-guaranteed housing (except one- or two-family owner occupied).

Besides housing, Title VI also covers Federal programs that affect your neighborhood, including loan and grant programs of the Community Facilities Administration and non-housing facilities in urban renewal projects. However, Title VI does not prohibit discrimination in the Urban Planning Assistance Program (701) or in the selection of public housing or urban renewal project sites. You have some protection on project sites, though, since the Housing Assistance Administration and the Urban Renewal Administration review project sites for their possible impact on minority groups.

Anyone who suffers discrimination in a Federally-aided housing or neighborhood program--whether covered by Title VI or by the Executive Order--complains to the agency within HUD that administers the program. Suppose your local housing authority denies you admission to public housing because of your race. You send a written complaint to the Housing Assistance Administration (HAA). HAA lets you know they have received your complaint. Then HAA checks with your housing authority and tries to persuade them to admit you, if you are qualified to live in public housing, of course. If your housing authority still refuses to admit you, even though they have a vacancy, your housing authority gets a hearing. If they have violated Title VI, then HAA notifies the appropriate congressional committees. After thirty days, HAA cuts off Federal funds to your housing authority.

Another thing the Housing Assistance Administration could do in the example above is refer the violation of Title VI to the Department of Justice for legal action. If you suffer discrimination under an FHA-insured or VA-guaranteed program, the violation is covered by the Executive Order only. But your complain procedure is the same as under Title VI, and the sanctions of the Federal agencies are the same. The only difference is that FHA or VA would not have to contact congressional committees before cutting off a builder or a lender from FHA or VA benefits. Under the Executive Order, FHA or VA could also refer violations to the Justice Department.

Federal coverage of equal housing opportunity, including existing and new public housing, FHA and VA-aided housing (after Nov. 20, 1962), FHA and VA-acquired properties, senior citizens housing, and other Federally-aided housing, amounts to less than 3 percent of our total housing supply in the United States. Also, "the rate at which we are now increasing nondiscrimination coverage of the total housing supply is only 1/2 of 1 percent annually."*

PROGRAMS THAT A COMMUNITY ACTION COMMITTEE CAN USE

Is there a Community Action Program (War on Poverty) in your county? If so, your Community Action Committee can use funds from the Office of Economic Opportunity for better homes and neighborhoods. Here are a few of the ways you can use your Community Action Program for better housing:

I. To help people improve their homes
   A. Home management services to help low income families with budgeting, food preparation, sewing, decorating, and care of the home.
   B. Assistance to families from rural areas in meeting problems of urban living.
   C. Money for materials for home repair.
   D. Training unemployed people in rehabilitation skills.

II. To help people improve their neighborhoods
   A. Junior inspectors to help your city enforce the housing code.
   B. Neighborhood Youth Corps enrollees to work on beautification projects.
   C. VISTA's (Volunteers in Service to America) to do housing surveys and help out generally with housing problems.
   D. Work-Study students to serve as community service aides.

III. To help people move to better housing
   A. Relocation assistance to low income families living in substandard housing outside of urban renewal areas and families who couldn't find public housing to meet their needs.
   B. Development of cooperative organizations to plan housing rehabilitation and construction for low income families.
   C. Consumer counseling for low income families.
   D. Legal services in low income areas.

Community Action Programs for better housing are limited only by your imagination. In addition, your Community Action Agency can work with your housing authority to help make low-rent public housing a stepping-stone for low income families. And your Community Action Program can tie in with urban renewal activities, as well. (See the sections in Part II on Relocation Assistance and on Coordination with anti-poverty programs.)

DEMONSTRATION CITIES

While the 1966 Demonstration Cities bill was still before Congress, a radio announcer remarked that the bill was not for cities that had had demonstrations. Rather, the bill was a proposal for cities to "demonstrate" ways to rebuild large slum and blighted areas and to provide the public facilities and services necessary to improve the general welfare of the people who live and work in these areas.

A city's demonstration program uses all available Federal aids (not only from HUD, but also from Office of Economic Opportunity, Department of Labor, Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, Bureau of Public Roads, Bureau of Outdoor Recreation, and others) as well as local private and public resources to improve a whole neighborhood.

If your city is chosen by HUD for a demonstration program, your city can get grants for 80% of your city's share of the cost of its Federal programs. For example, your city may be paying one-third of the cost of an urban renewal project. The amount of demonstration cities money your city can get would be 80% of your city's one-third share of the project cost.

HUD tells you which Federal programs your city can include in your demonstration program. Then, you add up your city's share of the cost of all those Federal programs. Your demonstration cities grant, then, is 80% of your city's share of your Federal aid programs.

But once you figure out how much the demonstration grant is, your city doesn't have to spend the grant on those Federal programs. Not at all. In fact, the first thing your city does is figure out what new or existing nonfederally assisted programs it wants. You can use all the money for these nonfederal programs if you want to, so long as HUD approves the programs as part of your demonstration cities plan. Here's what some of those programs might be:

grants for rehabilitation of multifamily structures revolving fund for purchase and rehabilitation of housing increased level of garbage collection police-community relations program training unemployed in rehabilitation skills additional "Head Start" activities beyond what is available from Community Action Program improving and equipping neighborhood playgrounds

There's a second kind of grant your city uses under the demonstration cities program. That is a grant of up to 80 percent to administer the demonstration program. But you can't use these grants to administer the Federal programs you already have.

And there's a third kind of grant. This is a grant of up to 80 percent of the cost of making your city's plan for your demonstration program. All three grants go to your city's demonstration agency, chosen by your city government.

What if your city doesn't have a demonstration program? How, then, can the program benefit you? In two ways: first, you can keep an eye on the city nearest you that has a demonstration program. You can see whether your neighbor city is able to help the people in the slum area get not only decent low-cost housing, but also the health, education, employment, transportation, and recreation facilities and services they need. You can see whether there is widespread citizen participation in the program and whether residents of the slum area are employed in the demonstration cities program. You can benefit from the successes and failures of your neighbor city.

Second, if you live in a metropolitan area, you may have a "metropolitan expediter." This person can assist your community with information on Federal programs and on demonstration programs in other cities. This person might especially help with the need for low-cost housing not only in your own city, but among the several cities in your metropolitan area.

The demonstration cities program and the metropolitan expediter are two of many provisions of the Demonstration Cities and Metropolitan Development Act of 1966, signed into law by the President on November 3, 1966.*

AGENCIES TO WRITE FOR INFORMATION

If you want general information on Federal housing and neighborhood programs, write:

Department of Housing and Urban Development
Washington, D. C. 20410

If you want information on a particular program of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) or an agency within HUD, such as Community Facilities Administration (CFA), Housing Assistance Administration (HAA), or Urban Renewal Administration (URA) write to the agency at the HUD regional office.

If you live in Virginia, write:

(the agency within HUD, or, just HUD)
Region II
Widener Building
Philadelphia, Pennsylvania 19107

If you live in Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, or Tennessee, write:

(the agency)
Region III
Peachtree-Seventh Building
Atlanta, Georgia 30323

If you live in Arkansas, Louisiana, or Texas write:

(the agency)
Region V
300 W. Vickery Boulevard
Fort Worth, Texas 76104

For the address of the FHA insuring office serving you, write your FHA regional office. FHA also has field offices. A field office is a kind of branch insuring office, except the field office can't approve lenders or loans or handle discrimination complaints. The field office does accept FHA applications, though, and does inspect property.

You may want information on some Federal programs not covered in this booklet:

In the Community Facilities Administration:

Advance Acquisition of Land
Advances for Public Works Planning
College Housing Program
Grants for Basic Water and Sewer Facilities
Public Facility Loans

In the Federal Housing Administration:
Mortgage Insurance for Nursing Homes
Home Mortgage Insurance in areas of violence or civil disorders (new program)
221(d)(3) assistance in buying low-cost rehabilitated homes (new program)
Mortgage Insurance for new communities (new program)
Mortgage Insurance for group practice facilities (new program for doctors, dentists, and optometrists)

In the Urban Renewal Administration:
Urban Renewal Service (technical assistance to cities and publications for the general public)

In Housing and Urban Development:
Community Development Training Program (Title VIII, Housing Act of 1964) for public officials Preservation of Historic Structures (new program)
Urban Information and Technical Assistance (new program)
Metropolitan Expediters (new program)
"Incentive" Planning Grants (new program)

And in the Farmers Home Administration, U.S. Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C. 20250:
Financial Assistance to Small Towns and Rural Groups
Housing for Senior Citizens
Loans for Farm Labor Housing
Loans for Recreational Purposes
Rural Housing Loans
Rural Renewal Loans to Public Agencies
Direct Housing Loans for purchase of newly constructed homes (new program)

And Director, Division of Adult Education Programs, Office of Education, Department of Health, Education and Welfare, Washington, D. C. 20202:
Community Service and Continuing Education Programs (Title I, Higher Education Act of 1965) for citizen groups and universities

STATE ASSISTANCE FOR COMMUNITY IMPROVEMENT

Most states help their cities and counties with programs for better homes and neighborhoods. There are many ways states can provide this help: 1) enabling legislation for planning, public housing, urban renewal, and codes and ordinances; 2) help in applying for Federal aids; 3) money to supplement Federal aid programs; 4) help in preparing comprehensive plans, budgets, codes, and other elements of the Workable Program; 5) training for local public officials; and 6) community education for citizens.

States can use Federal aids to help pay for assistance to communities: the Urban Planning Assistance Program (701), Urban Renewal Demonstration Program (314), and other programs.

For small communities that can't provide basic city services, here's how your state can help:*

1) develop accounting and budget system; 2) suggest how to augment existing revenue program through such revenues as an occupational tax, a fee charge for refuse collection, a parking fee and a property tax re-evaluation; 3) joint city-county agreements for such activities as sanitation, road improvements, and code enforcement; 4) consolidation with a neighboring city for public housing; 5) establish- an area planning agency to plan for a group of communities; and 6) utilize Federal and state loans and grants in such areas as the accelerated public works program, community facility loans and advances, and area redevelopment assistance.

For communities that can provide city services but don't want to use codes and ordinances, here's what your state can do:

1) assist the citizens advisory committee to become the motivating force in the community; 2) provide information to citizen groups; 3) arrange for meetings to discuss the issues of code enforcement openly, in the hopes of changing community attitudes.

---

* This section is based on Commonwealth and Community, The Kentucky Program of State Assistance for Community Improvement, Division of Planning and Zoning, Department of Commerce, Commonwealth of Kentucky.

And for communities that can provide city services and want to use codes and ordinances but need assistance, your state can do these things:

> 1) provide resource personnel to the advisory committees; 2) train the local codes inspectors; 3) start an urban renewal project; 4) help carry out the comprehensive plan; 5) prepare a capital budget; and 6) develop housing facilities to meet specific needs of minority families and senior citizens.

In addition, your state can hold state-wide meetings to get communities interested in housing and neighborhood improvement, regional meetings to explain an element of the Workable Program, sub-regional workshops to help communities with a common problem, such as code enforcement, and training institutes for housing, code enforcement, and renewal officials.

Finally, your state can be a resource center of information not only on state and Federal programs, but also on how to get qualified officials and consultants for your community and on how to organize associations of planning and redevelopment officials.

CITY HUMAN RELATIONS COMMISSION

This section of the booklet lists programs and activities that a city human relations commission, biracial committee, or whatever it's called in your city, can undertake for open housing and neighborhood improvement. But more important than the programs and activities is the approach, or philosophy, of the human relations commission.

The philosophy of the city human relations commission should be this: 1) the programs of the commission will pass, as soon as possible, from the commission to a permanent department of city government; and 2) community leaders will be involved at all times in planning, carrying out, and evaluating these programs.

The commission can measure part of its success, then, by the programs it passes on to city government departments, such as enforcement of a city open occupancy ordinance by a commission. But behind the government departments, programs, and ordinances, must be the commitment of community leaders, a favorable climate of public opinion, and cooperation of the people directly involved in open housing, that is, the lenders, developers, builders, and real estate agents.

There should be no need to remind a human relations commission of the futility of only waiting until problems become drastic before taking action. Beyond that limited approach, the commission must seek to have its activities become part of permanent local government and must involve community leaders in its programs. Community leaders come not only from local government, business, religious groups, and social welfare agencies, but also from civil rights and equal opportunity organizations, such as the Urban League, National Conference of Christians and Jews, American Civil Liberties Union, Congress of Racial Equality (CORE), National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), and the American Friends Service Committee.

Here, now, are some activities and programs a city human relations commission with a budget, continuing membership, and professional staff can undertake for housing and neighborhood improvement:

1. Neighborhood Councils. Also called Community Councils, these groups help people in neighborhoods communicate their needs to city government. These councils can be especially helpful when a neighborhood is changing in racial composition. The rest of the time the councils work for better schools, recreation, and cultural programs to make their neighborhoods more attractive and livable.

   The city human relations commission can organize these neighborhood councils and get schools, churches, social agencies, and civic leaders involved in neighborhood improvement programs.

2. Direct efforts:

   --meeting with real estate agents to discuss the need to give Negroes free choice in buying or renting property any place in the city.

--recommend that "block-busting" for the purpose of promoting panic selling be included among the unethical practices for which real estate licenses may be revoked by the state real estate board.

--recommend that mayor and city council pass an ordinance that would provide for open occupancy in private housing.

--efforts to make assignment of tenants to public housing on the basis of availability and applicant choice.

--curtailment of panic selling on a block in the city after a Negro family moves in.

--end of listing or publicizing of any racial restrictions on property for sale or rent.

3. Efforts to promote and encourage:

--organization and development of block clubs for neighborhood improvement.

--door-to-door surveys to gain information and enlist citizen support of block clubs and neighborhood projects.

--a thorough program of code enforcement to be carried out by inspectors from city departments.

--"housing clinics," to which tenants, landlords, and developers can turn for advice on improving homes.

--recruitment of a corps of retired persons to serve as consultants on construction and finance problems.

--a continuous project of neighborhood beautification.

--communication and cooperation in the solution of neighborhood problems of all kinds.

--raising the educational and cultural level of the poor through closer cooperation between the schools and the social, recreational, and health agencies.

4. Other recommendations:

--support of state level fair housing legislation as well as local.

--seek commitment of real estate agents and organizations to implement freedom of choice in housing.

--Recommend improvements in the appearance of public housing; scattered sites for new projects; use of leased-housing without regard to the racial composition of the neighborhood; programs for participation by tenants in community life.

--ask cooperation of welfare department in helping recipients find good housing in any neighborhood, regardless of race, and in reporting discriminatory practices of real estate brokers.

--ask same cooperation from relocation agency under the city's urban renewal program.

--recommend that lenders provide equal service and lend mortgage money to all qualified families, without regard to race, for the purchase of housing in any neighborhood they desire.

--ask expressed commitment by leaders of organized religious communities to the principle of open housing.

--ask support by businessmen, bankers, planning commissions, and labor unions for fair housing, including education of members of their organizations on the importance to them of fair housing.

--provide for a board of leaders from government, business, industry, religion, real estate, labor, the civil rights movement, and the news media to hold conferences on fair housing problems, prepare fair housing legislation, and evaluate other public and private fair housing programs.

5. Other programs to recommend to the city government:

--social development program for rural immigrants.

--model school in the slums.

--property tax revision study.

--public policy against discrimination.

URBAN RENEWAL NEIGHBORHOOD ORGANIZATION

Even before people start to take part in the city's plans for improving their homes and neighborhoods, the city officials can adopt certain attitudes so that their plans will really be for those people most directly affected by them.

The director of an urban renewal agency, for example, can take attitudes like these:

--My agency will emphasize involving the residents of the urban renewal area continuously in all phases of renewal activity.

--The plan for my urban renewal project will be based on the suggestions of the city's planning department and the suggestions coming from many conferences and discussions I will have with representatives from the urban renewal area.

--Of major importance to the urban renewal project will be the participation of an organized, representative citizens' group, or, neighborhood organization from the urban renewal area.

--My agency will provide for continuous review of the urban renewal plan, as it is carried out, by working with interested groups and community organizations to respond to changing conditions in the urban renewal area.

Along with these attitudes, the urban renewal director can take measures to carry out the citizen participation and involvement he's talking about. Here's what he can do:

--Hire a community organization specialist* to work closely with the various organizations that serve the urban renewal area and win their support for the project.

--Canvass the urban renewal area to try to get both homeowners and tenants to form a neighborhood organization, an organization that can learn about the urban renewal project, comment on and criticize the plan, set goals for the urban renewal project, and help shape the kind of neighborhood the people want to live in.

* Such persons as social workers or teachers can fill this position

--Prepare a slide talk for larger business and civic clubs in the city to show why the project area needs renewal, what the city can do about it, how much the renewal will cost, and how the area could look after it is renewed.

--Assist a subcommittee of the neighborhood organization, or, citizens' group in evaluating which homes in the project area can be repaired or rehabilitated and describe in detail the standards for sound housing.

--Meet with city departments and Federal officials whose programs might be used by the residents of the urban renewal area.

--Encourage the various organizations serving the renewal area to get together to support the urban renewal project and to say they support it at public hearings held by the city council.

What are the benefits of the urban renewal neighborhood organization? The benefits to the city are time and expense saved in acquiring property, in getting owners to comply with city codes, in winning approval from the general public for a neighborhood so interested in self-improvement, and in speedily eliminating slums and blight from the city and increasing the tax base.

The benefits to the residents of the urban renewal area are a sense of dignity and individual worth from participating in their government and setting goals for their project -- a feeling that makes for pride of home and upkeep of neighborhood. These are examples of goals that might come from citizen participation: a residential neighborhood for families of varying income; retaining all residential buildings that can be brought up to standard; changing the appearance of unsightly public utilities; and the recommendation that all redevelopment in the area be carried out under the sponsorship of organizations serving the renewal area.

RELOCATION ASSISTANCE

Even before a public agency undertakes a program for better housing, that agency can solicit the cooperation of other agencies whose programs have a bearing on the success of any effort for housing improvement.

The relocation officials for a city's urban renewal program, for example, can help displaced families not only by finding them decent housing, but also by helping the families with the other needs they have to meet in order to keep up their new housing. A family or individual may not know about social security or a pension fund he's entitled to. A mother may not know about welfare benefits or health or family planning assistance. A high school dropout may need a job to be able to buy a pair of shoes, so that he won't be ashamed to go to school. A father may need job training so that he can support his family. A couple may need a marriage license to be eligible to live in public housing. An aspiring homeowner may need help in getting a mortgage loan.

Relocation officials can begin their program by visiting the local social security, welfare, health, and employment offices, informing them of their plans, and asking their cooperation in helping displaced families.

The relocation assistant, working from a site office in the urban renewal area, begins "in the street." He walks around the neighborhood, says hello, gets to know the people in the area and win their trust. He explains how the people will be able to find a decent house. He may make a survey of the educational level of the residents and, seeing the need, may start an adult education class right in the site office. He'll tell mothers about a Head Start preschool program for their children. Or he may ask the city for a daycare center to free mothers for work.

Beyond cooperating with other public agencies to help displaced families, relocation officials can also seek help from private groups. The Salvation Army may provide clothing for needy families. Boy Scouts may pass out circulars announcing a neighborhood meeting. Church groups may supply toys for needy children at Christmas. This, then, is how relocation assistance can work.

COORDINATION WITH ANTI-POVERTY PROGRAMS

Even before a local government starts to consider the needs of its citizens for better housing, that government can also consider the needs of those citizens for jobs, job training, and education as well.

Day care, adult education, Manpower Development and Training, On-the-Job Training, Neighborhood Youth Corps, vocational training, Head Start, Upward Bound--these are the kinds of programs that can attack some of the worst causes of slums and blight, the poverty of the residents.

Anti-poverty and other Federal aid programs can go together in a community to make urban renewal and housing programs a success. Neighborhood organization can get residents involved; relocation assistance can help residents take advantage of existing community resources; but a program that sets out from the start to meet all the needs of its citizens promises the most lasting results and the best return on the city's investment in its people.

A successful program for housing and neighborhood improvement requires:

A coordinator for all of the Federal and local programs the city is using.

An intensive program of public education: citywide meetings, neighborhood meetings, newsletter, newspaper publicity, and community education in the schools, if possible.

Involving the elected city officials, public and private agencies, community leaders, and minority groups in the plans and programs.

Such a program, using as many as possible Federal, local, and private resources with a central coordinator and broad citizen involvement is the model for the Demonstration Cities Program authorized by Congress.

NEIGHBORHOOD ORGANIZATION

What is a neighborhood organization?

Who organizes it?

What is a neighborhood organization concerned with?

How does it act?

What is a neighborhood organization?

A neighborhood organization is a group of citizens involved in their government. The organization covers a small geographical area where as few as 100 or as many as several thousand people live. The members of the organization represent the different kinds of people living in the neighborhood--such as the businessmen, the teachers, and the civic leaders. The organization serves any or all of the physical and social needs of the people in the neighborhood.

A neighborhood organization differs from a private social welfare agency in that the members are helping themselves rather than receiving help. Unlike a community council that only communicates between local government agencies and people in the neighborhood, the neighborhood organization goes on to give its support to needed local government programs or to take direct action to demand the local programs or services it needs.

A neighborhood organization is very much like a citizens housing association, or citizens renewal council. The main difference is geographical, since the citizens housing association covers not just a neighborhood, but the whole city. A second difference is that the citizens housing association may be interested in housing and in overall planning but not in a specific school program, for example. The neighborhood organization could be interested in a specific school program as well as housing programs, neighborhood planning, and many other community needs.

A neighborhood organization differs from a fair housing committee in that the committee is mainly interested in equally available housing, equal city services, and racially inclusive neighborhoods, but not necessarily in neighborhood planning or new kinds of social services. However, many fair housing committees grow into neighborhood organizations and, after doing so, find they can do more for equal housing opportunity than they could before.

Who organizes it?

Who is responsible for organizing a neighborhood, anyway? Whose job is it to see that citizens are involved and truly represented in their government? Is it the responsibility of housing, planning, and renewal officials? We know they are capable. But these officials have to answer to the elected officials who pass the laws and pay for the programs. So, aren't the elected officials really responsible? But the elected officials get support for their programs from the people. So, must not the people demand neighborhood organization by the local government? Yet, to demand neighborhood organization by local government, the people need to be organized in the first place, if they are to be heard.

How about the church? Isn't there a moral obligation for the church to help people improve themselves and their neighborhood? What about labor unions? They're experienced in organization and direct action. And what about the civic clubs that have traditionally helped to improve the quality of local government?

Any of these people or institutions can be responsible for organizing a neighborhood. Who ought to be responsible? You ought to. Any citizen who's concerned about his government and his neighborhood ought to feel responsible for organizing his neighborhood. Community groups like churches, labor unions, civil rights groups or human relations councils, are especially good at it.

Others who can organize a neighborhood include local government, through urban renewal (as in Part II), anti-poverty programs, a city human relations commission, or a voter registration project; university urban extension; an existing citizen group that serves a larger area or different purpose; or a few interested and informed individuals.

- What is a neighborhood organization concerned with?

Generally, the neighborhood organization is concerned with the quality of the neighborhood, both the physical environment and the social services.

The particular issue of a neighborhood organization depends on what the neighborhood needs. It might be the need for better garbage pickup or removing junk cars, paving the street or putting in sewers, or changing the zoning to keep a gas station out. It might be neighborhood planning that is needed, more adequate housing, a recreation center, or better school programs. Or the neighborhood organization might be concerned with a program of city government, such as urban renewal.

One very common issue for a neighborhood organization is housing code enforcement. In fact, the way the housing code is enforced is such an important issue that a community group may have its own program to deal with code enforcement before beginning a program of neighborhood organization. (See Part Four)

- How does it act?

How does the neighborhood organization go after the physical and social services and programs it needs? There are at least four popular methods: First is the community agency approach. The neighborhood organization gets both public and private agencies to offer experimental programs in homemaking, education, housing, and relocation. This method stresses individual self-improvement.

A second way for a neighborhood organization to get the programs and services it needs is to try working in close cooperation with local government agencies through community councils. Urban extension, a third method, helps the neighborhood organization cooperate with local government and also provides professional assistance to the residents to help them plan the programs they want. A fourth method--you might just call it a militant approach--for a neighborhood organization includes using professional help and direct action, such as a march to city hall, to get the programs the people need.

The four methods overlap, as you can see, and each has its merits. People who want to improve their neighborhoods need to show self-improvement, but they also need professional help to get community improvements. Neighborhood organizations need to work cooperatively with local government and support its programs. But where cooperation doesn't bring results, direct action can be essential.

Whatever method a neighborhood organization uses, it needs three things: strength, money, and facts. An organization needs to be strong, strong enough to hold regular meetings with planned programs, adopt bylaws, elect officers, and deal with the issues that people are most concerned with. The organization needs money, money for speakers, consultants, publications, and, if at all possible, professional staff. Most important, the neighborhood organization needs facts, facts to avoid mistakes and to win support for the programs it wants.

NONPROFIT HOUSING

Churches, labor unions, and other community groups with substantial financial backing are, more and more today, sponsoring new and rehabilitated rental and cooperative housing for low and moderate income families.

Besides getting housing built, community groups often accomplish other things while they are sponsoring nonprofit housing projects, for example, new community center facilities; job training and employment of neighborhood people in the construction; better public schools in the neighborhood; beautification and new recreation areas; and a change in the community's segregated housing patterns.

The Federal Housing Administration insures 100% mortgage loans for low-and moderate-income housing under section 221(d)(3) at market interest rates and below market interest rates. Section 221(d)(3) also provides for rent supplements for certain low income families and a new experimental program to assist low-income families in buying rehabilitated homes. Tenants can buy membership in cooperative projects. Rent supplement tenants can buy membership in cooperatives, too, or get a lease with an option to purchase an individual unit in the 221(d)(3) project.

What does substantial backing mean for a nonprofit sponsor? For a one million dollar housing project, for example, a nonprofit sponsor would have to be able to raise $40,000 to $50,000. This is seed money. It goes for FHA application fees, legal fees, organizational expenses, engineering and architectural drawings, and other development expenses. After the FHA mortgage loan comes through, the nonprofit sponsor can recover his seed money.

If you belong to a nonprofit organization that wants to sponsor a housing project, your organization has to be approved by FHA. You fill out the forms at your FHA insuring office. You'll need a housing consultant to help you choose the land to build on, your builder, architect, and attorney, and the size your project should be. The city you build in has to have a Workable Program. Your plans for the housing project, the costs, the construction and labor, the rent you charge, and the management you provide all have to be approved by FHA.

Housing projects built with FHA-insured mortgage loans have to be rented on an open occupancy basis. Besides providing this open occupancy housing themselves, community groups can also make a program of getting real estate agents to cooperate in renting and selling housing on an open occupancy basis.

MARKET AREA AGREEMENTS

Builders and developers often claim that if they sell or rent to Negroes, they will lose sales or rentals to whites. The Commission on Race and Housing report, Property Values and Race, and the Housing and Home Finance Agency (now the Department of Housing and Urban Development) case studies on Equal Opportunity in Housing show this is not so.

The fears of builders and developers, nevertheless, are real. Where Negroes are ready to buy or rent in an all-white neighborhood or in similar developments across the city, there is something builders and developers can do to protect themselves against the loss of sales they fear. Through the market area agreement, builders and developers agree to sell or rent without regard to race. That way, no builder will be at a competitive disadvantage for selling to Negroes. No other builder of a similar development can steal his customers by advertising racial restrictions. No single builder will be flooded with Negro applicants.

Where Negroes are able and interested in buying or renting in white developments and where a community group is interested in working with and educating builders and developers, the market area agreement can be useful in providing for open housing.

Community groups will want to interest builders and developers, as well as real estate agents, in supporting fair housing legislation. For many builders won't consider market area agreements until they also have the protection of the law.

At the same time, community groups can seek the cooperation of lending institutions in making housing and home repair loans available on equal terms to all qualified applicants. One way to interest lenders, real estate agents, and builders in open housing is through housing centers. With their cooperation, the centers can help Negroes find suitable housing and encourage them to make use of new housing opportunities.

Still another effort of community groups for open housing can be finding landowners who are willing to sell or subdivide land and lots that will be available on an open occupancy basis.

PROPERTY ASSESSMENT PROCEDURES*

People have named many causes for the poor housing and slum neighborhoods in our cities; the unemployment, lack of education, and poverty of the residents; the blockbusting tactics of real estate agents; the "writing off" of neighborhoods by home mortgage lenders; the failure of the housing industry to build enough low-cost housing; the limited role of community groups in providing needed housing; the failure of the city government to provide needed services and facilities or to enforce the housing code; and local tax policies that make slums profitable to their landlords.

Property tax assessment, along with strict enforcement of the housing code, can't hit all the causes of poor housing, but it can take the profit out of slums.

There are three ways a tax assessor decides on the value of property for tax purposes: 1) comparative sales: the assessor sees what price similar property in the area has been sold for; 2) replacement cost less depreciation; the assessor figures the cost of building a new structure and then subtracts from that price a certain amount (depreciation) according to how old the building is that he's assessing; and 3) capitalization of income, or income return: the assessor decides the value of the property by how much income the owner makes on his investment. Assessors generally use a combination of the first and second methods on residential property and a combination of the second and third methods on commercial and industrial property.

Slum property is profitable because the owner makes practically 100% return on his investment. The landlord collects modest rents but spends little or nothing on the building. So, the rents he collects are nearly all profit. The tax assessor figures the value of the property using the replacement cost method, since he doesn't have comparative sales to go by in slum areas. Since the cost of replacing the slum building, minus depreciation for its age, is very low, the assessed valuation, and hence, the property tax, is very low.

What happens if the city enforces the housing code on this property? The owner may just decide to let the building stand empty. But if he does repair it to standard, then the value of the property goes up, and so does the tax. The landlord is penalized for improving his building!

There is another way to assess the value of slum property: the capitalization of income method. This is the method used when the city buys slum property in urban renewal areas. Slum landlords like this method under urban renewal, because that way they get the most for their property.

If the tax assessor used the capitalization of income method (combined with the replacement cost method) on all slum property, here's what would happen. The property value would be high, based on the income return of the landlord. A front foot value would be set for a whole slum area. Then, a bad building would be taxed almost as much as a good building. There would be a very slight tax increase for building improvements, but not enough to discourage landlords. It would be easier to get landlords to comply with the housing code, since an improved building would bring in higher rentals with little change in taxes.

At this point, you might be wondering what would happen to the tenants of buildings where the rent went up. Remember two things: 1) the landlord can only charge rents that the market will bear, that is, that people are able and willing to pay; and 2) many slum residents would not mind paying a higher rental, if only their landlord would fix up the building.

Community groups interested in getting the property assessment procedures changed may have to be prepared to go to court and present their arguments to the judge and may have to work for an amendment to change the State constitution. But as a beginning, community groups can make the public aware of this opportunity to take the profit out of slums.

NEIGHBORHOOD STABILIZATION

Community groups, voluntary citizen movements, and fair housing committees can work for stable and good, biracial neighborhoods. Two publications of the Southern Regional Council's Urban Planning Project describe in detail the steps you can take in your community: 1) Neighborhood Stabilization: A Program, by Mrs. Jerry Dell Gimarc, and 2) NEIGHBORHOODS Where Human Rights Begin, by Mrs. Margaret Price.

The main points of a successful neighborhood stabilization program include these: 1) inform neighborhood residents, person to person, of how they stand to lose by panic selling and organize them to stand fast against real estate speculators; 2) put every volunteer to work; 3) work to attract white buyers to the neighborhood; 4) seek favorable publicity for the neighborhood; and 5) pressure lenders to make home loans available in the neighborhood.

In addition, community groups will want to try to get the best possible city services and facilities. Good school programs are especially important to the neighborhood. Community groups will also want to educate their membership on the moral necessity of an open community, to urge members to sell or rent housing without racial restriction, and to work for peaceful acceptance and welcome of Negro families when they move to the neighborhood.

In Federal programs..... 86

Your own programs..... 93

Your RIGHTS IN FEDERAL PROGRAMS

FHA mortgage insurance public housing urban renewal

urban planning assistance

- What are your rights under FHA mortgage insurance programs?

- Let's say a builder puts up a subdivision of homes. He uses conventional financing to pay for building the houses. He builds the houses to meet FHA minimum property standards. Then the builder sells the houses to people who will pay for their homes with FHA-insured loans. Can the builder discriminate against you in the sale of his houses, since he didn't use FHA financing to build the houses?

No.

- Can an FHA-approved lender refuse to make you an FHA-insured housing loan on account of your race, color, creed, or national origin?

No.

Note: You have to have good credit and enough steady income to afford the house you're buying. Wife's income can count toward total family income if the wife has a permanent job.

- Say you have a new house you bought with an FHA-insured mortgage loan. You live in the house six months, and you find out the roof leaks. Will FHA help you get the building contractor to repair this flaw?

Yes.

Note: Before you buy a house, check with your FHA insuring office to find out what flaws in the building FHA can help you with. If you damage the house yourself, FHA can't help you.

- How do you make a complaint if you suffer discrimination under an FHA program?

1. Write your FHA insuring office for an FHA Form 797. That's the complaint form. You don't have to use this form, but you'll save time if you do, since the form tells what information you need to give FHA.

   The FHA Form 797 asks you for the date: your name and address and phone number; the name, address, and phone number of the alleged violator (the person you believe discriminated against you), any employees or salesmen involved, and any witnesses; FHA Case number, if there is one; the name of the subdivision and location of the house or apartment involved; the place where the discrimination took place; and the date of the discrimination; a complete statement of your complaint; and your signature.

2. The Director of your Insuring Office has to take care of your complaint. If you wrote to the wrong Insuring Office, the Director must still tell you he received your complaint. Then he sends your complaint to the right Insuring Office for you.

3. Two days after he gets your complaint, your Insuring Office Director writes you. He says he received your complaint and may ask you for more information. The Director sends copies of your letter and his letter answering you to a Zone Director and to the FHA Intergroup Relations Service, the Assistant to the Commissioner.

   The Director can't show your complaint letter to anyone outside of FHA.

4. If it looks, from your complaint, as if the Executive Order has been violated, the Director gets information about your complaint right away. If, then, it still looks as if there has been a violation, the Director writes the alleged violator a letter and tells him what the complaint is. The violator has 10 days to meet with the Director and talk about the discrimination. When they meet, the Director tries to get the violator to stop discriminating by a certain time. The length of time is up to the Director.

5. If the violator didn't meet with the Director in 10 days or if he denied the discrimination, the Director can hold a hearing. After the hearing, or if the violator keeps discriminating past his time limit, then the Director can take action. The Director can cancel any contract and refuse to give the violator any more FHA benefits. This means FHA will reject any application by the violator or any firm in which the violator has an interest of ten per cent or more. Also, FHA can cut off benefits to anyone who violated the Executive Order under another HUD agency program.

6. When the Director decides to take action against the violator, he sends the violator a letter. The violator has 10 days to stop discriminating. During those ten days, the violator can request a review of his case by the FHA Commissioner in Washington. The Director also sends you a letter, telling what he decided. If you question the Director's action, you can ask the FHA Commissioner to review the case. You must write the Commissioner within ten days after you hear the decision from the Director of your Insuring Office.

7. Fifteen days after you ask the Commissioner to review your case, your Director will let you see his file on the case. You can see the file during a ten day period; then the file goes to the Commissioner. The Commissioner then takes over the case. He has the power to reverse the findings of the Director.

8. The Director of your FHA Insuring Office has to take care of your complaint within 30 days. If he can't take care of the complaint within that time, he has to let you know why. An individual or an organization can make a complaint to FHA.

- Did you know you can get a list of all the property FHA owns in your area? You write your Insuring Office for the list. Address your letter to the Director, Federal Housing Administration, ATTN: PROPERTY MANAGEMENT.

The list tells you all about the property, including the amount of the downpayment and the management broker you buy it from. If there is no broker for the property you want to buy, or if the broker refuses to serve you, you buy the property at your FHA Insuring Office.

A broker is never supposed to show FHA-acquired property before it is put on the list. If he does, you report him to FHA. FHA will not make the sale and will not make any sales with that broker or his firm for 90 days.

The list also gives the names of lenders who want to finance mortgage loans on the FHA-acquired properties. The broker goes to the lender to get your mortgage loan for you. And the broker takes care of the property sale with FHA. If you want to ask FHA a question about the property, be sure to give the case number for the property. The case number is on the list.

If FHA approves a sale to you, the broker can rent you the property while he is closing the sale. If you buy directly from FHA, FHA can rent you the property. No one else can rent you the property.

- What are your rights and opportunities under public housing programs?

Complaint procedure for public housing is similar to that for FHA. You write, however, to the Housing Assistance Administration, regional office (see addresses at the end of Part One).

The Housing Assistance Administration (HAA, formerly PHA, Public Housing Administration) checks to see that your local housing authority is complying with Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. HAA does this by sending a form that asks your housing authority its policy on discrimination and what its admission practices are. HAA doesn't require your housing authority to seek integrated projects or to place tenants in projects so that they will be integrated. Projects can become integrated, however, as vacancies in public housing units occur. A policy of integration (as opposed to just nondiscrimination) in public housing depends on your local housing authority and, in turn, on your city government.

If your housing authority refuses to comply with the law, HAA can refuse any new public housing projects in your city or, if the annual contributions contract so provides, HAA can take possession of the public housing. In no case does HAA stop paying the annual contributions for existing public housing.

If you are interested in encouraging integrated public housing projects, there are two things you'll want to do: 1) check with the tenants now living in public housing to see if they fully know and understand their rights in public housing and see if they would like to change the racial pattern of occupancy: and 2) send for Open Occupancy in Public Housing, by PHA, 1953.* The booklet gives full details on how to get integrated public housing in your city.

In addition to changing the racial composition of public housing, you may also be interested in improving the services and the management of the projects. Services your local housing authority can use, with Federal assistance, include youth counseling, credit counseling, education for homemaking (through adult education), and homemaker services. Management of public housing projects can be turned over to a social work agency, with counselors who can help tenants with their special problems. This type of management can help make public housing a stepping-stone to a better life, rather than just a shelter.

What are your rights and opportunities in urban renewal programs?

From reading the section on urban renewal projects, you know that your city chooses the urban renewal project and decides whether it will be rehabilitation or clearance or both. And you know your city uses studies and surveys to decide which projects will be best. Any citizen or group of citizens can suggest an urban renewal project to your city government.

You noticed that your city government holds public hearing at several stages during an urban renewal project. Any citizen can attend the public hearings and make his recommendations.

If you live in a neighborhood that has an urban renewal project or that needs to have a project in the future, you and the other residents of your neighborhood can call meetings and ask the city's urban renewal officials to come explain the project and answer questions. You can visit the urban renewal office, look at the urban renewal plan, make suggestions, and volunteer to help with surveys. Some neighborhood groups like to form their own committees to inspect houses that can be rehabilitated.

In addition to public hearings, your city government also holds conferences with different city departments and with private groups. You can participate in such conferences during all the stages of urban renewal.

Your city government must pass a resolution that it will comply with Title VI in its urban renewal projects. Any deed of urban renewal land from your city's LPA (or, urban renewal agency) to a private redeveloper has to have a covenant against discrimination by the redeveloper. Any public facility used as a noncash grant-in-aid for an urban renewal project has to be operated on a non-discriminatory basis. Complaints are made by writing the Urban Renewal Administration, regional office.

What are your rights and opportunities under the urban planning assistance program?

The urban planning assistance program (701) isn't covered by Title VI or by the Executive Order. Comprehensive plans prepared with the aid of Federal funds may contain proposed sites for schools and locations for streets that will enforce patterns of segregated living. However, urban planning assistance grants can also be used to study "minority group considerations of the community as they relate to the preparation of a comprehensive development plan."*

The authority to survey, analyze, and program action to aid in achieving equal opportunity in housing "is already there. . .the problem is that few planners have sought to, or have been encouraged to, work in this field."

Planning for equal opportunity in housing could be included in comprehensive planning, and a housing study could "include the aspects of discrimination practices which affect the free mobility of population."

It is now possible to use 701 funds to prepare fair housing ordinances.

Fortunately, loans and grants from the Community Facilities Administration, that your city may use for public works, are covered by Title VI.

Opportunities in YOUR OWN PROGRAMS

- How can you influence or take part in state programs for better homes and neighborhoods? One way is through your elected representatives to state government. Another way is through statewide organizations interested in improving your community, such as associations of housing and redevelopment officials, League of Municipalities, Association of County Commissioners, organization of Probate Judges, and League of Women Voters. These are organizations you shouldn't overlook, particularly when your community needs special housing programs, property tax changes, or new enabling legislation.

  Other ways you can come in contact with state level programs is through state (government) planning and development agencies and through university programs of continuing education or urban extension. State agencies and universities often hold meetings and workshops you can attend to learn about housing programs.

- In city housing and neighborhood programs, it is especially important to work with and through your elected representatives, your city officials, whenever possible. Your support for their programs can be as important as your criticism. Attend public hearings and meetings of your local city boards, commissions, and council. Encourage your city officials to publicize housing programs, to provide plenty of information to the public, and to do special studies on housing problems. Check to see that the housing code is enforced. If you can, bring in outside experts to help you make suggestions to your city government. Finally, see what resources on housing are available in the public library and in school libraries. In some communities, public schools are including housing and community education in their curricula.

- Just as you need to work through interested organizations for statewide housing neighborhood programs, so you need to know all the resources you can use at the community level. Your community group can begin its housing program by looking at what other groups are doing. Invite other group leaders to speak before your group and exchange ideas on better housing. By setting up contacts with other community groups, your group can ask them to help you win support for the housing programs you would like.

Your group can also invite city officials to speak. This gives the city another way to explain its housing programs and gives the public another chance to learn about them.

- If housing problems don't get much attention in your neighborhood, do something dramatic. Make your own survey. You don't have to limit it to housing. You can cover problems of discrimination, lack of education, unemployment, disease, and lack of city services and facilities as well. The West Jacksonville Association used the following survey to get a full picture of the needs of the people in one of its neighborhoods:*

Follow the survey with a clean-up, fix-up campaign. This is one of the best ways to get your city interested in providing better services to your neighborhood. Finally, organize citizens in your neighborhood to work continuously for better housing. Citizen groups often find they can work cooperatively with city government, can raise their own finances for an office and staff, and can develop leadership right from within the neighborhood.

Whatever you may be doing to work for better homes and neighborhoods in your community--whether you're working for open occupancy in public housing, for better city services through a neighborhood organization, or for nonprofit housing through a community group--three things are important: 1) Unity: You and those working with you must be able to stand together at public hearings and neighborhood meetings to get the programs you want. If there are factions in your group, discuss your differences and bring the issues out in the open. Then, when you appear before your city government, support one another. Any group leader who discredits one of his members at a public hearing discredits the entire group in the eyes of city government. This has been a hard-learned lesson for many groups working for better housing.

2) Involving community leaders: If you want to change an urban renewal plan, don't organize your group in secret and take the urban renewal director by surprise. He'll be against you. He'll wonder why you didn't ask him about the change before. As one Georgian remarked about today's city politicians, "The era of operating in the dark is gone. You have to involve people so you can win their support." That statement works two ways. Not only do city officials have to make their plans known to the public, but the people also have to let city officials take part in their plans.

3) Supporting programs: City officials aren't free to launch any housing programs or policies they feel are needed; they need public support, or else the programs will fail. Your support can count. You can talk about a new housing program with your friends and neighbors and at community group meetings. When you have to criticize your city government for what it fails to do, it's easy to forget that city government also needs your help. Support its programs.

THOUGHTS TO PONDER

"It is a fascinating fact that civil rights issues have inevitably raised a variety of positive issues. You can't look at school integration without also questioning the quality of education in general. You can't look at job integration without looking at the whole problem of manpower utilization. Similarly, you can't look at integration of neighborhoods without questioning the meaning of community. The elimination of fear opens new horizons in human experience."

---Matthew Bullock, Jr.

---Julian Prince

"Surely few would ever have disagreed that the two greatest causes of inadequate housing have been that some people have not been able to afford good housing and that some have, because of race, been denied an opportunity to bid freely for such housing as exists."

---James Q. Wilson

"In our urban areas the central problem today is to protect and restore man's satisfaction in belonging to a community where he can find security and significance."

THE PRESENT DILEMMA OF THE NEGRO

by

Kenneth B. Clark, Ph.D.

The nuclear irony of American history and the American social, political, and economic system is that the destiny of the enslaved and disadvantaged Negro determines the destiny of the nation. The fundamental fact around which all questions of national survival pivot is the fact of inherent racial interrelatedness -- or integration, if you please -- in spite of the persistent demands and attempts to impose racial separatism. The problems of the American Negro are the problems of America. The conflicts, aspirations, confusions, and doubts of Negro Americans are not merely similar but identical to those of white Americans. In the face of rapid and, at times, frightening historical, economic, political, technological, social, and intellectual changes, the Negro remains the constant and, at times, irritating reality that is America. Negroes have totally accepted the moral and ethical aspirations of America; therefore, the Negro remains the essential psychological reality with which America must continuously seek to come to terms. The Negro need not yearn to be assimilated into American culture; he is, and determines, American culture.

The moral schizophrenia of America is reflected most clearly in the status of Negroes, starting with slavery and continuing to the contemporary ghettos which blight the powerful and affluent cities of our nation. One cannot, therefore, discuss the dilemmas of the contemporary American Negro without at the same time becoming involved in an analysis of the historical and psychological fabric of American life. This is a thesis reflecting the bias of a social psychologist -- a bias which might be rejected by more sophisticated historians, political and economic theorists, or tougher-minded social critics. I base my thesis on the psychological premise that the values, attitudes, and behavior of individual human beings and groups of human beings are determined by the complex socialization process -- that normal human beings are modifiable and are determined by their environment and culture, and not by any inherent, genetic, or racial determinants.

Let us now be specific. A basic dilemma of America is whether the Negro should be accepted and taken seriously as a human being and permitted the rights and privileges accorded other human beings in our political system. America has endured slave rebellions, developed an underground railroad, fought one of the most bloody wars in human history, and is now undergoing a series of urban ghetto implosions in the attempt to resolve this persistent bedeviling question.

The Negro's part of this basic dilemma is whether to persist in his insistence upon his unqualified rights as a human being without regard to the risks or consequences -- or whether to accommodate to the resistances by subtle or flagrant forms of withdrawal from the fray. American Negroes historically have sought many ways to deal with this dilemma -- their general acceptance of slavery; the many psychological adjustments to subjugation and deflection of aggressive reactions; the varieties of back-to-Africa movements; the cults and fads, and the recent series of riots in our ghettos.

The gnawing doubts of white Americans as to their status and worth as human beings -- the deep feelings of inferiority growing out of actual inferior status in the land of their origin in Europe -- impelled American whites to develop and enforce social and institutional arrangements designed to inflict upon Negroes an inferior status. The demanding status needs of whites were powerful enough to counteract the logic, the morality, and the powerful political ethic of the egalitarian and democratic rhetoric which is also an important American reality. I differ with the early Myrdal only in my belief that the American democratic creed and ideals are not psychologically contradictory to American racism. In terms of the dynamics and the motivation of the insecure, they are compatible.

This critical American dilemma is reflected in Negroes not only in terms of literal acceptance of the creeds and their promises, but also in terms of deep doubts concerning the worth of self. General indoctrination in unworthiness has transcended even the barriers of racially segregated schools; it is reinforced by the development of the mass media in this century. The reality of the inferior status to which the Negro has been subjugated behind the walls of segregation is not only humiliating -- but a stimulus to self-doubt, to subtle and flagrant forms of self-hatred, personal and group frustrations, internalized hostility, aggressions, self-denial, or bombast. Under these conditions the walls of segregation become pathetically protective. Within them the subjugated individuals need not meet the tests of free and open competition, need not expose vulnerable egos to single standards of competence.

The anguish and resistance of anxious, self-doubting white segregationists and the cautious timidity of striving middle class whites with the psyches of affluent peasants are matched only by the anxieties, doubts, and vacillation of vast numbers of Negroes -- working and middle class -- as they stand at the threshold of non-segregated society, confronting the tremendous psychological challenges for which American history did not prepare them. The demand for racial justice on the part of American Negroes is balanced by an almost equal psychological reality of the fear of the removal of racial barriers, seemingly so insurmountable.

Within this context -- disturbing and painful, but I believe psychologically valid -- one can now attempt an analysis of the contemporary manifestations of the dilemma of America and the dilemma of Negro Americans. The value of such an analysis will be determined by whether it provides a basis for constructive, realistic, democratic, and human resolutions of some of the racial and social problems which afflict America and threaten its survival.

In many disturbing ways, the problems of race relations in America today are similar to those of the post-Reconstruction period of the late Nineteenth Century which continued and intensified through World War I. This period, which Rayford Logan and John Hope Franklin have described as the "nadir" of the Negro in American life, came as a seemingly abrupt and certainly cruel repudiation of the promises of Reconstruction for inclusion of the Negro into the political and economic life of the nation. This was a period:

-- when the white crusaders for racial justice and democracy became weary as the newly freed Negroes could no longer be considered a purely southern problem;

-- when the aspirations for and movement of Negroes toward justice and equality were curtailed and reversed by organized violence and barbarity perpetrated against them;

-- when as a result of abandonment and powerlessness, the frustrations, bitterness, and despair of Negroes increased and displaced optimism and hope.

This period culminated in the institutionalization of rigid forms of racism -- the enactment and enforcement of laws requiring or permitting racial discrimination and segregation in all aspects of American life. This retrogression in racial democracy in America was imposed by white segregationists with the apathy, indifference, or quiet acceptance of white liberals and moderates who served as necessary accessories.

The parallel with the state of race relations in America today is stark and frightening.

The promises and optimism of the Second Reconstruction, initiated by the pattern of litigation which resulted in the Brown decision of 1954 -- precipitating the high-morale mark of the successful boycotts and sit-ins and reaching its climax in the emotional catharsis of the 1963 March on Washington -- were also cruelly aborted by stepped-up violence against Negro and white civil rights workers in the resistant southern states and the related weariness, racial anxieties, and latent racism of northern whites which emerged under the guise of "white backlash."

The hopes and beliefs of the Negro that racial equality and democracy could be obtained through litigation, legislation, executive action and negotiation, and through strong alliances with various white liberal groups, were supplanted by disillusionment, bitterness, and anger erupting under the anguished cry of "Black Power," a pathetic attempt to disguise understandable desperation and impotence with bombast and rhetoric.

A critical danger, and probably a difference without a pragmatic distinction between the determinants of retrogression in the first post-Reconstruction period and the present is that, whereas the promises of racial progress were reversed in the Nineteenth Century by the fanaticism, irrationality, and cruel strength of white segregationists, the impending racial retrogression of today might use its impetus largely to self-hatred culminating in the fanaticism, dogmatism, rigidity, and self-destructive cruelty of black separatists. If this comes about, it will not be enough to excuse this monstrous perpetuation of the lie of racism and postponement of the goals of democracy and humanity by asserting that the frustrations and bitterness of the victimized Negro account for his present irrationality and rigidity. A similar and equally valid psychological explanation could be offered to explain the racial cruelties of desperate and miserable poor whites of the past and present. Understanding is not acceptance.

White segregationists were able to inflict and perpetuate racial injustices upon Negroes because rational, sophisticated, and moderate whites were silent in the face of barbarities. They permitted themselves to be intimidated and bullied by white extremists until they were morally and almost functionally indistinguishable from their worst and most ignorant elements. A similar threat and dilemma face the rational, thoughtful Negro today. If he permits himself to be cowed into silence by unrealistic Negro racists, he will be an active partner in fastening the yoke of impossible racial separatism more tightly around the neck of America. He -- you, through your silence -- will permit the difficult goals of a racially non-segregated society to be lost by default. You would have given to black racists what you, your fathers, and grandfathers fought and died to prevent giving to white racists. The victories which white segregationists, in spite of all their material and political power, could not have won for themselves, black separatists would have won for them -- and we through our silence would make this possible.

To prevent the repetition of the tragedy of racial retrogression and a return to the "nadir" of race relations in America, we must be realistic in our appraisal of the present state of race relations in America. We must analyze as tough-mindedly as possible the dynamics and symptoms of our times if we are to develop effective and realistic remedies.

During the past few years, it became excruciatingly clear for the Negro that the more things changed, the more they remained the same -- or worsened. The promises and hope for progress became a relentless quagmire of words.

The drama of direct action nonviolent confrontation of the more obvious signs of southern racial injustice became trite, and proved less relevant or effective in dealing with the persistent, pervasive, and subtle problems of racism which afflicted the northern Negro. More appropriate and effective methods for dealing with northern racism have not yet been found.

The guilt and indignation of some northern whites against southern forms of racism turned into white backlash or mutism when the northern Negro began to take seriously the claims of civil rights progress and sought some observable signs of them in northern cities.

The anguish and desperation of the northern Negro have been expressed in the latest series of ghetto eruptions which started in the Harlem riot of the summer of 1964, reached a crescendo in the Watts riot of 1965, and continued through the series of riots in Newark and Detroit in the summer of 1967. Another significant expression of the northern Negroes' "no-win" fatalism is found in the rise of the "Black Power" slogan and momentum which skyrocketed at the time of the Meredith shooting in Mississippi in June of 1966, and continues as an obbligato to the sounds of ghetto violence and futility.

It is important to keep in mind the date (June, 1966) when the "Black Power" slogan became nationally advertised -- in order not to be confused about the cause and effect relationship between "Black Power" and "white backlash."

Whatever may be its tactical, strategic, and rational shortcomings and its ambiguity, "Black Power" did not cause "white backlash." The existence of "white backlash," the unwillingness of whites to be serious in meeting the demands of Negroes for the same rights and responsibilities granted as a matter of course to all other Americans -- including the newest refugee from European, Latin American, or Asiatic oppression -- caused the outbursts of hysterical bitterness and random hostility inherent in the cry of "Black Power."

"Black Power" emerged as a response to the following facts:

-- a recognition of the fact that the center of gravity of the civil rights movement had moved to the northern urban racial ghettos where it was now immobilized by ambiguity, and by intensified white resistance to any meaningful change in the predicament of Negroes;

-- the recognition of the fact that successful litigation, strong legislation, free access to public accommodations, state open housing laws, strong pronouncements on the part of the President, governors or mayors, and even the right to vote or to hold office were not relevant to the overriding fact that the masses of Negroes were still confined to poverty and to the dehumanizing conditions of the ghetto;

-- and that in spite of the promises of a Great Society and the activity of the War on Poverty, his children were still doomed to criminally inferior schools, and his youth and males the victims of unemployment, under-employment, and stagnation.

"Black Power" is the cry of defiance of what its advocates have come to see as the hoax of racial progress -- of the cynicism of the appeals to the Negro to be patient and to be lawful as his needs are continually subordinated to other national and international issues and to the needs, desires, and conveniences of more privileged groups.

Whites, by virtue of their numerical, military, and economic superiority, reinforced by historical American racism which grants higher status to whites by virtue of skin color alone, do have the power to decide whether the future of Negroes -- the Negro masses, the Negro middle classes, or the Negro elected official -- will be positive, negative, or stagnant.

This core reality of the dynamics of power is not likely to be influenced by sentimental and idealistic appeals for justice, by smiles or promises, or by emotional sloganeering.

"Black Power," in spite of its ambiguity, its "no-win" premise, its programmatic emptiness, and its pragmatic futility, does have tremendous psychological appeal for the masses of Negroes who have "nothing to lose" and some middle class Negroes who are revolted by the empty promises and the moral dry-rot of affluent America.

"Black Power" is a bitter retreat from the possibility of the attainment of the goals of any serious racial integration in America.

It is an attempt to make a verbal virtue of involuntary racial segregation.

It is the sour grapes phenomenon on the American racial scene.

"Black Power" is the contemporary form of the Booker T. Washington accommodation to white America's resistance to making democracy real for Negro Americans. While Booker T. made his adjustment to and acceptance of white racism under the guise of conservatism, many if not all of the "Black Power" advocates are seeking to sell the same shoddy moral product disguised in the gaudy package of racial militance.

Nonetheless, today "Black Power" is a reality in the Negro ghettos of America -- increasing in emotional intensity, if not in rational clarity. And we, if we are to be realistic, cannot afford to pretend that it does not exist. Even in its most irrational and illusory formulations -- and particularly when it is presented as a vague and incoherent basis upon which the deprived Negro can project his own pathetic wishes for a pride and an assertiveness which white America continues mockingly or piously to deny him -- "Black Power" is a powerful political reality which cannot be ignored by realistic Negro or white political officials.

It is all too clear that among the casualties of the present phase of American race relations are reason, clarity, consistency, and realism. Some "Black Power" spokesmen, like their white segregationist counterparts, demand the subjugation of rational and realistic thought and planning to dogmatism and fanaticism. By their threats and name-calling, they seek to intimidate others into silence or a mindless mouthing of their slogans.

To be effective and to increase their chances of survival in the face of name-calling verbal racial militants, Negroes, and concerned whites, must demonstrate that they are fully concerned and can bring about some positive changes in the following intolerable areas of ghetto life:

1. criminally inefficient and racially segregated public schools;
2. dehumanizingly poor housing;
3. pervasive job discrimination and joblessness;

4. shoddy quality of goods and high prices in local stores;
5. the dirt, filth, and stultifying drabness of ghetto streets and neighborhoods;
6. the adversary relationship between police and the residents of the ghettos.

This requires the mobilization and use of human intelligence to define the problems, to study and analyze them and to develop practical and implementable solutions to them. This cannot be done on the basis of race. Whites and Negroes must join together in an experiment to determine whether systematic and empathic use of human intelligence and training can be a form of power which can be used constructively in the quest for solutions of long standing urban and racial problems. This is the rationale of the Metropolitan Applied Research Center. We are under no illusions that this will be easy. We know that power confrontation brings risks not found in the cloistered halls of academia. We know that we cannot expect the protections and safety of the detached isolated scholars. But we believe that human intelligence is a social trust and that the stakes are worth the risks.

Another dilemma, not related to the dilemmas and inconsistencies of "Black Power," is the fact that in the present doldrums of the civil rights movement the cleavage between the masses of Negroes and middle class Negroes has become more clear and exacerbating. The masses of Negroes are now starkly aware of the fact that recent civil rights victories benefited primarily a very small percentage of middle class Negroes while their predicament remained the same or worsened. Added to Ralph Bunche and our traditional civil rights leaders who are invited to Washington, we now have Thurgood Marshall, Robert Weaver, Walter Washington as the appointed Mayor of Washington, D. C., a few vice presidents in private industry, a few more Negroes in New England prep schools and Ivy League colleges, and more posts for one or two "qualified Negroes" on the faculties of colleges and universities. These and other tokens of "racial progress" are not only rejected by the masses of Negroes but seem to have resulted in their increased and more openly expressed hostility toward middle class Negroes. They see the advances of the middle class Negroes as being at their expense, at worst, or obscuring their plight or, at best, not relevant to their indefinite condemnation to a dehumanizing predicament. There are some clues which suggest that the recent ghetto implosions were not only anti-white, but also involved vague stirrings of anti-Negro middle class sentiment among the rioters.

The present dilemma of the Negro is focused for the trained Negro intellectual. He must now choose sides. He must now clarify the nature of the enemy. He must dare to say that the enemy was never to be understood in terms of color, but in the more difficult and abstract terms of human irrationality, ignorance, superstition, rigidity, and arbitrary cruelty.

These are the common enemies which underlie all forms of tyranny -- racism, authoritarianism, McCarthyism.

They are no less enemies when being sold or offered as truth or salvation by blacks, yellows, or whites.

If Negroes and whites who understand this can make it clear, we can help to save America. We will use the power of disciplined intelligence combined with respect for moral vales and humanity to save Negroes from the destructive possibilities of white and black dilemmas and thereby contribute to the survival of America. For America cannot survive if Negroes do not. And Negroes and no other group of human beings are likely to survive if America does not.

black youth in a southern metropolis

Socioeconomic characteristics, attitudes, and values of Negro high school students in Atlanta. By Dr. James E. Conyers and Mr. William J. Farmar, with the assistance of Dr. Martin Levin. Southern Regional Council.

Originally, the Southern Regional Council conceived and planned this study as a survey of the attitudes and values which contribute to delinquency among urban Negro youth. It soon became apparent that this phenomenon cannot be isolated from the other serious problems which face Negro youth today. Thus the scope of the study was broadened to encompass other areas of critical concern in the culture of youth.

Hopefully, the results of this study will give impetus to more comprehensive research efforts in this area and will provide the Southern Regional Council's Project on Crime and Corrections with a base upon which we may build other research programs as we support relevant projects in the area of delinquency prevention.

We are indebted to Dr. James Conyers, Associate Professor, Department of Sociology, Atlanta University, and to William Farmar of the Southern Regional Council for the production of this document.

We are very grateful to Dr. Martin Levin, Assistant Professor of Sociology, Emory University, whose counsel and material assistance were invaluable contributions at every stage of the study.

We are also indebted to Mr. Lloyd Yarborough, Atlanta University School of Social Work, Mr. Ronald Sturrup, Street Worker, House of U. S. E., Butler Street YMCA, and Dr. Jack Schmidt, Community Council of the Atlanta Area, for their assistance as we developed the instruments that were to be used in this study and in other planning areas.

Dr. Jarvis Barnes, Assistant Superintendent of Research and Development of the Atlanta Public Schools, was most cooperative, as were the principals of Harper, Howard, Washington, Archer, and Price High Schools, who were kind enough to grant us entry into their schools.

Finally, we would like to express our gratitude to George Lawrence, Eddie Collins, Joyce Smith, and William V. Frazier, all graduate students at Atlanta University, for the assistance they gave in key punching and coding tasks.

BLACK YOUTH IN A SOUTHERN METROPOLIS

INTRODUCTION: Purpose of the Study

In the Twentieth Century, there has been a growing, if gradual, recognition that attitudes of youth are crucial to problems involving social change and social control. This is especially true in countries where industrialization and the complexity of society's requirements are lengthening the period of childhood dependency, and where youth are taught to make choices and to evaluate alternatives, yet are robbed of a meaningful institutional base for participation in society.

In trying to come to terms with problems of status, young people seize on varying adaptive mechanisms to bridge the "generation gap." While some youth retreat into a "drop-out" world, others develop individual forms of pathology. Not enough is known at present about the process by which different youth adapt to the problems posed by age gradients and the social system. One thing is certain, however: the values of youth are increasingly central to the complex of changes of which the adult world and its agencies of social control have to take cognizance. If youth behave in ways which conflict with cultural mores, agents of control respond with programs intended to motivate and/or reorient. If young people indulge in individual or group violence, programs of detention and/or reform are often forthcoming. Thus it is that as social requirements grow more complex and valuable skills take longer to acquire, the social structure responds with ever increasing force to any kind of youthful behavior which threatens to undermine the roles (i.e., "student" or "apprentice") which young people are expected to assume.

This paper was originally conceived as a study of Negro delinquency with implications and suggestions for correction and reform. Although this idea has not been completely abandoned, it was felt to be far too narrow in its conception to have practical or theoretical significance for understanding black youth in a southern metropolis. Stating the problem of black youth in terms of the many factors impinging upon their existence and known to affect their behavior would seem to have more relevance to delinquency than merely requesting information about delinquent acts, per se.

The most crucial aspects of reform partake of more than mere delinquent acts. The objective conditions in which the Negro youth of America exist are the materials out of which meaningful reform and correction must grow.

It is an unfortunate fact that action programs for social change, delinquency prevention projects, the ongoing programs of social service agencies, and other efforts to meet the challenges presented by youth are all too often designed, implemented, and administered by individuals who lack any kind of practical or theoretical understanding of the attitudes, aspirations, and perceived needs of the people whom the projects are designed to assist. More often than not, the problems to which youth programs must respond are stated in quasi-structural terms, but the treatment is directed toward individual pathology. The "Alice in Wonderland" quality of such programs is essentially the reason why the application of social welfare agency services on an individual basis has not thus far produced significant change.

In Atlanta, as elsewhere, there is need for a reasonably objective statement of the opinions and attitudes of youth toward themselves, their communities, their leaders and their city, as Negroes, and not merely as victims of deprivation, as potential delinquents, incipient rioters, or members of the various categories of "otherness" under which they are usually subsumed.

In view of the above considerations, the staff broadened the research objectives to include: (1) social and background factors of Negro youth in Atlanta; (2) neighborhood evaluation and problems; (3) attitudes toward the city of Atlanta; (4) self-concept, level of aspiration, and significant reference group symbols and patterns of identification; (5) attitudes about Negro-white relations, civil rights approaches and organizations, and (6) religious attitudes and participation.[1]

Approaches to Negro Youth

There has been no comprehensive study of Negro youth in America which has produced generalizations related to a body of theory and which is amenable to empirical testing. Even the assumption that Negro youth constitute a sub-culture different from white youth awaits further documentation and refinement. This is not to say that Negro youth have not been studied. More often than not, however, the approach has been focused either on the gang behavior of Negro youth, their assumed "cultural deprivation," their motivation and school performance, their differential treatment, or on subjective "truths" and insights.

In the 1940's the American Council on Education conducted a series of studies in different sections of the United States to explore the types of distinctive problems Negro youth face in their development as individual personalities. The principal works which came from this endeavor were:

> In a Minor Key: Negro Youth in Story and Fact, by Ira De A. Reid.

[1]The many questions that these topical headings represent may be seen by referring to the questionnaire found in the Appendix.

Children of Bondage: The Personality Development of Negro Youth in the Urban South, by Allison Davis and John Dillard.

Negro Youth at the Crossways: Their Personality Development in the Middle States, by E. Franklin Frazier.

Growing Up in the Black Belt: Negro Youth in the Rural South, by Charles S. Johnson.

Color and Human Nature: Negro Personality in a Northern City, by W. Lloyd Warner, Burford H. Juner, and Walter A. Adams.

Since most of these studies were of a pioneering sort, their present value is primarily historical. This is true partly because the changes brought about by the civil rights movement in recent years have altered the emphasis on, if not the substance of, the problem, and partly because modern scientific developments demand more than these qualitatively oriented studies were able to give. Current studies in the behaviorial sciences are asking more refined questions on specific aspects of Negro life. What is needed at present is a national undertaking: "The Negro Youth of America Revisited," incorporating modern developments in the social sciences and ideas found in the more recent works on youth, particularly those suggested by: James S. Coleman in The Adolescent Society; Edgar Epps, in his studies on Negro motivation and school performance; S. N. Eisenstadt, From Generation to Generation; Kenneth B. Clark, Dark Ghetto; Kenneth Kenniston, The Uncommitted; Albert and Bernice Lott, Negro and White Youth; William Brink and Louis Harris, Black and White; Walter Wallace, Student Culture, and James F. Short and Fred L. Strodtbeck, Gang Delinquency and Group Process. Although no attempt is made here to review all of the contributions of these men and their works, we were mindful of their content in designing the present study.

In a more popular vein, yet quite prophetic and timely in the insight it affords, was the August, 1967, special issue of Ebony magazine entitled "Negro Youth in America." It is an important contemporary perspective on the varied aspects of Negro youth and its practical value is surpassed only by the value of its refusal to treat Negro youth as an undifferentiated, alienated, and amorphous mass.

I

THE SAMPLE

Methodology and Data Collection

The reader of this report should be cautioned that this is not a study of all Negro youth. As a matter of convenience in data collection, only high school students were chosen. This means that youth below the high school level, in college, or in military service are not included. Some attempt was made to interview youth not in school, i.e., drop-outs, failures in school, and youth who finished high school and are now working or looking for work. Numerous interviews of this nature were conducted by Mr. Ron Sturrup in neighborhoods of high Negro concentration in different sections of Atlanta. These interviews were done for interpretive and methodological purposes. They are not reported here in a formal sense.

The present study used as respondents 688 Negro high school students selected from five predominantly Negro high schools in Atlanta, Georgia. The high schools (and the number of students they contributed to our sample) were: Harper (121 students); Howard (146 students); Booker T. Washington (150 students); Archer (159 students); and Price (112 students). These schools are composed of practically all-Negro student bodies comprising the overwhelming majority of Negro high school students in Atlanta.

The questionnaires were distributed by teachers and counselors at the high schools. Every attempt was made to obtain as representative a cross-sectional sample as resources would permit. The questionnaires were self-administered. Their relative completeness was an indication to the research staff that students had little difficulty in interpreting the questions.

Confidence in the representative nature of the sample is supported by the fact that about 25 per cent of the sample came from each of the schools' grades, 9th through the 12th. The sex composition in the sample favored females, who comprised about 60 per cent of the total. About 94 per cent of the students in the sample were between 14 and 18 years of age.

Social Characteristics

This section treats some of the social characteristics of the 688 high school students comprising the study group, particularly in terms of place of birth, length of residence in Atlanta, and family characteristics.

The respondents are indigenous to the South. (Only 12 of the students in our sample were born outside of the region.) Most of the respondents were born in Atlanta (about 80 per cent), while an additional 10 per cent were born in Georgia, but not in Atlanta.

In a separate question relating to length of residence in Atlanta, only 24 respondents (3 per cent) indicated that they had lived in Atlanta less than three years, while about 19 per cent reported living in the city for more than three years, and about 78 per cent stated that they had resided in Atlanta all their lives. It is clear from these statistics that our respondents are not "outsiders," but are largely Atlanta-born youth looking at themselves, their neighborhoods, and the city which contains them.

When asked "With whom do you live?" 58 per cent of the respondents reported residence with both parents, while the remaining 42 per cent reported living under the following arrangements: 32 per cent with the mother only; 2 per cent with the father only; and 8 per cent with neither parent. In the latter category, residence was divided among the following, in descending order of magnitude: older sister, grandmother, older brother, aunt, grandfather, and uncle. In studies of this nature, it is not unusual to find a fairly high percentage of Negro youth living with the mother only, or with relatives in the female line.

An extensive literature already exists on the matriarchal family, the breakdown of family structure among urban Negroes, and similar concerns. Mere re-statement of this oft-noted phenomenon is unnecessary. However, our figures suggest that nearly 2 out of 5 Negro adolescents in Atlanta live in a home where there is no permanent male role model or male authority figure. (It should also be noted that a study based exclusively on youth in high school, by its very nature, tends to oversample adolescents from stable family backgrounds.) It is obvious that this high percentage of female-centered families has serious implications for the acceptance of normative values and the assumption of socially appropriate roles by a large segment of black youth.

Less obvious, but equally cogent, is the prospect that when 40 per cent of a group live in family situations which are socially perceived as "abnormal," the whole question of what constitutes a normal family, at least for that group, might well require re-evaluation. Furthermore, it would seem to follow from this that attempts to alter society's view of normative family structure might be a more fruitful approach to social integration (i.e., creating an environment in which black people would assume appropriate roles with relative ease) than is the current approach which emphasizes the need for Negro families to conform to white models.

In response to a question about the main source of family income, only 43 per cent of the sample reported father's income as their principal means of support, 23 per cent indicated mother's income, and 18 per cent stated that both parents' incomes were of equal importance. Small percentages of the students stated that social security (8 per cent), welfare (3 per cent), and "other," such as brother's salary, uncle's salary, etc. (5 per cent), were the family unit's primary source of economic support.

In terms of parental employment patterns, it was found that a higher percentage of the responding students' fathers than mothers were employed, 96 per cent vs. 66 per cent. The data further suggest that of employed parents, mothers were more frequently employed in low status occupations than fathers, 67 per cent vs. 56 per cent. (Low status occupations were defined, in a most general sense, to include operatives, service workers, domestic workers, common laborers, etc.) Employed fathers were more likely to be in medium status occupations than were employed mothers, 32 per cent vs. 16 per cent. (Medium status occupations were defined to include clerical, sales, craft, and skilled workers, etc.) Occupations of a high status (professional, technical, managerial, etc.) favored employed mothers over employed fathers, 17 per cent vs. 12 per cent.

When asked whether the persons with whom they lived owned (or were buying) their home, 49 per cent of respondents answered in the affirmative, while 51 per cent indicated that their place of residence was being rented. This tends to support our earlier observations concerning the relative stability of the sample population since this percentage of owner-occupied dwellings significantly exceeds the percentage for the non-white population of Atlanta as a whole (which is 38%).[2]

II

EVALUATIONS OF NEIGHBORHOOD AND CITY

Community exists wherever human beings live. It is a universal social form. Ideally, the community is a social entity specifically adapted to meeting the common needs of its inhabitants. Some communities are more effective than others in terms of serving their inhabitants. One would suspect that Negro communities in America are not as adequately structured to serve youth as white communities are. We wanted to know, therefore, how Negro youth in Atlanta evaluate their immediate neighborhoods, and further, how they view the wider community environment. Negatively evaluated community services would tend to suggest dissatisfaction and, to the farsighted city planner and administrator, a basis for positive social action.

The Neighborhood

A list of facilities and services of concern to every neighborhood was presented to the respondents. They were asked to evaluate the quality of each item on a four-point scale, indicating each as either very poor, needing some improvement, pretty good, or don't know.

[2]Atlanta Human Resources Survey, Georgia Department of Labor, Employment Security Agency, June, 1966.

The responses very poor and needing some improvement were combined into a single category and considered as a negative evaluation. The facilities and services shown in Table 1 were negatively evaluated by at least one-third of the respondents.

TABLE 1. NEIGHBORHOOD FACILITIES OR SERVICES EVALUATED AS POOR OR NEEDING IMPROVEMENT BY AT LEAST ONE-THIRD OF THE RESPONDENTS.

Facility or Service	Per cent of respondents indicating facility or service is poor or needs improvement
Recreational facilities	62%
Police Protection	52%
Condition of sidewalks	50%
Garbage and trash collection	47%
Cleanliness and appearance	46%
Quality of schools	43%
Condition of streets	43%
Sewers	41%
Crowded conditions	40%
Street lights	35%
Bus service	35%
Parking facilities	34%

The list of services and facilities in Table 1 have been problematic in Atlanta. It would seem that a full-scale appraisal of these services and facilities on a neighborhood basis is needed and, if they are found wanting to the extent indicated by the respondents, immediate corrective action should be taken.

This level of negative reaction to those services, facilities, and conditions which comprise the basic circumstances in which the respondents live would seem to bode ill for the future. Indeed, it is those very conditions which receive least approbation which have appeared to precipitate civil disturbances most frequently in recent years.

Not all neighborhood services and facilities were negatively evaluated. Some were regarded as pretty good. The positively evaluated items are shown in Table 2.

From the evaluations of the respondents, it appears that the services and facilities viewed most negatively are of a generally different order and nature from those more positively evaluated. Those services and facilities

TABLE 2. NEIGHBORHOOD FACILITIES EVALUATED AS PRETTY GOOD BY AT LEAST TWO-THIRDS OF THE RESPONDENTS.

Facility	Per cent of respondents indicating that the facility is pretty good which received the lowest ratings would generally seem to be of greater consequence for comprehensive community planning, in that each is under the direct control of the local government; of those positively evaluated, only the "location of schools" falls in that domain.

City of Atlanta

The respondents live in a city as well as in neighborhoods within a city. The image of one's city is, in part, a reflection of the image of the neighborhood; however, the neighborhood does not include all the elements on which images of a city are built. How Negro youth view the entire city is of particular importance to this study for two obvious reasons: (1) Atlanta prides itself on having a very positive image, particularly in the area of race relations; and (2) the Atlanta Negro population is now 45 per cent of the total population of the city and growing steadily. In view of the limited scope of the sample, the responses of the youth in this study may be seen as a moderate forecast of the views of the majority of the future adult population of Atlanta; therefore, their evaluation of the city is both strategic and informative.

A list of 14 aspects of life in the Atlanta community was presented to the respondents. They were asked to rate each on a four-point scale: poor, fair, good, or very good. Combining the poor and fair categories, and the good and very good categories, it was found that the respondents evaluated more items positively than negatively. The per cent of very good evaluations was particularly high in regard to the following aspects of the city's life: (1) sports; (2) colleges and universities; (3) moral and religious climate; and (4) public schools.

A more crucial concern to city planning might be the question of what aspects of city life were negatively evaluated by the respondents. Table 3 (on page 7) shows that ten of the fourteen items were evaluated as

TABLE 3. RESPONSES TO THE QUESTION: "HOW WOULD YOU RATE ATLANTA ON EACH OF THE FOLLOWING ASPECTS OF CITY LIFE?"

Aspects of Life in Atlanta	Per cent of respondents evaluating each item as:		Total poor or fair by from 40 per cent to 72 per cent of the respondents, with the most negatively evaluated aspects of city life being the following: (1) race relations; (2) housing; (3) recreation; and (4) police officers. That race relations would be so evaluated by the respondents of this study seems to contradict widely held assumptions about the city's good race relations and the view of Atlanta as "a city too busy to hate." Evidently, these students feel that good race relations are built on more than the idea of good race relations.

No overall consistent patterns of negative evaluation by sex or age were found. Some differences on particular items did occur. Female respondents tended to evaluate items as poor or fair in larger percentages than did males. This was particularly true for the following areas (per cent differences of female negative response over male negative response shown after each item): (1) "Race relations," 8 per cent difference, (2) "housing," 7 per cent difference, (3) "welfare," 6 per cent difference, and (4) "public schools," 5 per cent difference. Only for "public school teachers" did the per cent difference for males exceed that for females in the magnitude found on the above items. Exactly why this is so cannot be specifically determined by this investigation. Perhaps the Negro female is placed in a social status which demands that she be more acutely aware of the quality of race relations, housing, welfare, and public schools.

Responses by age group indicated that older students (16-19 years) tended to evaluate "housing" and "colleges and universities" as poor or fair more often than did younger students (13-15 years), with differences of 10 per cent and 5 per cent, respectively. On the other hand, the younger students evaluated "job opportunities" and "sports" as poor or fair in larger numbers than 16 to 19-year-olds, with differences of 8 per cent and 7 per cent, respectively.

III

SELF-IMAGES, ASPIRATIONS, AND PATTERNS OF IDENTIFICATION

How Negro youth view themselves, whether they want to change themselves, their educational aspirations, whom they turn to for advice, and what leadership figures they are familiar with or identify with are important facets of their sub-culture, all having implications for patterns of action and social planning.

Self-Image

In an attempt to assess the respondents' satisfaction with their self-images, they were asked to check, from among four statements, the one which came closest to their feelings about themselves. The statements were:

1. I don't like myself the way I am; I'd like to change completely.
2. There are many things I'd like to change; but not all.
3. There are a few things I'd like to change; but not too many.
4. I'd like to stay very much the same; there is almost nothing I would like to change.

Combining responses to statements 1 and 2 as an index of persons desiring substantial changes in their self-images, and responses to statements 3 and 4 as an indication of respondents desiring few or no changes, it was found that 26 per cent of the respondents desired complete or substantial changes in their self-images, while 74 per cent would make few or no changes. Males felt the need for substantial change in their self-images more often than did females, 30 per cent vs. 24 per cent. Such feelings of self-debasement and sense of personal isolation may have serious implications for the respondents' ability to develop meaningful personal relationships in later life. The number of students expressing such feelings suggests that acting out behavior among youth may be expected to continue at a high level.

Qualities for "Getting Ahead in Life"

What one believes are important qualities for "getting ahead" in life are often clues to his personality and orientation. One would expect this to be especially important for a minority group whose avenues to success are so problematic. The respondents were asked, "How important is each of the following items in helping one to 'get ahead' in life?: pleasant personality; family background; good clothes; good looks; being a white person; ability; high ideals; proper morals; friendliness; athletic ability; high grades in school; luck; personal ambition, and being 'slick.' " They were asked to respond on a four-point scale of very important, fairly important, not too important, and don't know. The response patterns shown in Table 4 are ranked on the

TABLE 4. RESPONSES TO THE QUESTION: "HOW IMPORTANT IS EACH OF THE FOLLOWING QUALITIES IN HELPING ONE TO GET AHEAD IN LIFE?"

Quality	Per cent of respondents who rated each quality as:				TOTAL
	Very Important	Fairly Important	Not too Important	Don't Know	N	%
Pleasant personality	89	6	2	3	664	100
Ability	86	10	3	1	664	"
Friendliness	78	15	5	2	656	"
Proper morals	65	22	7	6	655	"
Grades in school	63	26	8	3	662	"
High ideals	62	26	8	4	661	"
Personal ambition	61	21	13	5	649	"

Good looks	10	19	68	3	662	"
Being "slick"	5	7	73	15	650	"

basis of the frequency with which each quality was rated as very important.

It can be seen that the first seven items were rated as very important by 60 per cent or more of the respondents (pleasant personality, 89 per cent; ability, 86 per cent; friendliness, 78 per cent; proper morals, 65 per cent; high grades, 63 per cent; high ideals, 61 per cent; and personal ambition, 61 per cent). Then there is a sudden drop in qualities rated as very important with being "slick," good looks, being a white person, luck, and athletic ability assigned relatively low priority. With the exception of personality and reputational concerns, the magnitude of assessment and ranking of items contrasts vividly with similar items endorsed by students in Coleman's Adolescent Society, where athletic ability, good looks, and family were important attributes.

Figure 1 presents the response patterns to the items when qualities rated as very important were compared by sex. In general, qualities rated as very important by one sex were rated similarly by the other. The data in Figure 1 do indicate, however, that females were more inclined to assign high priority to proper morals, personal ambition, high ideals, friendliness, and pleasant personality than were males. Although males were somewhat more likely to place a high premium on good clothes, good looks, and athletic ability, it is particularly significant that these latter attributes, frequently assumed to be most highly valued in the youth culture of the ghetto, were consistently rated very low even by the male respondents.

Educational Aspiration

Commonly assumed, but frequently questioned, is the notion that Negro youth have low aspirational levels in terms of education and success orientations. The previous question on qualities very important in "getting ahead" indicated that Negro youth rated ability, grades in school, and personal ambition as highly significant priorities in achievement. In this vein, respondents were asked, "Do you plan to go to school after you get out of high school?"

Responses to the above questions suggest a high level of personal aspiration among the respondents: 96 per cent indicated intentions of staying in high school until graduation. Eighty-six per cent of these expect to continue their education beyond high school with nearly half planning to attend college, and the rest to attend various kinds of vocational training institutions. These data suggest that there is nothing lacking in the intentions and aspirations of Negro youth. They have, to borrow a phrase, "Great Expectations." The difficulties in actual achievement must be sought among other realities of the social system; e.g., economic organization, reference group support, opportunity structures, etc.

Sources of Advice and Identification

To whom does one turn for advice? With whom does one identify? These are important factors in anyone's patterns of orientation; they provide cues to action, commitment, and personal anchorage for ideological and economic support and comfort.

In response to the question, "Whom do you usually turn to for advice?" "mother" and "friend(s) of same age" were most frequently cited. (See Table 5.) These were followed in frequency by both parents, older friend(s), school personnel, other relative(s), father, and minister. The dominance of the mother figure as a source of advice should not lead one to assume that this is simply due to the matricentric nature of the Negro family, though nearly a third of the respondents live with mother only. Given the expressive nature of her role, we would expect the mother to be a principal source of advice in many two-parent families. The position of "friend(s) of same age" likewise should not be interpreted along racial lines, but is consistent with the notion that a youth sub-culture exists in which support and comfort from one's peer group are important components.

In addition to the fact that mothers and personal friends were the most frequently cited sources of advice, and fathers and ministers were the least cited sources, some interesting variations by sex of respondents were found. Male respondents more frequently indicated a wider range of sources of advice than did females. Also, a higher per cent of males than females cited "father," "both parents," "school personnel," and "minister" as sources of advice, whereas a higher per cent of females cited "friend(s) of same age," "mother," and "older friend(s)."

When asked to respond to the statement "people are always trying to tell me what to do," female respondents agreed much more with the statement than males, 42 per cent to 27 per cent. The implications of this in terms of Negro females' receptivity to advice and counsel or the tendency to turn to peer group members for support cannot be determined by this study, but suggest a direction for further research.

Leadership Symbols

Respondents were asked: "List, in order of importance to you, the five most important leaders of the Negro people in Atlanta." Many of the respondents did not list five leaders; however, most listed at least two or three persons they regarded as the most important leaders in Atlanta. Only four names were frequently mentioned. They were: M. L. King, Jr., President of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference; Leroy Johnson, Georgia State Senator; Julian Bond, Georgia Representative and ex-SNCC Publicity Director; and Stokely Carmichael, former Chairman of SNCC. Another study conducted by the senior author of this report showed these names were also the most frequently cited in Atlanta area newspapers.

Table 6 presents the frequency with which the above-mentioned leaders were cited, and the number of times each was given first place mention.

TABLE 6. NAMES MOST FREQUENTLY MENTIONED IN RESPONSE TO THE QUESTION: "WHO, IN YOUR OPINION, ARE THE MOST IMPORTANT NEGRO LEADERS IN ATLANTA?"

Martin L. King, Jr.	473	301
Leroy Johnson	207	28
Julian Bond	181	12
Stokely Carmichael	117	9

It might be contended that all of the above men are not a part of the local power or leadership structure. To a certain extent, this is true. Care, however, should be taken that this contention is not accepted categorically. These men have taken positions to which the local power structure, white and Negro, has had to respond; e.g., the Julian Bond controversy, the Vietnam crisis, "Black Power," the Poverty Program, and racial disturbances in sections of Atlanta in 1966-67. It is true that these men have influence extending far beyond the local community; but to say that they are not, and have not been, of consequence locally is a critical mistake. When the more "local" Negro leaders make this assumption, they indulge in wishful thinking, for they well know that men of such nature often create the type of situation to which the local leadership must respond.

Familiarity with Other Prominent People

Respondents were asked to identify each individual on a list of people currently or historically prominent. Many of the individuals were Atlantans or Georgians; still others were not. The names and the number of times they were correctly identified are shown in Table 7.

The ability to identify people of stature and note in history in no way means that the students identify with them as positive role-models. It was clear from the colorful expressions used by the students that some of the persons identified correctly were negatively evaluated. This was especially true for some southern white politicians on our list. Likewise, it is of note in terms of everyday living and Negro history that far more of the respondents know Ray Charles, Lou Rawls, Muhammad Ali, and Gale Sayers than Booker T. Washington, Ralph Bunche, Thurgood Marshall, Sojourner Truth and W. E. B. DuBois; not to mention some of the more local persons of repute. When local Negro leaders were identified correctly they were much more likely to have been Martin L. King, Jr., Leroy Johnson, Julian Bond, and Stokely

RACIAL ATTITUDES AND CIVIL RIGHTS ORGANIZATIONS AND APPROACHES

The attitudes of youth in America might turn out to be the most crucial predictor for the nature and direction of social change. Many of the recent reform and revolutionary movements in the world have heavily involved youth, who have often been among the principal architects and initiators of change. Youth are now receiving a type of exposure and recognition which has no direct counterpart in earlier periods of history. They are being heard in popular art, the "hippie" movement, peace politics, and civil rights. The latter aspect of contemporary change and the attitudes of Negro youth toward it is the principal concern of this report, for it is here that Negro youth have made their presence felt most strongly.

Racial Attitudes

Respondents were asked to express agreement or disagreement with a number of statements assessing their attitudes toward certain problems of race and race-related behavior. Ranked on the basis of frequency of disagreement, the responses to each statement are shown in Table 8. Respondents disagreed with the majority of the statements. The relatively high percentage of respondents who said "don't know" was predictable due to the controversial nature of the statements presented.

A separatist philosophy does not appear to be the dominant theme for the respondents. Most of them are not strong believers in "black power," nor do they think the situation would be improved if Negroes were more separated from whites. The fact that 21 per cent of the respondents felt that "sometimes Negroes ought to carry guns when protesting," and 22 per cent felt that "civil rights demonstrations do not accomplish anything," might suggest that Negro youth opinion is in a transitional phase and that, all else being equal, a similar question in the future might well elicit more militant views. However, the extent to which the respondents reported willingness to participate in a riot is still comparatively small, about 8 per cent. This figure is smaller than that reported by William Brink and Louis Harris, where 15 per cent of the total rank and file of the Negro population "would join a riot."[3]

[3]William Brink and Louis Harris, Black and White (New York: Simon and Schuster, 1966), p. 67.

Of particular interest in America is the stance of black Americans toward the Vietnam conflict. In response to the statement, "Black Americans should be proud to be fighting in Vietnam," only 31 per cent agreed, while 49 per cent disagreed with the statement.

Responses to the statement, "White people can usually be trusted," are a partial index of the limited extent to which black youth have faith in whites. Whereas 30 per cent responded "don't know," 45 per cent of the respondents do not feel that whites can usually be trusted. Upper class Negroes fare much better in this regard, as indicated by the fact that only 15 per cent of the respondents believed that they "usually cannot be trusted."

Several of the statements in Table 8 ask the respondents to assess "blame" for the "riots" in Atlanta, particularly those that occurred in the Boulevard and Summerhill areas. It is realized that these were not riots in the same sense as were the disturbances which occurred in Newark and Detroit.

An evaluation of attitudes toward responsibility for "riots" in Atlanta revealed the following:

1. Equal proportions of respondents blamed "whites" and "Negro agitators," 25 per cent.
2. Thirty-five per cent blamed "police brutality."
3. "Poor economic and social conditions of Negroes" was stated as a cause by 48 per cent of the respondents.
4. The only suggested "cause" to which a majority of the respondents agreed was the relatively amorphous "bad race relations," 64 per cent.

The possibility of future disturbances of a riotous nature is suggested by 53 per cent of the respondents, who agreed with the statement, "If things don't get better in Atlanta, there will be riots." Similar conclusions are being reached in a number of other American cities.

Some differences in responses to these statements by sex were found. In general, males were more likely to agree with statements shown in Table 8 than were females. For example, males were more likely than females to agree that: (1) "I would participate in a riot," 9 per cent difference; (2) "I blame whites for the riots in Atlanta," 9 per cent difference; (3) "Sometimes Negroes ought to carry guns when protesting," 8 per cent difference; (4) "Upper class Negroes are usually not to be trusted," 8 per cent difference, and (5) "I blame police brutality as the cause of riots in Atlanta," 8 per cent difference. The only statement to which female respondents agreed in larger percentage than male respondents was, "I blame 'bad' race relations as the cause of riots in Atlanta," 8 per cent difference.

When the statements in Table 8 are compared by age, generally, it was the younger Negro youth who agreed most frequently with the statements. Respondents 13 to 15 years old, when contrasted with those 16-19 years old, more frequently believed that: (1) "If things don't get better in Atlanta there will be riots," 9 per cent difference; (2) "The more Negroes are separated from whites the better," 8 per cent difference; (3) "I am a strong believer in Black Power," 5 per cent difference; and (4) "civil rights demonstrations do not accomplish anything," 5 per cent difference.

On the other hand, older respondents, more frequently than younger respondents, agreed with the following statements: (1) "I blame police brutality as the cause of 'riots' in Atlanta," 10 per cent difference; (2) "I blame poor economic and social conditions of Negroes as the cause of 'riots' in Atlanta," 8 per cent difference; and (3) "I blame 'bad' race relations as the cause of 'riots' in Atlanta," 7 per cent difference.

Although in no way altering the basic pattern of responses to the statements in Table 8, it would appear that it is the younger male respondent who is more militant and separatist in his racial stance than older males or females. Since this was not the dominant stance for the total group, and since the significance of the maturation process in this regard is unmeasured, implications for future orientations of Negro youth cannot be determined by this study, however provocative the data may seem.

Civil Rights Organizations and Approaches

The number of civil rights organizations and/or approaches increased almost exponentially during the early 1960's. A partial list of civil rights organizations and approaches was presented to the respondents. They were asked to state their approval or disapproval of each. It is realized that some of the organizations or approaches do not fall under the heading of civil rights in traditional usage. They do, however, relate, in some measure, to what Negroes are doing in order to alleviate the stigma and status discontent attached to being black in America. The groups and approaches are shown in Table 9. They are ranked on the basis of the frequency with which they were approved by the respondents.

It is obvious that the groups cited need not be, and usually are not, mutually exclusive in their approaches. For example, voter registration drives and court cases are not the exclusive property of any one particular group. The NAACP, CORE, and SNCC have participated in voter registration drives. NAACP, ACLU, and others have initiated court cases.

Inspection of Table 9 shows the NAACP, the oldest of civil rights organizations, won the approval of the respondents more than any other group. The order was: (1) NAACP, 75 per cent; (2) the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, 72 per cent; (3) the Congress of Racial Equality, 55 per cent; (4) the National Urban League, 49 per cent; (5) the American Friends Service Committee, 44 per cent; (6) the American Civil Liberties Union, 39 per cent; (7) the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, 37 per cent; (8) the Anti-Defamation League, 22 per cent; (6) the Deacons for Defense, 16 per cent; and (10) the Nation of Islam, 11 per cent. The students seemed to tend to disassociate organizations from tactics; e.g., while 37 per cent of all respondents approved of SNCC and 55 per cent approved of CORE, only 15 per cent approved of Black Power.

The dominant approaches to the problems faced by Negroes are still educational, legalistic and nonviolent, with a third or more of the respondents also endorsing more dramatic forms of activity, such as street demonstrations, sit-ins, economic boycotts, and rent strikes. The least favorably endorsed approach or idea was riots (12 per cent).

When civil rights groups and approaches were compared by sex, it was the male respondent who indicated a more militant and activistic stance. A larger percentage of males than females approved the following (per cent differences by sex are shown after each item): (1) street demonstrations and protest marches, 11 per cent difference; (2) Nation of Islam, 9 per cent difference; (3) SNCC, 8 per cent difference; (4) Black Power, 8 per cent difference; (5) riots, 8 per cent difference; (6) Deacons for Defense, 7 per cent difference; and (7) school boycotts, 7 per cent difference. Females, in appreciably larger numbers than males, approved of "educational programs used to change racial prejudice and discrimination," 9 per cent difference.

Older youths were more traditional in their approval of civil rights organizations than were the younger respondents. The 16-19-year-olds more strongly approved of the Urban League, 13 per cent difference; legal court cases, 8 per cent difference; educational programs, 6 per cent difference; and voter registration drives, 6 per cent difference; whereas the 13-15-year-olds more favorably endorsed SNCC, 7 per cent difference, and Black Power, 5 per cent difference. (Not capable of being interpreted along these lines, however, is the largest difference by age. Younger respondents, by a 14 per cent margin, more favorably viewed the American Friends Service Committee than did older youth.)

DELINQUENCY

The extent of delinquency among youth invites as much public attention as any other aspect of their existence. This is especially true for non-white youth. Many people contend that this difference of race is at least partially attributable to differential procedures in arrest, indictment, conviction, and confinement processes by race.

In this study, we have not used official delinquency rates for Negroes. Instead, questions about the commission of delinquent acts were asked of those in the sample. This, then, is a self-reported criterion of delinquency. In only 5 of 13 categories of delinquent behavior did as many as 10 per cent of the students admit participation. These were: (1) driving without license, 39 per cent; (2) skipping school, 29 per cent; (3) drinking alcoholic beverages, 27 per cent; (4) participating in gang fights, 12 per cent; and (5) buying alcoholic beverages, 12 per cent. In every case, the large majority of those admitting to delinquent conduct indicated they had done so seldom as opposed to frequently and sometimes.

In every instance, males were more likely to report participating in delinquent behavior than were females, with the largest difference occurring on the following items: (1) driving a car without a license; (2) skipping school; (3) taking part in gang fights; (4) buying or drinking alcoholic beverages; and (5) driving a car too recklessly or too fast.

Similarly, analysis by age differences showed, rather predictably, that older youths were more likely to have participated in delinquent behavior than younger respondents. The following items were fairly pronounced in this regard: (1) skipping school; (2) drinking alcoholic beverages; and (3) driving a car too recklessly or too fast.

Items involving sexual behavior of Negro youth were not among our delinquency items at the suggestion of Board of Education officials.

Although the respondents did not report a high degree of delinquency in the items presented, an orientation toward deviant and opportunistic innovation was suggested by reactions to the statement: "Sometimes you have to cheat a little to get what you want." Forty-one per cent of the respondents agreed with the statement. There were no significant differences in these responses by sex or age. Such sentiments on a statement of this nature are not restricted to youth if contemporary evidence of adult behavior is viewed in light of orientations toward success in American culture.

VI

SOME RELIGIOUS CONCERNS

No questions were asked about the religious affiliation of the respondents. Traditional evidence and the number and type of Negro churches in the Atlanta community would tend to suggest that the respondents are likely to have Baptist or Methodist affiliations. A question was asked, however, about the frequency of church attendance.

TABLE 10. RESPONSES TO A QUESTION CONCERNING FREQUENCY OF CHURCH ATTENDANCE, BY SEX.

Frequency of Church Attendance	Per cent of respondents attending church
	% All Respondents	% Male	% Female
More than once a week	19	15	22
About once a week	38	35	40

About once a month	4	6	3
A few times a year	8	10	6
Just about never	4	9	1
(N-659) Total	100	100	100

In Table 10, the frequency of church attendance for all respondents was tabulated by sex. It is seen that 57 per cent of the respondents attended church once a week or more, and 84 per cent once a month or more. Differences in church attendance by sex favored females. Whereas 75 per cent of males attended church at least two or three times a month, 90 per cent of the females did likewise. 61 per cent of the females stated that they attended church about once a week or more as opposed to only 51 per cent of the males.

The respondents were also asked to react to statements about the church and religion. Many of the statements were drawn from current controversies in church circles, i.e., "Is the church on the decline?"; "Is God dead?"; "Is the church too old-fashioned?" etc.

Responses to the above statements (as presented in Table 11) suggest that the church is still a powerful personal force in the lives of Negro youth; however, the respondents believe that "the church ought to be more concerned about social problems."

Some ambivalence was noted in responses to a question about the decline of the church as indicated by the fact that an equal number of respondents stated that they agree, disagree, and don't know that the influence of the church in America is on the wane. Similarly, the majority of respondents did not know whether the white man takes his religion seriously or not; but when asked to react to the statement, "The Negro does not take his religion seriously," a majority of the respondents disagreed (54 per cent).

9. Sometimes I feel that God is dead	8	83	9	625	"
10. The church is too old-fashioned for me	4	91	5	657	"

Evaluated in a negative sense were the statements which read, "The church is too old-fashioned for me" (91 per cent disagreeing); "Sometimes I feel God is dead" (83 per cent disagreeing); "When I have a problem my pastor is one of the first persons I turn to" (76 per cent disagreeing); and "I am neither for nor against the church" (70 per cent disagreeing).

From the above statements, it would appear that the respondents are fairly religious; yet, they do not feel that the pastor is a principal source of advice, an attitude indicated by the earlier findings on personal sources of advice.

The data may suggest the existence of a certain amount of ambivalence in the students' feelings toward the church, especially in light of the fact that statements expressing general positive attitudes about God and religion tended to be accepted more readily than statements relating to the institutional church or to clergymen.

SUMMARY AND CONCLUSIONS

This study has attempted to assess the attitudes, values and opinions of Negro youth in a wide range of areas. While a more narrowly focused study would have permitted a fuller evaluation of any given aspect, the remarkable dearth of information available made a general survey seem imperative. Additionally, the unusually crucial role played by young people in the development and elaboration of normative values in our society and the high correlation which exists among seemingly disparate elements of our culture effectively preclude the possibility of concentrating attention on isolated factors.

This study, then, not only presents data relating to concerns of particularly timely interest, such as perception of the urban environment, evaluation of racial problems, attitudes toward civil rights organizations and approaches, and deviant behavior, but also attempts to assess other crucial dimensions of the subculture of Negro youth; e.g., religious concerns, self-images, aspirations, and sources of advice and identification.

The sample consisted of 688 students from five all-Negro high schools in Atlanta, Georgia. 40% of the students were males, 60% were females. Age range of respondents was 13-19 years. About 25% of the sample came from each of grades 9 through 12.

Our respondents were, on the whole, native Atlantans of low to low-middle socio-economic status, 42 per cent of whom live in family settings other than biparental. The number who live in female-centered domestic situations (38 per cent) was higher than might be anticipated from previous studies conducted elsewhere. Careful consideration of the data failed to uncover a variable which would satisfactorily account for this factor. Our data in this area would seem to have serious implications for immediate efforts in the areas of social planning and social welfare.

The respondents' perceptions of their environment, in terms both of the immediate community and the whole urban setting, reflect a considerable degree of dissatisfaction. Two-thirds of the listed neighborhood facilities and services were negatively evaluated by at least 34% of the respondents. Among the items which drew the largest number of negative reactions are such crucial services as police protection and garbage collection and such basic facilities and conditions as those relating to schools, recreation, streets, sidewalks, and sewers. The items most positively evaluated were those most closely related to the personal environment; e.g., cooking, bathroom, hot water and shopping facilities.

When asked to rate 14 aspects of city life in Atlanta, 1/3 or more of the respondents gave negative reactions to 11 of the items. Those evaluated most positively ("moral and religious climate," "colleges and universities" and "sports") seem to be the least significant in terms of the material existence of the average respondent.

In a question assessing self-image, 30 per cent of the male respondents and 25 per cent of the female respondents expressed a desire for substantial or total change in themselves. Additionally, nearly 1/3 of the respondents expressed agreement with the statement, "Sometimes I feel all alone in the world."

When respondents were asked to evaluate a list of qualities in terms of their importance for "getting ahead in life," 7 out of 14 qualities were rated as very important by at least 60 per cent of the students. In descending order of perceived importance, these were: pleasing personality, ability, friendliness, proper morals, grades in school, high ideals and personal ambition. At this point, there is a distinct discontinuity in the response pattern; the remaining items—family background, good clothes, athletic ability, luck, being a white person, good looks and being "slick"—were rated as very important by 37 per cent or less of the respondents. While males tended to place somewhat greater emphasis on these latter qualities than did females, the general pattern of responses was the same for both sexes and both age groups.

Somewhat in keeping with this high valuation of qualities commonly associated with middle class status achievement were the responses to another question in which 96 per cent of the students indicated that they intend to remain in high school until graduation and that 86 per cent of these hope to continue their education beyond high school.

In response to a question about customary sources of advice, the majority of the students queried indicated that they usually seek advice from the mother, while the father and the minister were the least frequent choices. A large percentage (one-third of the males and slightly more than one-half of the females) seek support from individuals in their peer group. While the response pattern by sex was significantly different only in the item relating to peer group support, the males in our study do tend to seek advice more frequently from the usual authority figures (father, minister, school personnel, both parents) than do the females.

When asked to list Negro leaders in Atlanta whom they felt were most important, respondents most frequently mentioned Dr. M. L. King, Jr., Senator Leroy Johnson, Representative Julian Bond and Stokely Carmichael, in that order. These men also occur among the ten most frequently identified figures in a list of 39 prominent persons. In this list, Lester Maddox, Governor of Georgia, was most frequently identified (by 80% of all respondents).

A question measuring attitudes toward racial problems revealed interesting data. In general, the attitude of the average respondent was not particularly militant; the respondents did not approve of separatist, Black Power, or defeatist views, nor did a very high per cent indicate willingness to participate in a riot. However, an absolute majority of the respondents felt that "If things don't get better in Atlanta, there will be riots." A large majority of those expressing a definite opinion (45 per cent of all respondents) rejected the statement that "white people can usually be trusted," and only a bare majority (51 per cent) of all the respondents agreed with the statement that "Non-violence is always the best approach for Negroes to use."

The statement "Black Americans should be proud to be fighting in Vietnam," drew a negative response from 49 per cent of all respondents (62 per cent of those expressing a definite opinion).

When the students were asked to express approval or disapproval of various civil rights organizations and approaches, the NAACP (73% approval), SCLC (72% approval), and CORE (55% approval), received the greatest approbation.

Approaches ranging in militancy from educational programs to street demonstrations and economic boycotts were approved by large majorities of those indicating an opinion. Only school boycotts, Black Power, and riots failed to receive majority approval. In general, the least controversial approaches (voter registration, court cases, educational programs) received the greatest approbation. Except for the Nation of Islam, all organizations were approved of by a majority of those expressing an opinion. In all cases, however, a high percentage of respondents expressed no opinion.

Students were asked whether and how often they had committed a variety of delinquent acts. Only traffic violations, alcohol violations, truancy and "gang fighting" were admitted to by more than 10 per cent of the respondents. In every case, the large majority of those admitting to delinquent conduct indicated that they had done so seldom. However, this level of admitted deviant behavior contrasts strongly with the fact that 41 per cent of all respondents agreed with the statement "Sometimes you have to cheat a little to get what you want."

In a series of questions concerning religious attitudes, the majority of those responding tended to support basic religious views and values; however, positive statements about the influence and impact of the church drew considerably less agreement. The statement, "The church ought to be more concerned about social problems," was agreed with by 43 per cent of all respondents (and a large majority of those expressing an opinion).

Several factors tend to cloud the overall results. The considerable social tension and sense of crisis which currently pervade American society have undoubtedly had considerable impact on the young people in our sample. The ambivalence and considerable contradiction in the responses suggest that our study is most timely. This survey may well have captured the sense of confusion and transition among black youth which a perusal of the popular press readily reveals as being prevalent in the nation as a whole. It seems unlikely that a study in the future would reflect a similar clinging to traditional values.

APPENDIX

Negro Youth Survey

You, along with other Negro youth in Atlanta, are taking part in a study of youthful attitudes and behavior. You do not have to put your name on the questionnaire. No one at the school will see the answers you give, so you should feel free to respond to each question as truthfully and honestly as possible.

This is not a test. We are interested in your attitudes and opinions. There are no right or wrong answers.

VOTER REGISTRATION IN THE SOUTH

SUMMER, 1968

VOTER EDUCATION PROJECT
SOUTHERN REGIONAL COUNCIL, INC.
5 Forsyth St., N.W.
Atlanta, Georgia 30303

The figures presented herein were accumulated during the summer and late summer of 1968. While they do not represent the final registration figures for the November elections, the difference is not expected to be large. The figures were compiled from a variety of sources---public and private, official and unofficial.

For four states---Arkansas, Tennessee, Texas and Virginia---complete or near-complete county-by-county figures showing white and Negro registration were not available. For these four states statewide estimates have been made, based on the best information obtainable.

In three states---Mississippi, Alabama and Georgia---there are large numbers of voters not registered by race. These have been divided between the white and Negro columns on the basis of VEP estimates.

In these three states, VEP figures are cumulative and do not reflect names removed from voters lists because of purging. This is likely to result in inflated totals, particularly in white registration, in some counties. Also, population figures are based on the 1960 census, and thus registration figures might exceed population figures in counties that have experienced considerable growth.

Statistics for this booklet were prepared by Mrs. Michael H. Chanin of the VEP staff.

INTRODUCTION

Voting power gives you a say-so in your city, county and state government. There is nothing secret about voting power. It comes about when you and others who share your views organize to get people to:

1. register to vote.
2. go to the polls on election day.

But to get voting power you must do more than just register and vote. You must learn and teach others how to use their voting power wisely. In order to use your voting power wisely, one of the things you need to know is how the government is set up.

This booklet explains some things about how government in North Carolina is set up. In North Carolina, as in other states, we have three kinds of government: city, county and state.

Everybody comes under the state government. It has more power than the other two. Everybody comes under a county government but only those people who live in a town or city come under city government.

THOMAS C. DAYE

CITY AND COUNTY GOVERNMENTS GET THEIR POWER FROM THE STATE GOVERNMENT

The General Assembly, the state law-making body which meets in Raleigh, governs the state with the help of the city and county governments and other governing bodies. The General Assembly tells the city and county governments what kinds of jobs they can do. It gives the local government the power to do these jobs.

The General Assembly does not give all the 100 county governments exactly the same jobs and power. This is also true for city governments. Some cities in North Carolina have more power than others..

CITY GOVERNMENT

Town and city governments are called municipal governments. The main job of municipal governments is to provide services to the people who live in the towns and cities. Another job is to protect the people. Some of the jobs of the municipal governments are to:

- Provide police and fire protection.
- Build and keep up the streets.
- Provide street lighting and sidewalks.
- Pick up garbage.
- Inspect buildings and houses to make sure they are safe.
- Build and maintain a water and sewage system and other public works, such as playgrounds, community centers, libraries and housing.
- Plan for the growth of the city.

In order to do these jobs, municipal governments have certain powers. Some of these powers are to:

- Plan the spending of city money.
- Collect property taxes and other taxes.
- Appoint heads of departments, such as police chief, fire chief and head of water department, who, in turn, hire and fire other city workers.
- Pass ordinances (laws) about municipal affairs — local speed and parking laws, rules about garbage collection, rules about how and where buildings and houses can be built, and so on.

There are two major forms of municipal government in the state: the council-manager form and the mayor-council form. All cities with more than 10,000 people have the manager-council form. Most towns and cities with over 5,000 people have the manager-council form. Most of the smaller towns have the mayor-council form.

Under the mayor-council form, the voters elect a group of people to care for the city business. This group is called the City Councilmen (or City Commissioners or Aldermen). It makes city laws. The voters choose one man to head their municipal government. He is the Mayor. The job of running the government is divided into departments—fire, police, water, sewage, street, building inspection and garbage collection. An important officer is appointed to head and run each department.

MAYOR-COUNCIL FORM

Under the council-manager form of government, the voters elect a City Council (or City Commission or Board of Aldermen). One of the members of the City Council serves as Mayor. The Mayor can be elected by the voters, or the councilmen can appoint one of their members to serve as Mayor. The City Council makes up the budget and passes city laws. The City Council appoints a man to carry out the laws and to run the government from day to day. He is called the City Manager. Often he appoints the heads of the different departments. In some cities, the City Council may appoint some of the department heads.

COUNCIL-MANAGER FORM

The rules about electing the Mayor and Councilmen (or Commissioners or Aldermen) are not just alike in every city. Most of the municipal governing bodies are small They usually have five members.

Most municipal elections are non-partisan. This means that people do not run for office as a member of a political party. City officers usually are elected for a four-year term, but some are elected for two years.

City officers often are elected at-large—that is, by all the voters of the city. In some cities the voters of each ward (a voting district) elect a city officer. Other cities require that the officers be from the different wards but be voted on by the whole city at-large. In some cities both methods are used.

In some cities all the city officers are elected at the same time. In other cities, some of the city officers are elected in each election.

In most municipalities a person must register to vote on the city registration books. This is a separate set of books from the county voter registration books. But cities and counties may combine their voter registration books if they wish. Then a person registers only once in order to vote in all elections. Only a few cities and counties have combined their books.

COUNTY GOVERNMENT

North Carolina has 100 counties. The main job of county goverment is to act for the state in providing services for the people—education, health, welfare and so on. Another important job of the county government is carrying out laws. County governments do not have much power to make laws.

Some of the jobs of the county government are to:

- Decide how much money is needed to give the people the services they need. The county government must then set the local tax rate and collect the taxes.
- Run the schools and the health and welfare departments with the help of the school, health and welfare boards.
- Build and keep up the courthouse, jail, other public buildings, such as libraries.
- Enforce state laws.
- Keep records of important papers, such as marriage licenses and deeds to property.
- Provide a place for some of the state courts.
- Help run the elections.

The job of running the county governments is divided between elected officials and persons who are appointed to offices and boards. Some of the elected officials are: County Commissioners, Sheriff, Register of Deeds, Clerk of Superior Court, and School Board. In some counties the County Accountant (Bookkeeper) and the Tax Collector are elected. In other counties they are appointed. Some of the other appointed officers and boards are: County Lawyer, Tax Supervisor, Welfare Board and Health Board.

ELECTED COUNTY OFFICIALS

The County Commissioners have more say-so in running the county government than anyone else. They:

- Decide how much money is needed to run the county government and set the tax rate.
- Appoint other people to county jobs, such as County Lawyer, County Bookkeeper, County Tax Supervisor and Tax Collector, Building Inspectors. In some counties, they appoint a County Manager.
- Serve on some boards themselves. They serve on the board of Equalization and Review (which holds hearings about the tax value of property). One member serves on the County Health Board.
- Appoint people to other Boards, such as the County Welfare Board, ABC Board, Hospital and Housing Boards and Jury Commission.
- Have some power to start projects to help the people. They can do this by calling for a bond election to improve and build hospitals, schools, libraries, sewages and water systems.

OFFICIALS APPOINTED BY THE COUNTY COMMISSIONERS

BOARDS ON WHICH COMMISSIONERS SERVE AND APPOINT MEMBERS

Most counties have five members on the County Commission. In most counties, the County Commissioners serve for four-year terms. In some counties, all the County Commissioners are elected at one time, but in many counties some of the members are elected in each election. In many counties, the Commissioners are elected at-large by all the voters of the county. Some counties divide the county into districts. Each of the Commissioners must live in a different district, but they are elected by all the county voters.

Some of the other elected county officials are:

- Sheriff. His main job is to enforce state law.
- Register of Deeds. He keeps records of important papers.
- Clerk of Superior Courts. He keeps court records.
- School Board. This board runs the schools at the local level. The School Board—like the Welfare, Health, and other boards and officials—must present a budget to the County Commissioners each year. The County Commissioners may approve the budget or they may cut the budget. (Some cities have a City School Board, but the City School Boards also must present the city school budget to the County Commissioners for their approval.)

All the county officials, except for some county school boards, are elected in partisan elections. This means that people run for office as a member of a political party. County officials are elected in primary and general elections.

STATE GOVERNMENT

The state government is divided into three parts just like the United States government. The three parts are:

- Executive. This part is made up of the Governor, other elected officials and appointed officials and boards. The job of this branch is to run the government and enforce the laws.
- Legislative. This is the General Assembly which meets in Raleigh. This branch makes the laws about how the government is to be run.
- Judicial. This part is made up of the different courts of law. The job of this branch is to decide questions of law and help punish those who are proved guilty of crimes.

THE EXECUTIVE BRANCH

The job of the executive branch is to run the government and see that the laws are carried out. The Governor is head of the executive branch. The Governor has persons who help him do the work of the executive branch. Some of these people are appointed by him. Others are elected.

The Governor has a lot of power. He serves on many important boards himself. He appoints others to offices and boards. He tells the General Assembly (legislature) what laws he thinks are needed. He is the commander of the Highway Patrol and National Guard.

One of the most important powers of the Governor is the power to appoint people to state offices, boards, and commissions. Boards and commissions are a group of people given the orders and duty to do a certain job. This power to appoint people gives the Governor great power in the state government but also in the political party of which he is a member. People are willing to be loyal to the Governor and work for the party if they have a chance of getting jobs that pay well. The people appointed to these jobs and boards have a lot of power. They have a lot of say about how people live—whether they get good schools, highways, health care.

Some appointments made by the Governor are:

- State Board of Education. Most of the members of this board are appointed by the Governor. This board oversees the running of the public schools in the counties and cities. It decides such things as teacher requirements and salary scales.
- State Board of Public Welfare. The job of this board is to oversee the running of the welfare department at the state and county levels. This board hires a Commissioner of Public Welfare to run the State Department of Public Welfare.
- State Board of Health. The Governor and Medical Society of the state appoint the members of this board. The board hires the State Health Director. One of the jobs of this board is to enforce health laws.
- Chairman of the Employment Security Commission. A job of this commission is to run the employment offices in the state. It also has some say-so in who can get unemployment insurance.
- Chairman of the State Highway Commission. One of the jobs of this commission is to decide what highways and roads to build and repair and then to build and repair them.
- Chairman and Members of the Industrial Commission. The job of this commission is to run the workmen's compensation system.
- Commissioner of Motor Vehicles. He is head of the State Highway Patrol.
- Commissioner of Revenue. He collects state taxes.

- Chairman and Members of the State Utilities Commission. This board sets the rates that people have to pay companies for electricity, telephone, natural gas, and bus and railroad fares.
- State Board of Elections. The Governor appoints all the members of this board. This board hires an Executive Secretary. His job is to help see that voter registration and election laws are followed. The State Board appoints the members of the County Boards of Elections.

OFFICERS, BOARDS AND COMMISSIONS APPOINTED BY GOVERNOR

Another important power of the Governor is to help make the laws. The Governor tells the General Assembly what laws he thinks are needed. He also tells the General Assembly how much he thinks it should cost to run the state government and how the money should be spent. The Governor can not veto (veto means forbid) laws passed by the General Assembly. But because he has something to say about the budget and can make many appointments, he still has a lot of power with the General Assembly.

The Governor may call a special session of the General Assembly. He can do this when he thinks there is some important matter the General Assembly must take up.

As we said earlier, some executive officers of the state are elected. The elected officers are:

- Lieutenant Governor. Sometimes the Governor is not able to serve all of his term of office. Then the Lieutenant Governor takes the place of the Governor. The Lieutenant Governor presides over the State Senate.
- Secretary of State. He keeps the records of the state. He has state laws printed. He helps carry out elections in the state.
- Attorney General. He is the chief lawyer of the state. He advises the Governor and other state officials about state laws. He represents the state in the courts.
- State Auditor. He is the state bookkeeper. He looks at the public bills of the state. If he feels bills are right, he asks the Treasurer to pay them.
- State Treasurer. He takes care of fees and taxes that come to the state. He pays all the bills of the state.
- Superintendent of Public Instruction. He works with the schools of the state. Some of his jobs are to help the schools have better education programs and to see that state school laws are obeyed.
- Commissioner of Labor. He is head of the Department of Labor. Some of the jobs of this department are to enforce child labor laws and minimum wage and hour laws, settle strikes, and help train workers for better jobs.
- Commissioner of Insurance. He is head of the Department of Insurance. Some of the jobs of this department are to make sure that the insurance companies have the money to pay claims and to see that the companies do not charge too much for insurance policies.
- Commissioner of Agriculture. He is head of the Department of Agriculture. The job of this department is to see that laws having to do with farming are carried out.

The Governor and the other executive officers are elected in primary and general elections. The executive officers are elected every four years in even numbered years, like 1968, 1972 and 1976.

ELECTED EXECUTIVE OFFICIALS

THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

The law-making body of the state government is the General Assembly. The General Assembly has the power to make many kinds of laws.

The General Assembly can make laws about money matters. It can make laws about how much and what kind of taxes people and companies have to pay. It can decide how much of the tax money the different departments—education, health, welfare, highways, prisons and so on—will get.

The General Assembly can make laws about companies that do business in the state. For example, it can require that the companies pay their workers a certain minimum wage. It can pass laws that make it easy or hard for workers to join unions. The General Assembly can pass laws to start new projects that will give people jobs and help people live better. It can pass laws so that the state and local governments can take part in the many federal (U. S. Government) programs that will help the people.

The General Assembly of North Carolina is made up of two parts: the State Senate and the State House of Representatives. The Senate has 50 members and the House 120 members. The General Assembly meets in Raleigh every odd-numbered year, like 1969, 1971, 1973.

Members of the General Assembly are elected in primary elections (in May) and general elections (in November) just like the executive officers are elected. They are elected every even-numbered year, like 1968, 1970, 1972, for two-year terms.

The state is divided into Senatorial and House of Representative districts. Members of the Senate and House are elected by the voters in each district. Every district is made up of one or more whole counties. Some districts have only one county. Many districts have two or more counties. Some districts elect only one member. Others elect two or more members.

Look at the maps on the next two pages to see in which Senatorial and House District your county is located.

COURTS AND JURY SYSTEM

The state has a system of law courts. It is called the judicial branch of the government. In 1962 and 1965, the state system of courts was changed. This was done so that there would be the same system throughout the state. It will be late 1970 before all the changes are made. Under the new system there will be three kinds of courts: the Appeal Courts, Superior Courts and District Courts.

COURT SYSTEM

The Appeal Courts

This is the highest level of courts. One job of the Appeal Courts is to hear appeals from the lower courts—the Superior and District Courts. If a person does not believe he has been given a fair trial in the lower courts, he may appeal his case. Another job of the appeal courts is to decide if laws are in agreement with the North Carolina Constitution.

There are two kinds of appeal courts. They are the North Carolina Supreme Court and the Court of Appeals. The North Carolina Supreme Court is the highest state court. It has seven justices. The justices are elected by all the state voters for eight-year terms.

The Court of Appeals was set up in 1967 to help the North Carolina Supreme Court. It does this by hearing the less important cases. This court will have nine judges. Six took office in 1967 and the other three will take office in 1969. All nine judges will be elected by the state voters. They serve for eight-year terms.

In appeals courts there are no jury trials.

The Superior Courts

One important job of the Superior Courts is to try the more serious criminal and civil cases. Criminal cases are cases in which a person breaks a law that protects people —robbery, murder, and the like. Civil cases are when two or more persons cannot agree about something, such as who owns a car, land, or furniture. Cases are tried by juries in the Superior Court.

The state is divided into 30 judicial districts. In nearly all the judicial districts, there are two or more counties. Each of the 30 judicial districts has a Superior Court. Each district has one or more Superior Court Judges. The Judges are nominated in primaries by the voters of each district. They are elected in general elections for eight-year terms by all the voters of the state. Also there are eight Special Superior Court Judges. They are appointed by the Governor for four-year terms.

The state lawyer who represents the state in criminal cases is called the Superior Court Solicitor. He is elected by the voters of his district for a four-year term. There will be a Solicitor in each of the 30 judicial districts when the new system is complete.

Look at the map on page 22 to see in which judicial district your county is located.

The District Courts

The District Court system is being set up to do away with the many different kinds of courts at the local level—recorder's court, juvenile court, mayor's court, justice of peace court. By December 1970 there will only be one court at the local level: the District Court. The job of the District Court is to try the less serious criminal cases such as traffic violations. It also tries the less important civil cases—cases involving less than $5,000 of property.

In most trials in the District Court there is no jury. But in some cases a person can request a jury trial. Also if a person does not believe he has been given a fair trial, he can appeal his case to the Superior Court.

Each of the state's 30 judicial districts has a District Court as well as a Superior Court. The voters of each district elect the District Court Judges that hold court in their district. The Judges serve for four-year terms. Each district has from two to six Judges.

Each county has a magistrate. The magistrates assist the District Court Judges by issuing warrants, setting bail, and accepting pleas of guilty in certain traffic cases. In short, they replace the job now done by the justices of peace. Magistrates for each county are appointed by the Superior Court Judge of each judicial district.

Look at the map on page 23 to see when the District Court is set up in your county.

Jury System

Another new law about the court system was passed in 1967. The new law sets up a Jury Commission for each county. The Jury Commission has three members. One member is appointed by the Superior Court Judge, another by the Clerk of Superior Court, and the other by the County Commissioners.

The job of Jury Commissioners is to choose people who might serve on juries. They make up the list of people to serve by using the tax lists and voter registration lists.

NORTH CAROLINA JUDICIAL DISTRICTS

Each of the 30 Judicial Districts now has a Superior Court. All of the 30 Judicial Districts will have a District Court when the new court system is set up throughout the state. Also each Judicial District will have a Solicitor.

CONCLUSION

This booklet doesn't tell you all you need to know about government in North Carolina. To do that would take a booklet many times this size. But we hope it does tell you some of the important things you need to know.

There are other booklets that can tell you more about certain parts of your local government. These are booklets, pretty much like this one, written by the North Carolina Voter Education Project. These booklets are about school boards, county commissions, voter registration, election rights, and precinct meetings. Other booklets like these are being written. If you would like copies of these booklets get in touch with:

INTRODUCTION

The Southern Regional Council and the American Jewish Committee originally asked Reese Cleghorn, associate editor of the Atlanta Journal, to undertake this comprehensive overview of right-wing extremism in the South before the recent efforts to use this sentiment as a base for a nationwide political movement. Our purpose was to cast fresh light on the frustrations and tensions—some local and others quite unrelated to geographic area—that contribute to racism and bigotry in this country.

Although the final Wallace vote in the 1968 Presidential election was far smaller than early opinion polls had indicated, it demonstrated quite clearly that a sizable reservoir of prejudice and repression continues to exist in our land, and that it is vulnerable to manipulation by politically ambitious demagogues, not only in the South, but in the large industrial centers of the North as well.

Mr. Cleghorn's incisive examination into the roots of the "Wallace phenomenon" reveals the historical and psychological underpinnings of southern extremism and alienation and its implications for the nation as a whole. Such an understanding, in our judgment, is an essential element in any program designed to strengthen the forces of moderation and justice not only in the South, but throughout the length and breadth of our nation.

John F. Kennedy had chosen the South as a forum for dealing with the most serious import of rightwing extremism. In the speech that was not delivered in Dallas on November 22, 1963, the President was to have said:

"Ignorance and misinformation can handicap the progress of a city or a company—but they can, if allowed to prevail in foreign policy, handicap this country's security. In a world of complex and continuing problems, in a world full of frustrations and irritations, America's leadership must be guided by the lights of learning and reason—or else those who confuse rhetoric with reality and the plausible with the possible will gain the popular ascendancy with their seemingly swift and simple solutions to every world problem.

"There will always be dissident voices heard in the land. . . . Those voices are inevitable. But today other voices are heard in the land—voices preaching doctrines wholly unrelated to reality . . . We cannot expect that everyone, to use the phrase of a decade ago, will 'talk sense to the American people.' But we can hope that fewer people will listen to nonsense. . . ."

Less than three months later, Professor Revilo P. Oliver, a member of the John Birch Society's National Council, expressed his view in the society's magazine, American Opinion, that "Kennedy was assassinated by the Communist Conspiracy because he was planning to turn American." Robert Welch, founder and president of the Birch Society, found Professor Oliver's analysis to be "superb commentary." Such is the degree of irrationalism which characterizes the extreme right in America and which, as President Kennedy had suggested, can endanger American security "in a world full of frustrations and irritations."

In the South today, as in turbulent and unsettled California and in the old isolationist regions of the Middle West, what we might call "white-collar" rightwing extremism has found fertile ground. To designate it "rightwing" is, however, a poor bit of shorthand, for, as President Kennedy seemed to be saying, its doctrines and underlying assumptions often are in essence neither left nor right but simply hallucinations, "wholly unrelated to reality." By some measures these "rightwing extremists" are close to the most extreme left, having strong anarchistic leanings and, contradictorily, strong inclinations toward state suppression and totalitarianism. Rightist radicalism arises generally out of the great confusion which rapid change has produced in American life. More specifically, it comes out of an inability on the part of millions of 20th Century Americans to understand an increasingly complex form of government; and an inability, for all the extreme right's ostensible devotion to tradition, to accept perhaps the most important tradition underlying two centuries of democratic continuity in America: moderation and liberality in our political processes and a rejection of political diabolism.

The seed sown in the South by the Birch Society and lesser organizations of the extreme right fall on soil different from that of California or Michigan. It is fertile soil for rightwing doctrines; yet it could prove less receptive to hard-line rightwing organizations than the political and social climate might at first suggest.

It is well to remember that most of the nation only recently made a gross misjudgment in the case of racism, finding the South peculiarly guilty on the basis of the usual indicators. Then in the 1960s we began to see slack-jawed hoodlums harassing peacefully demonstrating Negroes in Michigan, Wisconsin and California. (Were these the fabled "crackers"?) We also heard mayors and congressmen from New Jersey and Illinois speaking all the lines long since assumed to be the peculiar litany of southern officialdom. (Were these "Dixiecrats"?) Perhaps all this has changed some of our perception of racism outside the South; surely it also must have changed some of the simplistic views about the South itself. An examination of rightwing radicalism in the South will be similarly distorted if runaway assumptions allow us to take specifics of rightwing influence in the region and loosely extend them to generalities with the reasoning that all this must be so because the South is, after all, "the most rightwing part of the country."

THE SOUTH'S PECULIAR ETHOS

The South does have its peculiar ethos, of course, that repeatedly has entangled it with whatever rightwing obsession was current. This, along with the more Gothic part of the South's history, has generated judgments that often are too pat. Consider, for example, the ways in which the region can easily be compared with the rightist totalitarian countries of our time.

This is the only part of the country with a history of strong "master race" theory. It has often been regionally paranoiac, suspicious of the rest of the nation and of the world. It is the only part of the country that has suffered stinging and humiliating defeat, and that in a war with a central moral issue. It has always been the poorest part of the nation, and often it has been the victim of discrimination; for instance, for generations, through railroad freight-rate structures fashioned through Northern political and industrial influence to help enable Northern industry to make a colony of the South. Its peculiar Church, warped by its proximity first to slavery and later to white supremacy, developed apart from mainstream Christianity and came to a theology that rationalized the status quo and sanctified the authority of the state — the state government — in basic social matters. Finally, it is the part of the country most conscious of a martial heritage. It has always responded to war. Even in the wake of the Civil War calamity and estrangement from the nation, the South was in the forefront of American chauvinism in the Spanish-American War. Much of its private, secondary education has been in military academies. A general in uniform, Robert E. Lee, adorns the walls of its banks, law firms, and insurance offices. It has been the region lending greatest support to a "hard line" on Vietnam. Without question, the South thrills to military braid and admires military authority.

For comparison, place alongside these characteristics, now, some characteristics of places which in the 20th Century have been the most fertile ground for rightwing extremism. More often than not, they have been places with a tradition of or a susceptibility to racial doctrines something like white supremacy; have known chaos, defeat and/or some colonization (not necessarily through political structures) on the part of other countries; have had deep-running problems of poverty; have had religious influences that identified themselves with narrow power interests and with the state; and could readily accept military authority and the enthronement of military swagger and its trappings as a kind of substitute for or handmaiden of monarchy's regal trappings.

The comparisons may be imperfect, but they have general validity. If the South had attained its independence a century ago, it might have moved further into these patterns under the duress of hardship. The social, economic, political, and religious conditions that bred demagogues who could only flail against Washington might have made demagogues who could have captured the Capitol at Richmond. The modern technology without which real totalitarianism is impossible might have abetted the suppression of dissent. (The process of suppression often has been present in the South; the means usually have not been.) The hardy, indigenous strain of liberality and resistance which always has been present in the South might have been overcome, just as similar old, indigenous democratic strains were overcome in Germany Italy, Spain, Portugal and many other countries.

But because the South was not a separate nation, because it had to make its public life mesh at least somewhat with that of the nation and ultimately abide by the Constitution, the influences that might have tilted it this other way remained strong but not dominant. The region was protected and saved by its own defeat. The relatively honorable leadership of the Confederacy, which (notwithstanding its defense of slavery) still had much of the idealism and the republican, democratic devotion of the nation's Founding Fathers, was not supplanted by political jackals of the kind that often come in the second and third stages of revolution.

Liberals of the South usually have instinctively known all this, or at least have acted on these premises: They have known that the survival of liberal democracy in the South sometimes has been dependent upon supplies, spiritual reinforcement and governmental force from outside, all these constituting a kind of reverse "underground railroad." For all their prominence, the worst influences in the region could never fully move it into anti-democratic, anti-liberal patterns. All this was with one mighty exception, of course: Negroes in much of the South lived under totalitarian control. But in a strange contradiction, even while this was taking place democracy was being extended and was becoming entrenched for others in the South.

The region's very racism enabled it to put Negroes aside as another variety of beings, so that they were not even seen as contradictions to the South's oft-expressed and oft-serious devotion to democracy. In the South's view Negroes were, after all, different. Even during the aberrations of the 1950s and early 1960s in Mississippi, Louisiana, Alabama and Georgia, state-level efforts at totalitarianism were only outrageous, not finally effective. The Mississippi State Sovereignty Commission said blithely that thought control was one of its chief objectives; but it never did, even so, control thoughts. Even in Mississippi's sickness of the time, this could not have been pulled off. Some sense of democracy prevailed when white people's rights began to be intruded upon.

The South in its worst moments, as during the throes of reaction following the 1954 Supreme Court desegregation decision, has been saved from its home-grown totalitarians by two forces: the centuries-old grassroots sense of democracy (which, though blinded to the lack of democracy for Negroes, was very real); and the South's very romanticism and irrationalism. Irrationalism, then, has worked both ways: to nurture doctrines of the radical right, and to thwart them in application. A police state, surely, must have efficiency and a basic ideology compatible with the aims of state control.

IRRATIONALISM: A WAY OF LIFE

Irrationalism has been a public way of life in the South since early in the 19th Century, when the region had to begin reconciling its devotion to democracy with its denial of democracy to Negroes. The South thus is vulnerable, by tradition, to nonsense. With the necessity of embracing American ideals while simultaneously defending first slavery and later rigid white supremacy, which often was absurd as well as ruthless in practice, the white South developed an irrational thought system that was both legalistic and moralistic. Its objectives, of course, were neither legal nor moral. Given this tension, the most preposterous propositions came to be accepted with tenacity. Leslie W. Dunbar has written of a great wonder: the fact that the South, which bore a burden of regional guilt that was apparent to anyone who looked and had some sensitivity to morality, has always regarded itself not just as a moral equal among regions but as morally superior. To manage this, and to manage to defy the Constitution and make the rest of the nation ignore that for a century, it was necessary to invent legalistic and moralistic rationales that could and did stand the test of time. They were codified, becoming a catechism which ignorant white southerners could ignore ("nigger, nigger" being sufficient for them) but which intelligent and educated white southerners must know and defend lest they be seduced by troublesome alien beliefs, sponsored by "outsiders" who "hated the South." Consequently, irrational mechanisms — "Our Negroes are happy and don't want any of this agitation," "The 14th Amendment is really illegal," "The Supreme Court's decisions are unconstitutional," "The South is not racist; it is just for states rights and freedom of association"—became perfectly acceptable. The mind that could not understand these things, so the thinking went, just did not understand the South.

It is an easy jump from these mental processes, which were the product of guilt, obsessive defensiveness, closed-mindedness, and a bit of paranoia, to the catechisms of those who "confuse rhetoric with reality and the plausible with the possible." These codes, too, usually are based upon obsessive defensiveness, guilt, closed-mindedness and a bit of paranoia. People who could believe that every day a snickering, South-hating, usurping, power-mad, socialistic ilk in Washington was plotting to throttle the South's best interests and set Negroes on their best friends might just as well believe that every day Moscow was chortling as it watched its agents infiltrate and gain control of the government, press, churches and unions of America so that the country was already about three-fourths conquered by Soviet power. The two propositions were, after all, about equally true. And, of course, when the Communist scare was nicely linked with the Negro scare, as an explanation of why "our Negroes are upset," the second proposition tended to make still more sense.

CHANGE AND PERSONAL CRISIS

Then there are the crises of change in the South which are a part of the change going on elsewhere in the country. Especially intensive are the changes from rural to urban and from agricultural to industrial. Uncertainty about one's place and worth appears to be an increasing phenomenon in the highly organized society of modern America. It also appears to be a common factor among many people attracted to rightwing extremism. A number of analyses have suggested this. Using conclusions of a study of radical rightists, Ira S. Rohter, a political scientist at the University of Wisconsin, has usefully categorized many rightists as "the decliners, the new arrivals, and the value keepers" who feel status frustration. The "decliners" are people "going down on the social scale—undeservedly, as they see it," often falling below the status levels of fathers who were self-employed businessmen or farm owners; the "new arrivals" are "on the way up" but caught in the lag between the time the new arrival achieves success and the time he finds an established place among peers and is accepted as an equal; the "value keepers" may be rising or falling in status and feel themselves at least temporarily threatened severely by "aliens who know not the Lord," who put more stock in education, expertise and mass solutions than in the hard work, self-discipline, prudence and independence that was the bedrock of the small-town life of the past.

Study of a selected group of radical rightists indicated, Rohter concluded, a disproportionate number who were undergoing status change with feelings that they "do not have the prestige and power they should have if the world were just—and their enemies have too much." They identify themselves with "older, traditional (Protestant ethic) values of work, religion and morality" so that their fight seems not simply a struggle with other legitimate interests but, rather, on the side of truth, justice, decency, God and America. They tend to believe their troubles are caused by an evil conspiracy and see society as essentially closed to them, dominated by personalities, controlled by the wrong kind of people. They want simple explanations, and conspiracy satisfies that need. They tend to show "strident negativism and combativeness" that expresses itself in extreme self-righteousness, a strong belief in harsh punishments, a feeling of powerlessness, a view that Communism is not merely a bad and aggressive threat but an all-pervasive Satan incarnate which cannot be tolerated in any way by the righteous. (About half were members of fundamentalist religious faiths.)

It is obvious that much of the South is susceptible to such feelings, with the South's unusually rapid increase in population mobility and transitions of many kinds. Between 1950 and 1960 the nation's increase in urban population was 29.3 per cent, and in the South as defined by the Census it was 40.1 per cent. The rural farm population declined 41.7 per cent nationally and 50.2 per cent in the South. During that decade the South's urban population increased from 48.6 per cent to 58.5 per cent of the total population (compared with a national figure of 69.9 per cent). Even such a Deep South state as Georgia, which had been 90 per cent rural at the turn of the century, plunged well beyond the 50-50 mark in urbanization.

Values of the farm and the village often are in sharp conflict with the demands of the city. Further, religious fundamentalism has been so widespread in the South in the past that a confused southerner seeking explanations for the strange changes in the world around him may respond well to a simplistic religious explanation. Rightwing extremism also is more likely to be race-related in the South than elsewhere. This is true not only because of historic racist doctrines in the region but also because a man who feels his own status threatened can see that in recent years Negroes have been rising on the ladder, Jews have occupied prominent places, and a Catholic has become President. Much of the nation may be startled at the very idea when it sees hoodlums bearing signs saying "White Power," "Keep America White," and "National Association for the Advancement of White Power," but the idea of Anglo-Saxon whites' being shoved aside and outdistanced is not strange to men and women whose own individual status seems imperiled and who are surrounded by others who see things the same way. In terms of numbers of people, there may be more of this feeling in the urban, industrial areas of the Midwest and the mobile, often impersonal and frequently rootless life of California. But in the South of today, probably a higher percentage of the population feels this powerlessness and victimization.

THE POLITICAL RADICALS

It is in the political arena, rather than in the spread of such organizations as the John Birch Society, that these frustrations are having the most dramatic impact in the South. The region obviously has much more than its proportionate share of major political figures who are close to the radical right. The list is long, but these examples are pre-eminent:

—Gov. Lester Maddox of Georgia has had an involvement with a variety of rightwing organizations over at least a decade. In the years immediately before his election as governor in 1966, he frequently was a public ally of the Birch Society, the Citizens Councils, and such rightwing gospelers as Billy James Hargis. He refused to disavow the Ku Klux Klan, obviously because to do so would have offended many of his friends. At the time he was elected, the Let Freedom Ring rightwing telephone messages for Atlanta were coming from his furniture store. After he was publicly embarrassed by a Let Freedom Ring attack on the American Legion, the telephone equipment was swiftly removed; shortly, the message service was back in action, with its equipment located in an American Opinion book store (distributor of John Birch literature). Despite an initial effort to establish a "moderate" image, Gov. Maddox did not otherwise disavow his old friends. Some members of the radical right won second-level political appointments. A few months after taking office, Maddox appeared at a national gathering of the Rev. Mr. Hargis' Christian Anti-Communism Crusade. His pronouncements on such subjects as the urban riots, Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.'s assassination and international affairs have continued to reflect the rightwing extremist line. Following the assassination, for instance, he said Dr. King had "carried out the policies and programs of Communists in this country."

—George Wallace, as governor of Alabama and later as a candidate for president, was the beneficiary of nationwide help from the radical right. Its members had been prominent in local efforts outside the South for his candidacy in presidential primaries in 1964. In the 1968 presidential campaign, they held key roles in the various state organizations created to support Wallace's candidacy. Wallace supporters used the rightist third parties established in many states as an outgrowth of the Congress of Conservatives, held in 1965 under the chairmanship of Kent Courtney, a rightist pamphleteer. These truly represented the outer fringes of American politics. Principal movers in some of the activities were Courtney; "Ace" Carter, who had been in the news over the years as an Alabama Klansman and Citizens Council leader; and former Sheriff James G. Clark of Selma, who also was popular on the John Birch Society speaking circuit.

Wallace's efforts also rested heavily in some areas upon the extremist Citizens Councils, Liberty Lobby and Congress of Freedom. Liberty Lobby began pushing the Wallace candidacy in 1965. It announced it was sending everyone on its mailing list a copy of a tabloid called "Stand Up for America—The Story of George Wallace." The Citizens Councils touted Wallace in their publications. In 1965 Wallace was speaker at the annual leadership conference of the Citizens Councils of America, at which one extremist speaker lengthily spiked the proceedings with anti-Semitic remarks that could only be described as rantings. Two months later Wallace was a main speaker at the annual convention of the Congress of Freedom, one of the wildest of all organizations of the radical right.

Some of the early Wallace campaign planning was at a meeting on November 8, 1965, in Montgomery attended by Ned Touchstone, Richard Cotton and John R. Rarick. Touchstone, whose plans for a "Draft Wallace" movement must have had either Wallace's approval or acquiescence, is widely known because of the crude racism and anti-Semitism of the Councilor, which he edits. Cotton is a radio commentator whose views are far beyond simple arch-conservatism; he sees a "Zionist-Jewish conspiracy" as all-pervasive and works with some of the country's leading hate peddlers. Rarick, then a Louisiana judge and later a congressman, has included such nationally known extremists as Col. Curtis B. Dall and Lt. Gen. Pedro Del Valle in his congressional campaign organization.

In Ohio, the Christian Conservative Party was the first group to promote the Wallace candidacy. Its headquarters, and the offices of the early statewide Ohio-for-Wallace group, were in a book store that distributed the most rancid propaganda of the radical right. A key figure in the effort there was a man who had advocated sending Negroes to Africa and who had suggested all Jews are Communists. In Missouri, one of the leading Wallace people was the Rev. Bill Beeney, of St. Louis. He sponsored the appearance of former Sheriff Clark when he was in Missouri as the campaign organizer. Beeney's splinter, the Counter Revolutionary Organization on Salvation and Service (CROSS), promoted the distribution of weapons to be used to combat uprisings. In some places representatives of the Patriotic Party, political arm of the Minutemen, had leading roles in the Wallace effort. Though there later was confusion about its endorsement, in 1967 the Patriotic Party chose Wallace as its presidential candidate. John Birch members had prominent roles in Wallace organizations in many states. Robert Shelton, imperial wizard of the United Klans of America, claimed more strength than his organization actually had but no doubt reflected its political allegiance when he said of Wallace: "We made him governor and we must make him president." Extremist followers of Wallace were not hanging on despite discouragement; he repeatedly refused to disavow individuals and organizations with which presidential candidates traditionally have disassociated themselves. In many ways his was the most radical major presidential campaign in the country's history.

—John Bell Williams, governor of Mississippi, had rightwing ties as open as those of Maddox and Wallace. His voting record as a congressman would have warmed the heart of any ultra-rightist. Most notably in his non-legislative activities, he was a supporter of the Citizens Councils and the Liberty Lobby. The latter organization was founded by Willis Carto, a former Birch Society worker who once proposed that American Negroes be shipped to Africa. Liberty Lobby sometimes has had anti-Semitic thrust, as well. The Washington Observer, which Group Research has called a thinly-disguised Liberty Lobby newsletter, once suggested that Jewish organizations were behind efforts to win U.S. approval of the U.S.-Soviet consular treaty to facilitate Jewish migration from Russia. It added that consequently "we not only got a Consular Treaty but also will now receive many more Jews as immigrants from Russia! How lucky can we be?" Among Liberty Lobby's founders was Tom Brady, later a Mississippi Supreme Court justice and a leading figure in the Citizens Councils.

—Among congressmen and senators, the South Carolina delegation often has led the South in support of the radical right. Rep. Mendel Rivers, one of Congress' most powerful men as chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, defended the John Birch Society on the floor of the House in 1961. He has appeared on the rightwing Manion Forum. In July of 1967 the American Security Council, a conservative pressure group that grew out of an industry loyalty-security program, said it had been retained by Rivers' committee (apparently without payment) to study the U.S. arms race with Russia.

Rep. Albert Watson of South Carolina was a featured speaker at a Washington gathering of the Liberty Lobby in January of 1967. Reps.

W. J. Bryan Dorn and E. Y. Berry of South Carolina have been Liberty Lobby supporters. Sen. J. Strom Thurmond has always been a favorite of the radical right in general, and probably no other member of Congress has so consistently satisfied the radical right's conception of what a legislator should be.

—In Louisiana, the strong influence of Leander Perez, Sr., a nationally-known white supremacist and anti-Semite, has waned in recent years but in 1968 he showed renewed strength in manipulations within the Louisiana Democratic Party organizaton and through his efforts on behalf of Wallace. With a political and economic power base of his own for five decades (through his domination of minerals-rich Plaquemines Parish), Perez has had the wherewithal to voice his bigotry without compromise; it came out not only explosively anti-Negro but thoroughly and elaborately anti-Semitic. To Perez, trends toward extending civil liberties in recent years have been results of the plotting of Communist Zionists who were manipulating inherently inferior Negroes in the civil rights movement. Perez has said frankly that he does not believe in democracy and many times has advocated violence. One would think that the influence of such a man could not stand the test of time, but 50 years after his emergence as a political figure in Louisiana he still can move events. It would appear that his loss of the influence he once exercised is related less to the outrageousness of his words and actions than to the fact that in Louisiana he is now regarded as gauche. Perez is no longer the kind of man the most "respectable" people want to be associated with. With shiftings toward moderation in Lousiana, and with a rising Negro vote there, it is probable that no one can quite take the place of Perez. Rep. John R. Rarick, a loyal Citizens Councils supporter, and Rep. Joe Waggoner, who has supported the Liberty Lobby, are, however, two public figures of influence who are friends of the radical right.

The five states represented by these men have been, of course, the wellsprings of Southern extremism in recent years. It is worthwhile to note, however, that the rightist Southern politicians seldom worked seriously to structurally build rightwing organizations. An exception to this observation was to be found in Mississippi in the 1950s and early 1960s, when prominent political figures such as Ross Barnett positively furthered the development of the Citizens Councils. But for the most part, the leading political rightwingers have not cared to seriously build separate, private organizations that might rival their own bases or force them at points to take steps that could be politically damaging. An example of this caution was the Talmadge organization's success in the mid-1950s in preventing the Citizens Councils from becoming a serious factor as an organization in Georgia. The big names of Georgia segregation — Herman Talmadge, Marvin Griffin, Roy Harris, Lester Maddox, and others — sponsored the Georgia States Rights Council, the state's equivalent to the Citizens Councils. But apparently because of Talmadge's influence, it never was allowed to extend roots organizationally. Once a year its sponsors would gather for oratory. The council itself never became an apparatus that could be used by new Jacobins to challenge the old Jacobins politically. Politicians usually are jealous of their own control, and distrustful of power bases that might be used by someone else to outdo them at their own games.

Some politicians have learned that relying upon Birch members or encouraging their influence in political structures can be costly. One leading southern Republican, who was beneficiary of substantial Birch Society political action in the Goldwater campaign of 1964, said then they were welcome and that his only requirement was that they work for the party. They did. But in time their primary allegiance to the doctrines of the Birch Society caused difficulties. His assessment of their political participation, coming from a tough-minded political organizer, is worth noting. He said recently in private:

"Those people are no problem if you've got others who know what's going on, who'll fight them when necessary. I've never been concerned with the Birch Society as an organization. I've never seen their lines of organization and leadership galvanized behind a particular candidate or policy, with control that transcends other lines of leadership. They may get together before a meeting and talk about what to do. But I never saw evidence that a section leader ordered them to do something which they just carried out. On the other hand, the Birch Society attracts some people who are irresponsible, and the nature of the society gives them a feeling of personal power. That type, trying to satisfy his own need for power, concerns me more than the ideological commitments of Birchers in general. The Birch Society members usually are not really interested in politics on a continuing and realistic basis. The ones who helped us most in 1964 are mostly out of party work now and busy with fundamentalist-type religion of the anti-Communist, anti-National Council of Churches type."

EXPORTING SOUTHERN RADICALISM

In 1968 a basic question about rightist radicalism in Southern politics arrested the attention of the nation as a whole: Could it be exported, so that a peculiarly southern politician might lead the whole country to the extreme right? George Wallace set out to make his presidential candidacy a truly national campaign, in sharp contrast with the sectional campaign conducted in 1948 by Sen. Thurmond and the States Rights Party. He won a place on the ballot in every state, an accomplishment requiring prodigious effort and widespread support. Polls early in the campaign, and in mid-campaign, showed his popularity rising steadily across the nation.

Is Wallace a peculiarly southern politician? The argument can be made that he is simply a major political figure of the right who happens to be from the South; that other non-southern politicians, such as the late Sen. Joseph McCarthy of Wisconsin, have occupied essentially the same position in the political spectrum; and that accordingly there is nothing peculiarly southern about Wallace's politics. To a degree, this is true. It is easy to imagine that a national demagogue similar in many ways to Wallace might emerge from, for instance, the struggles over order in the schools of New York, Pennsylvania, or Ohio. But even so, such a figure would not represent the same phenomenon that Wallace represents. He embodies the essence and spirit of a century of peculiarly southern resistance to the national ideals, with all its sly subtleties alien to most of the country's people; disregard for constitutional processes in general, with an assumption (accepted in much of the South) that tradition and folk custom are more important than law; traditional southern "put-the-bottom-rung-on-top" class appeals; and regional paranoia unlike any to be found elsewhere. Even his political rhetoric, which often surprised his non-southern listeners (with such lines as "We gone put 'em under the jail"), reduced the sense of identity which non-southerners could have with him. Wallace was, after all, a man who had a strong political base at home partly because he had exploited many people's sense of inferiority as southerners and their conviction that they were being looked down upon because of what they were. ("Folks down here in Alabama are just as refined and cultured as folks anywhere!" Wallace often says, and these words invariably bring applause from people who apparently need to be told just this.) In his last speech of the campaign, on the Georgia State Capitol steps, Wallace returned repeatedly to his regional themes. He said Georgians were tired of being looked down upon, and that they were as good as any bureaucrats with briefcases. He spoke of the need to show that a southerner could be elected president. The speech again underscored that, if Wallace was not a sectional candidate, at least he was a particular kind of peculiarly southern candidate running nationally.

The election results indicated that if the nation is soon to be led to the extreme right by a demagogue, as it may be, he will have to be something more than a demagogue of provincial thought processes, rhetoric and spirit. Rightwing radicalism in the South may help him substantially; but in its provincialism, it has peculiarities that only southerners can identify with.

The early poll showings reflected a strong general discontent in the country which Wallace could marshal for the pollsters but which he could not translate into votes for the presidency of the United States. His 13 per cent nationally can be construed as alarming or as small enough to be reassuring. What is more important than the percentage is the distribution of his vote: It almost perfectly reflected the southern nature of his candidacy and the unwillingness of those outside the South to follow him.

Wallace carried only Alabama, with 65 per cent of the votes; Mississippi, with 63 per cent; Louisiana, with 48; Georgia, with 43; and Arkansas, with 40. Twenty years earlier Thurmond had carried Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana and South Carolina. There was, then, little difference between the outcome for Wallace, with respect to his area of strong appeal, and the results for Thurmond, an easily identifiable southern sectional candidate. Wallace carried most of the "inner" South and did more poorly in the "outer" South, more poorly still in border states, and more poorly still in the rest of the nation. The pattern, in terms of the "southernness" of his appeal, was clear.

In the "outer" South, which he had hoped to carry, there were these results for him: Virginia, 24 per cent; Tennessee, 34; North Carolina, 31; Florida, 29; and Texas, 19. (In South Carolina, an "inner" South state, he apparently was limited to 31 per cent largely by the influence of Thurmond and other influential Republicans who presented Richard Nixon as perhaps less desirable for the South but more likely to win.) In the border states, he won these votes: Kentucky, 18 per cent; Maryland, 15; Missouri, 11; Delaware, 13; and West Virginia, 10. Significantly, in typical conservative states distant from the South, he made some of his worst showings; for instance, in Arizona (where Barry Goldwater was regaining his seat in the Senate), Wallace had nine per cent, and in Kansas, 10. He obviously was not seen primarily as a conservative in these states, but primarily as a southern radical.

In three states where he had served as a vehicle for very strong protest votes in the Democratic primaries of 1964, he did very poorly as a genuine candidate for the White House. He won 15 per cent in Maryland, where he had polled 43 per cent in the 1964 primary; 12 per cent in Indiana, where he had 30 per cent in 1964; and eight per cent in Wisconsin, where he had polled 34 per cent in 1964. These votes indicated that although many people four years earlier had been willing to vote for him in plebiscites on their discontent, most did not see his politics as suitable for a national presidential candidate.

Surely his peculiarly southern appeal was the basic factor in his insignificant showings in such states as Maine, where he won two per cent; Vermont, three per cent; New Hampshire, four per cent; and Hawaii, one per cent. In the final analysis, too, he lost much of the blue-collar support he had seemed to have during what might be called the rhetorical protest stage of the campaign, before the White House was at stake. His results were poor in all industrial states. In Michigan he received only 10 per cent of the votes; in Ohio, 12 per cent; in New Jersey, nine per cent; in Illinois and Pennsylvania, eight per cent; and in California, seven per cent.

The Wallace campaign, with strong financing, nationwide organization, and almost even-time treatment by the mass media in general, scored well enough to cause concern about the extent of rightwing extremist feeling in the country. But what it revealed about that was not surprising. Certainly it did not indicate that the South can mold and direct the nation's extremism according to the designs and emphases of its peculiar, provincial variety of rightwing radicalism.

RIGHTISTS IN AND OUT OF OFFICE

The kind of political extremism that has prevailed or at least has been strongly represented in much of the South for decades is not substantially the product of radical national or regional organizations. Southern political rightists frequently have aided the organized right; but they have seldom been created by it. Nor is there convincing evidence that the election of a radical governor, such as Maddox or Wallace, has greatly increased the membership and activity of such organizations as the Birch Society, again with the lone exception of Mississippi during the era of Citizens Councils strength and their alliance with Gov. Ross Barnett. No one could have been more of an "anything goes" radical rightist than Maddox. But as he approached the middle of his term in office, there seemed to be no great increase in organized radical rightist activity in Georgia attributable to his influence. The John Birch Society in the Atlanta area in mid-1968 evidently had no more than 500 active members (one former member scoffed at any suggestion that it had more than 200). That figure represented no substantial increase and possibly a decline since 1964, despite intense new organizational efforts. The Citizens Councils still had made no inroads in Georgia, which always had been barren land for them. In Atlanta, where a council existed in name, it was hardly more than a mailing address. The Klan's membership apparently had not risen appreciably. Evidence of Klan activity seemed, in fact, substantially less than in some recent years and largely amounted to an occasional peaceful demonstration in Atlanta. (The Georgia Grand Dragon of the United Klans, Calvin Craig, resigned his Klan office in early 1968, indicating he would seek public office. He was amicably sitting down with Negroes regularly as a participant in Atlanta's Model Cities program, and he sought their votes in an unsuccessful race for sheriff.) When the preacher-evangelists of the radical right, in particular Billy James Hargis and Fred Schwarz, came through Georgia in 1967, their crowds were no larger than before. A visit by Robert Welch of the Birch Society in February of 1967 attracted about 400 people, a much smaller crowd than he had drawn in 1966.

PROPAGANDA IN PRINT

If the radical organizations have not burgeoned everywhere, nevertheless the word they bear about public issues has. The theory of the Birch Society and its allies often has served as a codification and rationalization of existing prejudices, extending and enforcing them. Much of this has been done through publications and radio.

Among the principal rightist publications widely distributed in the South is Human Events, started in 1944 as a four-page newsletter by some prominent people (including Gen. Robert E. Wood and Charles E. Lindbergh) who had been associated with the isolationist America First Committee. Human Events at one time had close ties with the Birch Society, H. L. Hunt's Life Line organization, and other radical right groups. Human Events and the Birch Society have jointly offered their followers bulk subscriptions to Human Events and the Society's American Opinion magazine, at reduced rates. Many of the sponsors of Human Events in recent years have been leading Birch members, and the tabloid-size paper continues to push a standard set of far-right views and proposals. It cannot be as clearly labeled radical right as some other publications. Much of its content may be described as very conservative but not radical rightist in the narrow sense, consisting of articles by such people as Barry Goldwater, Ralph de Toledano, and Max Rafferty and reprints from conservative newspapers such as the Chicago Tribune and the Charleston News and Courier. It offers a combination of far-rightist viewpoints along with very conservative views that are more in the mainstream of public exchange. Its national circulation has reached an estimated 180,000, and it appears to be distributed very widely in the South.

Several publications of the radical right originate in the South. They are produced primarily for Southern readers. These include the Citizens Councils' magazine, the Citizen, and various pamphlets and books which that organization pushes; the Augusta Courier, a weekly tabloid put-together of clippings and extreme personal views published by old-time segregationist politician Roy Harris, of Augusta, Georgia, president of the Citizens Councils of America; the Independent American, a small monthly newspaper published by Free Men Speak, Inc., of New Orleans, whose principal voices have been Kent and Phoebe Courtney; the Southern States Industrial Council Bulletin, published semi-monthly in Nashville by a council with some large corporate support whose stated views parallel most of the program of the radical right; the Birmingham Independent, whose readership is local; and the Councilor, publication of the Louisiana Citizens Councils.

Other radical right publications with some influence in the South include the Birch Society's American Opinion magazine, a monthly, and its Bulletin, a monthly in which Robert Welch tells members how they may implement the society's program first by reading and then by action; Life Lines, a four-page commentary put out three times a week by H. L. Hunt's Life Lines Foundation; the Dan Smoot Report, a four-page, letter-size weekly published in Dallas by Dan Smoot, who previously was commentator for Hunt's defunct radio program "Facts Forum;" the Christian Crusade, a monthly magazine, and the Weekly Crusader, a bulletin, published at Tulsa by Billy James Hargis; Liberty Letter, monthly official organ of the Liberty Lobby, whose 210,000 circulation nationally makes it the biggest periodical clearly representing the radical right; and News & Views, a monthly published by Maj. Edgar Bundy's Church League of America.

An arresting fact about all these publications is their sameness of viewpoint. The standard line, from which there is little variation, is opposition to the United Nations, the poverty program and the Supreme Court; hysterical exaggeration of the progress of internal communism; advocacy of a return of prayer to the public schools; opposition to civil rights legislation, with assertions that civil rights organizations are Communist pawns; a belief that the schools, press, churches and other basic institutions are Communist-infiltrated or at best dominated by "liberal-socialist" theory; and proposals to basically alter the federal system. There are variations on such questions as whether to support a third party and whether to dismantle the federal government by repealing the income tax and barring it from professional and business services (as the Liberty Lobby's proposed Liberty Amendment would do) or whether to simply limit income tax rates by amendment except in time of war (as the Southern States Industrial Council proposes).

PROPAGANDA ON THE AIR

The message of the radical right is much stronger in the South than elsewhere on radio stations. In fact, radio appears to be the most formidable weapon in the radicals' arsenal. A reasonable estimate indicates that 7,000 programs of the radical right are heard weekly across the nation, and a sizable portion of these are on southern stations. One reason for their proliferation has been the sluggishness with which liberals and others have moved to challenge them. Now when licenses are up for renewal before the Federal Communications Commission, questions occasionally are being raised about whether a station heavily dispensing radical rightist views is providing the kind of balance on public issues which the FCC requires. But each challenge must be well documented. Further, a station may escape giving equal time to those attacked or to the causes they represent if there is no well-prepared request for the time; and when a station goes unchallenged at the time of a program it can argue that it would have granted equal time if this had been requested.

The South's affinity for radical right radio programs is worth close scrutiny. The region is still less urban than most of the nation, and a large part of its population regularly listens to small, local stations. It is exactly these low-budget stations, often without network ties or other good sources of programming, which most often use the radical right's prepared propaganda. The rightist evangelists, especially, have appeal in the South. One of their byproducts appears to be in influencing local preachers (usually of the smaller, fundamentalist sects) who use the radio simultaneously for jeremiads and fund appeals to sustain the program.

The Rev. Carl McIntyre's "Twentieth Century Reformation Hour" has led the field in the South, as well as nationally. Organized in 1958, this daily program was being heard on 313 stations by 1962. Its biggest forward movement came during and immediately after the general national upsurge of the right in 1964. At one point during that year the number of stations was 448, with 201 of these (45 per cent) in the South. In 1965 the number of stations exceeded 600. The program apparently continued to be strong in 1968, with about half the stations in the southern states. Much of McIntyre's appeal is to those who dislike the National Council of Churches and the directions in which almost all the major Protestant denominations have been moving on social and theological questions. McIntyre himself was barred from continued service as a clergyman of the Presbyterian Church in the U. S. A. (now the United Presbyterian Church) in 1936. That church's General Assembly, its highest governing body, accused him of defaming the character of fellow Christians, causing "dissension and strife" and engendering suspicion and ill will. He has been a leading figure in the American Council of Churches and the International Council of Churches, splinter groups established as rivals of, respectively, the National and World Councils of Churches. McIntyre's appeal to religious separatism and fundamentalism is enhanced in the South by his longstanding opposition to civil rights legislation and statements like the one in which he said talk about racial brotherhood is only Communist propaganda. He is stridently anti-Catholic and in the past has been allied with anti-Semites. In the spring of 1967 he held a Washington meeting of his American Council of Churches to charge suppression of his radio program by the FCC under the "fairness doctrine" on equal time; but the program appears to be still going strong.

The progress of another broadcast of the religious rightists, the "Christian Crusade Radio Ministry," a daily program by Billy James Hargis, also is especially noteworthy. It is sponsored by Hargis' Christian Crusade, which derives funds from various sources, and by contributions it requests on the air. In 1962 it had reached a peak, with 200 radio and 12 television outlets in 46 states. The next year it was forced to retrench, keeping about 50 radio stations and a few TV outlets. In 1964, with the whole radical right feeling an upsurge in connection with the Goldwater candidacy, the Christian Crusade program was back over the 100 mark in stations and by the next year it had 237 stations in 37 states, Canada and Mexico. In 1967, it had 208 U. S. stations, 86 of which were in the southern states. Thus, southern stations accounted for more than 41 per cent of Hargis' total.

Hargis has emerged in a short time as one of the two or three leading forces of the radical right nationally. In the South, his organization may have more impact than any other national rightist propaganda force. He preaches an orthodox rightist ideology, and in 1967 he seemed to be stepping up his appeals to racism. Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. was "a part of the whole Communist conspiracy," he told an Atlanta audience. He went on to scoff at the idea that the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People speaks for Negroes. "They have never allowed a Negro to head their organization," he declared. His line generally has been that all civil rights efforts were related to communism and effectuated by dupes and fellow-travelers. His use of the race issue was not new: As early as the 1957 school desegregation struggle at Little Rock, he was defending white supremacy. He distributed a pamphlet on the Little Rock situation written by Joseph P. Kamp, a veteran rightwing extremist. Hargis has had a background of close association with extreme anti-Semites such as the late Gerald Winrod and Allen Zoll.

Maj. Edgar Bundy's Church League of America has a 15-minute program which from its outset in 1962 had a substantial southern representation. Georgia, South Carolina, Virginia and Florida were four of the eight states reached by the program the first year. It remains a small operation by comparison with Hargis' and McIntyre's. In 1968 the South apparently had more than its share of the Bundy programs, though not as many as some Western states.

Howard Kershner's "Commentary on the News," sponsored by the Christian Freedom Foundation, Inc., also had found the South fertile ground. The number of its stations in the region is currently uncertain but, in 1962, 43 of the 148 stations carrying it, or 29.1 per cent, were in Southern states. The total number had risen by 1965 to 362 stations, including substantial increases in the South.

In addition to these rightist programs with specifically rightist appeals, others have been unusually successful. "Life Lines," the 15-minute daily program heavily supported by Hunt's petroleum and food concerns, was organized in 1958. By 1961 it was carried by 200 stations nationally, and by the next year the figure had risen to 304. In 1963, 60 per cent of the 289 "Life Line" stations were in the South. In 1967, the figure was 236, or 47 per cent of the 500 stations. The "Manion Forum," which uses radio-solicited contributions and private industries' gifts to present Clarence Manion and his guests, has always had a disproportionate southern base. In 1959, when it had only 89 stations, 38 were in the South. In 1965, its 267 radio stations included 105, or 39 per cent, in the South. By 1967 the "Manion Forum" had been substantially reduced in scope nationally and was even more southern-oriented. Its 155 radio and TV stations included 101 in the South, 65 per cent of the total.

The Birch Society's radio program, relatively new, was making headway in the South in 1967 but how extensively was uncertain. America's Future, Inc., which might be called a fellow-traveler of the radical right, had a much less extensive but still disproportionate distribution in the South. In 1961, it had 371 stations nationally, with 121 of these, or 33 per cent, in southern states. The programs of the Citizens Councils Forum, which is supported by wealthy businessmen and which in the past had a subsidy from the State of Mississippi, were being used by more than 150 stations nationally in 1967, with a large part of this distribution in the South. The weekly "Radio Edition" of the Courtneys' Independent American newspaper was being broadcast in 1967 on 33 stations in about 15 states, most of these in the South.

Of the major programs only the "Dan Smoot Report" could be verifiably determined to have a less-than-proportionate distribution in the South. Analysis of the 1965 totals indicates that 20 of the 138 stations broadcasting the Smoot program were in the South, slightly less than seven per cent.

Some stations present a steady diet of the radical right's national offerings and supplement it with local rightist political programs and, frequently, religious fundamentalism. It is possible, in a few cities, to find a rightist program for almost every hour on some local station. In Birmingham in 1967, one might swing through a succession of programs, with hardly an interruption, by dialing six radio stations. On week days, starting at 7:55 a. m. and ending at 9 p.m., the right-winger's radio log included "Paul Harvey," "Christian Crusade," "Conservative Viewpoint," "Paul Harvey," "Paul Harvey," "Fulton Lewis III," and "Life Line;" and on Sundays, between 9:30 a.m. and 9:45 p.m., the "Rev. Ferrell Griswold" (a local minister and ally of the Birch Society), "The Independent Presents" (a local rightwing program), "Dan Smoot," "Christian Crusade," "John Birch Report," "Congressman John Buchanan" (a rightwing Republican), "Citizens Council Forum," "Manion Forum," and the "R. K. Scott Commentary." In Birmingham the extreme rightwinger need hardly ever be without radio inspiration.

The dissemination of rightist views through broadcasting has unique significance, despite the fact that ultra-conservative opinions also are extensively distributed in the region's general-circulation newspapers. The latter will not be examined here. It might be said in passing that ultra-conservative newspaper columnists usually are sustained through normal syndication payments rather than through organizations and subsidies which exist only to promote the special causes of the radical right.

THE NATIONAL ORGANIZATIONS

Among national organizations of the radical right, the John Birch Society remains the only one organized substantially across the South. (The Citizens Councils, strong in some areas, are excepted here because they are not truly national.) Some light on the degree of Birch Society penetration of the South is shed by a study done by Dr. Fred W. Grupp Jr., then of the University of Wisconsin's Department of Political Science. He surveyed members of the Birch Society in 1966 to determine, in part, how the individual attitudes of members might be correlated with the Society's official positions. He concluded there was wide disparity. Especially among the members recruited in the big expansion of 1964 and 1965, he found a very large number who did not accept the full "party line." Of principal interest here, however, is the fact that the Birch Society, though it would not reveal to him its mailing list, agreed to mail his questionnaires to a cross-section of its membership. From the replies received, Dr. Grupp calculated that 26 per cent of the Birch membership was in the 11 Southern states, which have 27 per cent of the nation's population. Since the best estimates of national Birch membership at that time were between 75,000 and 80,000, this percentage suggests a southern membership of 19,000 or slightly more. There was substantial variation state to state. From various evidences, the writer concludes that the following situation existed in early 1968. Alabama was the third state in the country in Birch members, with the highest number per capita. Texas and Florida were close to Alabama among southern states in membership. Mississippi had more than its per capita share: probably about 2,000 members. A middle rank could be assigned to Georgia, which appeared to have three per cent of the Birch membership (its total population being approximately two per cent of the nation's). Some other southern states, most notably Tennessee and North Carolina, apparently had substantially less Birch membership than their populations would indicate if membership were evenly distributed across the country. Of the remaining southern states, it appeared that Virginia and South Carolina were closer to the Texas-

Florida pattern and Arkansas and Louisiana closer to the Georgia mid-rank in Birch membership.

In some ways, the South seems to have been deliberately short-changed by the Birch Society organizationally, though it may be that only recently has the southern membership become substantial enough to justify a concentrated effort. In 1966, the Society had a chief public relations director and regional public relations directors for the East, Midwest, Southwest and Washington. No resident public relations director was in the Deep South even by early 1968. When the Society went all-out in general public appeal through newspaper advertising with a 16-page, multi-color newspaper supplement, it placed this special section in major newspapers in Los Angeles, Boston, Chicago, Detroit, Pittsburgh, St. Louis, Milwaukee, Indianapolis and Dallas. (In Houston, the section was mailed directly to homes.) No major southern newspapers outside Texas had the supplement. In 1965, a national fund drive brought in $200,000 through testimonial dinners ($50 and $25 per plate) in Los Angeles, Phoenix, New York, Chicago, and Dallas. Again, except for Dallas, the South had no such events. The Society has had field offices in White Plains, N. Y. (Eastern); Glenview, Ill. (Midwestern); San Marino, Calif. (Western); Washington; and Dallas (supplanting Houston in 1965, primarily for the Southwest). The Society had no such office for the South outside Texas.

Much of the Society's strength in the South is in small towns and cities of 50,000 population or less, such as Americus, Georgia, where racial difficulties apparently stimulated growth. From one smaller city to the next, there are great variations and many gaps. As for the larger urban areas, a map would call for pins to indicate relatively strong membership in all the major cities of Alabama, Georgia, Arkansas and Texas; most of those in Florida (and in particular, Jacksonville, St. Petersburg, St. Augustine, West Palm Beach, Fort Lauderdale, Daytona, and Sarasota); some cities of Tennessee; several cities of Louisiana and Mississippi; some cities in North Carolina, though not as all-inclusively as among the large cities of South Carolina; and some cities of Virginia.

Growth appears to be spasmodic. Charles D. Nelson, "major coordinator" of the Society for Alabama, Mississippi, and Florida, said in an interview for this report that 1966 was a slack year in his three states following big gains in 1965. He said he expected a surge in membership with the 1968 political campaign and the attendant heightening of political interest. For his area, particularly, that appeared to be a reasonable prediction, especially in view of the George Wallace candidacy. Birch membership does seem to rise and fall with the intensity of interest in politics. Although 1966 was a bad year in general for Birch membership, it was a good year in Atlanta and its suburbs; the number of chapters there increased from 17 to 33 between the spring of 1966 and the spring of 1967. During most of that time a heated state political campaign was under way, with several candidacies which were encouraging to the radical right. (The Birch Society was divided in Georgia over the candidacies of Lester Maddox, Democrat, and Howard (Bo) Callaway, Republican.)

THE "SEGREGATION ACADEMIES"

The increase in the number of private, segregated schools in the South during the past few years has raised the spectre, in the minds of some observers at least, of a substantial increase in rightwing influences in education. The "segregation academies," schools founded specifically to maintain segregation (though this frequently was denied), began to appear in a number of states in the early 1960s, when the reality of public school desegregation was at hand. The passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and subsequent implementation of its school desegregation provisions by the Department of Health, Education and Welfare further expanded the private-school movement. Between 1965 and 1967, the number of private, segregated schools increased to about 200, with about 40,000 students, according to the Southern Education Reporting Service. The number of schools and students remained about the same during 1967 and into 1968. Louisiana, with about 65 schools enrolling about 16,500 students, and Virginia, with about 30 schools enrolling about 12,000, were the leading states in the new private-school movement. Many of the schools were sponsored by people identified with rightwing causes. The Citizens Councils encouraged them and founded some of its own. The extent of direct rightwing influence upon the pupils was difficult to define, but clearly it was substantially present.

Gov. Lester Maddox said in 1967 he would like to see 100 more private schools in Georgia. He obviously was encouraging the "segregation academies" rather than the educational purpose of older private schools, which had no primarily racial motivation and some of which were integrated. Georgia had only four such academies when the governor spoke, and since then the movement has not spread in the state. Gov. Maddox himself, it is clear, identified the private-school movement with defiance of federal desegregation requirements and probably also with conservative influences in the classroom. He said he would like to find some way to make state tuition grants but acknowledged this would be difficult. It was proving, in fact, to be impossible, or nearly so. The federal courts had knocked down other states' plans for subsidizing schools obviously established with the intent of evading civil rights requirements. Gov. Maddox made no further moves on the matter, having encountered intense resistance from other high-ranking state officials in Georgia.

The progression of cases through the federal courts gave every evidence that shortly no way would be left for states to give impetus to the private-school movement. There remained the question of whether a large number of "seg academies" might yet survive because of strong private financial support. Some seemed likely to do so. They were beginning to fill a demand for quality private education which existed apart from the desire to evade desegregation requirements. As these schools (which were not in the majority) tended to follow the patterns of older private schools, they seemed to be unlikely future vessels for the perpetuation of racism and rightwing political philosophy; at least, no more likely to be than private schools in general across the country. The tuition costs of private schools genuinely striving for quality in education made it apparent that they would be limited in number.

There are, however, numerous "segregation academies" whose genesis and whose support clearly suggest that their pupils will be subject to rightwing extremist and racist influences. Dr. T. E. Wannamaker, a leading South Carolina spokesman for private schools, is a favorite of the white Citizens Councils and the John Birch Society. Wade Hampton Academy at Orangeburg, S. C., of which he is president, is one of several schools that award their graduates a lapel pin consisting of a Confederate flag and the word "Survivor" underneath. It symbolizes, Dr. Wannamaker said, "the fight to maintain great principles such as the value of truthfulness, of honor, of courage and integrity, and the great principle that governments should be governments of laws and not of men." Dr. Wannamaker discounts the role of libraries and laboratories. "Our books today tend to mis-educate as well as to educate," he said.

The inferiority of many of the segregation academies is clear, and some states have lately moved to tighten requirements for private schools. "All you have to do to open a private school in South Carolina is to have a spare stable," Cyril Busbee, the state superintendent of education, said in 1967. The state was moving toward standards for the private schools, which in some areas were undermining the local public schools by attracting their students, teachers and community support.

The spread of segregated academies, with which John Birchers and old-line segregationists frequently have been identified, appears to be encountering now the hard reality that in the long run a private school will cost parents substantial amounts of money and will be depriving the children if the main purpose is espousal of views such as Dr. Wannamaker's. Some will become more respectable. Others are likely to die. Their long-range impact thus seems much smaller than it might have seemed two years ago, when state tuition grant programs were still alive.

In the area of public education, the South has the same kind of influences at work on its schools as do other regions, as well as its own more pronounced racist pressures. These are difficult to measure quantitatively. Some evidence exists, however, that specifically rightwing pressure on public schools is no more pervasive in the region than in many other parts of the country. The Commission on Professional Rights and Responsibilities of the National Education Association, having examined rising harassment of teachers and schools, reported in 1966 that the John Birch Society was "clearly in first place as a trouble-making agency." Among others it cited were the Dan Smoot Reports and the Christian Anti-Communism Crusade. Significantly, it said 90 per cent of the complaints of red-baiting and book censorship came from three states: California, Michigan and Ohio. Similarly, Mrs. Jennelle Moorhead, national president of the Parent-Teacher Association, blamed rightwing pressures for much of the loss of about 340,000 PTA members during the preceding three years but indicated most of the trouble had come not from the South but from other regions.

THE SOUTHERN RELIGIOUS WARP

The South, it probably can be said then, has both a vulnerability to rightwing doctrine and some resistance to formal organization of the John Birch kind. This vulnerability and this resistance are both related to the peculiar apartness of the region's culture. Although that apartness is declining under the constant impact of national norms and national outlooks, furthered through mass communications and national organizations such as religious denominational structures, it still exists.

One reason such organizations as the Birch Society have not fared especially well is that the South has a strong inclination to turn toward its traditional structures, including political forms, for expression and participation. If one lives in a state whose governor is a Lester Maddox or a George Wallace, has congressmen who vote to the satisfaction of the Americans for Constitutional Action and the Citizens Councils, is under a steady radio bombardment from rightwing propagandists and rightwing fundamentalist preachers, and lives in a city dominated by reactionary elements, who needs the John Birch Society? It becomes a foreign element in the native habitat. This kind of native habitat is not universal in the South, of course, but it exists in the areas which otherwise might be most receptive to national rightwing groups.

The South's paradoxical vulnerability to and resistance of rightwing organization also is clearly related to its religious peculiarity. The most church-oriented part of the country, the South is also the region most noted for fundamentalist, pietistic Protestantism. This has special pertinence inasmuch as even organizations of the radical right which do not have a religious orientation, such as the John Birch Society, appear to have a membership strongly imbued with literalistic and pietistic religious views (of Catholic, as well as Protestant, varieties). "The preponderant majority of our members are deeply religious," Charles D. Nelson, the Birch coordinator for Alabama, Florida and Mississippi, has said. Ira S. Rohter, in his study of the radical right mentioned earlier, compared a sample group of radical rightists with an arbitrarily-chosen control group and found a very strong correlation between radicalism of the right and fundamentalist religious loyalties. Two students of fundamentalism and the radical right, Jack Dodson and Camille Vandervoort of the University of Houston, have suggested "the distinct possibility of the 'holinization' of the politics of the extreme right in the contemporary American society." In 1968, cars could be seen in the South bearing two bumper stickers: "God Give Us a Leader" and "Wallace '68."

The dominant churches in the South have been those which, in the broad sweep of Protestant history, would have to be called radical, part of the left wing of the Reformation. These were the churches that introduced the most radical changes in church government, including forms more democratic than previously existed and forms lending themselves to localism and extreme individualism. In theology, these were the churches that were most radical in altering views of the relationship between free will on the one hand and divine sovereignty on the other, asserting that not only was each man his own priest and not only did he fully make his own choice but that he could expect instant experience of his own salvation. This was the final triumph of religious individualism and personal pietism.

These were the churches which elsewhere were sects, characterized by their minority status, their feeling of alienation from a hostile society around them, their sense of apartness from the secular order. But in the South, what was a despised minority elsewhere (the Baptists) became the majority church. Southern Protestantism did not feel itself antagonistic toward the secular order around it; it began to be shaped by, identify with, and support that society.

The dominant Baptists, Methodists and Presbyterians became the state church of the South, defending the status quo and the entrenched, and sanctifying public policy. The most bizarre, and by most standards anti-Christian, instance of this was in church defenses of slavery. That tradition was extended through the period of segregation's decline, so that Monday newspapers depicted ushers standing with grim faces and folded arms blocking church doorways to Negroes while, inside, ministers talked of love and sin. All these evidences of the obscuring of Christian ethical demands within Christian churches have their parallels outside the region, of course, but the southern Church's history has made it especially weak in the face of today's moral confrontations and such phenomena as radicalism of the right, with all its denials of the universality of man's humanity. A "southern theology" is central in this phenomenon. It has been in the making for a long time.

Samuel S. Hill, an authority on religion in the South, has surmised that the southern religious pattern was already set by 1800. In early colonial times, the region was not extensively religious. Anglicanism was the main force, but its reach was limited. Then, during the Great Awakening period of the 1740's, the Presbyterians spread rapidly, with an evangelical thrust which nevertheless had strong intellectual accompaniment. In the 1750's, the Baptists began a long burst of growth. From 1770, the Methodists spread rapidly, with camp meetings as a principal means. The Baptists and the Methodists, more than any others, went where the people were and offered them a faith they could quickly respond to.

The South, James McBride Dabbs has written, institutionalized revivalism in the late 19th century. Other parts of the country moved on past. But the South stayed with revivalism and its heavy emphasis on emotion, simple doctrine and quick assurance of salvation. In fact, the South distorted each of the great founders of Protestantism. Martin Luther had asserted each individual's ability to interpret the Scriptures, but the South made a preposterous anti-intellectual, individualistic fetish of that principle. John Wesley had emphasized free-will in the attainment of salvation, but he did not tear free-will loose from divine sovereignty; many of his southern Methodist followers and others did, all but making man sovereign in determining his salvation through instant self-declarations of conversion. John Calvin's strong views on social responsibility were abandoned by southern Presbyterians; Calvin had asserted that the Church must be the social conscience of the land, but for decades southern Presbyterians largely ignored that doctrine, replacing it with an extreme view on the separation of church and state which facilitated the suspension of ethical judgments on state affairs. The southern Baptists also left their ancient moorings. They have sometimes traced their origins to the Anabaptists of the sixteenth century; but their views of social responsibility became much narrower than the Anabaptist assertion that each man was responsible for the deeper morality of his day-to-day actions and for the tone of the society around him. In the great retreat from concern about the social order, Dabbs has written, the Southern Church "avoided the core problems and dabbled around the edges with a bunch of blue laws." In the early stage, said W. J. Cash, the South needed and received "a faith, not of liturgy and prayer book, but of primitive frenzy and the blood sacrifice — often of fits and jerks and barks — . . . a personal God, a God for the individualist . . . ." Cash also noted a strange contrast: the South's love of pleasure alongside its Puritanism. How could hedonism be reconciled to Puritanism? Cash concluded that this could be done only if religious faith and daily life were kept separate. New England Puritans had done this, too; but in the South, Puritanism lived on and became a dominant faith.

The relevance of all this to radical rightist influence in the South is clear. Rightist views in the United States are commonly grounded in narrow, anti-intellectual views of the world; in moralistic certitude; in a view that opposing ideas are satanic; in a devotion to old practices and old values with the assumption that these are under attack from evil forces; and in an assertion of individualism which, although rightists often are themselves subject to herding, becomes an official virtue. These threads of rightist radicalism are obviously also the central elements in the Southern church's peculiarity (its heresy, perhaps, from the viewpoint of mainstream Protestantism).

The revivalistic nature of the big Protestant denominations in the South has been substantially modified in recent years. These churches' clergy are better educated than in the frontier days, and increasingly influenced by mainstream religious ideas. The institutions themselves are more sophisticated. But much of the old influence remains.

Membership figures suggest just how pervasive has been the influence of the peculiar Southern church. We start with the fact that the South is far more church-oriented than any other part of the nation. The percentage of people who are current members of southern Protestant churches is about twice as high as in any other part of the country, and three times as high as in some. This is the only region where current members of Protestant churches far outnumber the members of Catholic and Jewish congregations. Only in the South do Protestant churches have an actual majority of the total population. The South had, in 1952, 4.1 churches per 2,000 people, compared with 1.4 in the Northeast, 2.4 in the North Central region, and 1.5 in the West. Beyond this, we must consider what churches southerners are in. Two examples suffice for the Deep South. In Mississippi, Baptists, Methodists, Presbyterians and members of the Disciples of Christ account for 94 per cent of the population; in Georgia, for 93 per cent. Baptist and Methodist memberships comprise the great bulk of this membership.

Dr. Earl D. C. Brewer, a sociologist who directs the Religious Research Center at Emory University, has said: "The Klan is a child of the main religious forces in the South. The connection becomes closest in the case of the extreme sects. But the fundamentalist thrust is at the center of the southern brand of Protestanism."

As the major Protestant denominations that have been traditional in the South move away from the core of fundamentalism, a largely unnoticed phenomenon is taking place which could have profound import for the future. The Pentecostal-Holiness and Church of God denominations, which reach back to the fundamentalism of old, are growing astonishingly. The best evidence is that while the region's population was increasing 37 per cent between 1926 and 1952, membership in the Pentecostal-Holiness churches in the South increased 1,000 per cent and in the Church of God congregations 659 per cent. Dr. Brewer has remarked upon the South's impact on the nation through the out-migration of its religious fundamentalists; the spread of the newer fundamentalist faiths is likely to have similar impact. They carry on with the kind of simplistic, emotional, salvationist and intellectually indifferent strains that earlier went into the mass Protestant faiths of the South, before the memberships became predominantly middle class.

In the South's political life, Lester Maddox is the peak of a largely-concealed iceberg. He combines political primitivism with religious primitivism. Far more than most political analysts seem to realize, his appeal is to the religious simplism of a sub-culture in the South which lies beneath the middle class or at its lower edges and whose extent is told in the figures on poverty in the South's poorest region. Gov. Maddox is often seen as a demagogue cut from the familiar cloth of old-style demagoguery in the South. But in many ways he is different from the cynical political charlatans. He is the South's brand of religious and political simplism run amuck. He is the logical extension, in high office, of the moods and feelings that come from those origins. It is no accident that he is both a fundamentalist Protestant and a rightwing political extremist.

THE FUTURE

It is these phenomena, essentially indigenous, which must claim first priority in any evaluation of the future of rightwing radicalism in the South. The John Birch Society is alien, with a limited middle-class appeal, though it may yet have greater impact. The Ku Klux Klan is a small fossil from the not-so-distant past. The Citizens Councils, created in the post-1954 convulsion, have been steadily dying and are of little consequence today even in Mississippi. The pure ideology of many other political extremist groups from outside the region is too complex and too pseudo-rational for all but a relatively few paranoiac southerners. But those preaching "doctrines wholly unrelated to reality," as President Kennedy described them, who can combine these nostrums with the emotional set and the religious forms indigenous to the South will be of greater significance.

A George Wallace has appeal largely based upon petulance and bitter defiance, and this is satisfying to those who feel threatened by modernism and the world at large. A Lester Maddox has this same "strike-back" appeal, but also the moralistic appeal of a profoundly ignorant neo-Puritan who sees many devils, all of them on the left. He represents the rightwing "holinization of politics." On the South's airwaves, this tendency is fed best by the radio preachers and other rightwingers who at least superficially identify themselves with fundamentalist religious values.

The counter-weights are many, of course. Major southern religious denominations are moving rapidly away from the peculiarity of their past. Even the Pentecostal-Holiness churches tend to change somewhat as they move into the cities and the suburbs, and as many of their members continue on the "up" economic escalator taking them into the middle class. All these churches are subject, finally, to the challenge of their own religion when they begin reading it without the blinders that the South's peculiarities imposed. The region's racial and poverty crises already are beginning to receive fruitful attention from many churches whose theologies only a few years ago made them oblivious, at best. This new attention to realities will not mix well with "doctrines wholly unrelated to reality."

The South for some time probably will remain a part of the country oddly susceptible to radicalism of the right, but also resistant. It is not likely to lead the nation to the right. Its George Wallaces and Lester Maddoxes will have too limited an appeal elsewhere. Conversely, a Barry Goldwater (despite his success in five southern states) in time loses appeal among southern rightists because he is not of their ethos and style. So as has been true with so many other phenomena, southern rightist radicalism will be essentially provincial. Its future will be determined by the rapidity with which the South becomes like the nation at large.

This pamphlet is for general information and is not to be considered in the same light as official statements of position contained in Interpretative Bulletins and other such releases formally adopted and published in the Federal Register.

THE FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT

The Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1966 extended the coverage of the Act generally to all employees of elementary and secondary schools, institutions of higher education, and schools for the mentally or physically handicapped or gifted children. This means that the minimum wage, overtime, equal pay and child labor provisions of the Act will apply to all nonexempt employees.

The Act continues to apply, as it did before the 1966 Amendments, to nonexempt employees of private schools, including institutions of higher education, who are individually engaged in interstate commerce or producing goods for interstate commerce, and to other employees of private school establishments having such employees if the annual gross volume of the enterprise is in excess one million dollars. (In the case of organizations which are not operated for profit, gross dollar volume from eleemosynary, religious, educational and other similar activities is not counted toward this monetary requirement.)

Employees of private schools in such previously covered employment must be paid a minimum wage at a rate of not less than $1.25 an hour until February 1, 1967, and at a rate of not less than $1.40 an hour beginning on that date; and must receive overtime compensation at a rate of not less than one and one-half times their regular rates of pay for all hours worked over 40 in any workweek. On and after February 1, 1968, such employees must be paid a minimum wage rate of not less than $1.60 an hour, as well as the prescribed overtime after 40 hours a week.

All employees of the described schools are covered effective February 1, 1967, regardless of whether the schools are public or private, whether they are operated for profit or not for profit or whether they are financed solely by private contributions or receive substantial Federal assistance.

"Elementary" and "secondary" schools (as these terms are defined in the Act) are residential or day schools which provide elementary education, or secondary education, as determined under State law.

"Schools for mentally or physically handicapped or gifted children" include those educational establishments catering to the needs of children who are physically handicapped, mentally handicapped or gifted.

MINIMUM WAGE

For newly covered employment in schools and institutions of higher education, employees unless specifically exempt must be paid not less than the minimum wage shown in the following schedule:

$1.00 an hour, beginning February 1, 1967
$1.15 an hour, beginning February 1, 1968
$1.30 an hour, beginning February 1, 1969
$1.45 an hour, beginning February 1, 1970
$1.60 an hour, beginning February 1, 1971

(The reasonable cost or fair value as determined by the Administrator of meals (board) and lodging customarily furnished by the employer may be considered as part of an employee's wages. The term "reasonable cost" as used in the Act does not include a profit to the employer or to any affiliated person.)

OVERTIME

For newly covered employment in such educational institutions, employees, unless specifically exempt, must be paid not less than one and one-half times their regular rates of pay for all hours worked:

After 44 hours, beginning February 1, 1967
After 42 hours, beginning February 1, 1968
After 40 hours, beginning February 1, 1969

(This law does not require premium pay for Saturday, Sunday, or holiday work as such, or vacation or severance pay, or a discharge notice; nor does it set any limit on the number of hours of work for females or persons 16 years of age and over.)

EXEMPTIONS

Bona fide executive, administrative and professional employees (including any employee employed in the capacity of academic administrative personnel or teacher in elementary or secondary schools) may be exempt from the minimum wage and overtime requirements of the Fair Labor Standards Act if they meet certain tests established for such exemption.

EQUAL PAY

The employer may not discriminate on the basis of sex by paying employees of one sex wages at rates lower than he pays employees of the other sex for doing equal work on jobs requiring equal skill, effort, and responsibility which are performed under similar working conditions. This applies to all employees within the establishment who are subject to the minimum wage provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

CHILD LABOR

The basic minimum age for employment is 16 except for occupations declared hazardous by the Secretary of Labor, to which an 18 year minimum age applies. Minors 14 and 15 years of age may by employed outside school hours in a variety of nonmanufacturing and nonmining occupations but not after 7 p.m. or before 7 a.m., nor over 3 hours per school day, 18 hours per school week; 8 hours per non-school day, 40 hours per non-school week. There are special provisions limiting employment of young persons in agriculture, and permitting employment as actors or performers and in the delivery of newspapers to consumers. Where both Federal and State child labor laws apply, the higher standard must be observed.

RECORD KEEPING

Every employer must maintain accurate records of earnings, hours worked, and other data required by the Regulations, Part 516. An official "NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES" furnished by the Wage and Hour and Public Contracts Divisions must be posted where employees can readily see it.

November 1966

This pamphlet is for general information and is not to be considered in the same light as official statements of position contained in Interpretative Bulletins and other such releases formally adopted and published in the Federal Register.

THE FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT

The Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1966 extended the coverage of the Act generally to all employees of hospitals and nursing homes (with the exception of hospitals operated by the Federal government). Employees are covered whether the institution is public or private, or operated for profit or not for profit.

Nursing homes whose employees are covered are institutions primarily engaged in the care of the sick, the aged, the mentally ill or defective who reside on the premises.

MINIMUM WAGE

Employees of hospitals and nursing homes, unless specifically exempt, must be paid not less than the minimum wage shown in the following schedule:

$1.00 an hour, beginning February 1, 1967
$1.15 an hour, beginning February 1, 1968
$1.30 an hour, beginning February 1, 1969
$1.45 an hour, beginning February 1, 1970
$1.60 an hour, beginning February 1, 1971

(The reasonable cost or fair value as determined by the Administrator of meals (board) and lodging customarily furnished by the employer may be considered as part of an employee's wages. The term "reasonable cost" as used in the Act does not include a profit to the employer or to any affiliated person.)

OVERTIME

Hospitals: Nonexempt hospital employees must be paid not less then one and one-half times their regular rates of pay for all hours worked:

After 44 hours, beginning February 1, 1967
After 42 hours, beginning February 1, 1968
After 40 hours, beginning February 1, 1969

unless the hospital employee and his employer have an agreement or understanding arrived at before the performance of the work that a fixed work period of fourteen consecutive days is accepted in lieu of the workweek of seven consecutive days for the purpose of computing overtime. Where such an agreement or understanding exists, the hospital must pay the employee at time and one-half his regular rate of pay for the hours worked over eight in any workday and in excess of eighty hours in the fourteen-day period.

(This law does not require premium pay for Saturday, Sunday, or holiday work as such, or vacation or severance pay, or a discharge notice; nor does it set any limit on the number of hours of work for females or persons 16 years of age and over.)

Hospital employees subject to the Act's minimum wage and overtime requirements under the law's provisions prior to the 1966 Amendments must receive a minimum wage of not less than $1.25 an hour until February 1, 1967, not less than $1.40 an hour beginning on that date, and not less than $1.60 an hour beginning February 1, 1968, together with overtime compensation of not less than one and one-half their regular rates of pay for all hours worked over 40 in a workweek. Hospitals whose facilities are available to the general public would not ordinarily have any such employees, because of the exemption applicable prior to the 1966 Amendments to hospitals qualifying as retail or service establishments.

Nursing Homes: Employees of nursing homes are exempt from the Act's general overtime requirements for newly covered employees so long as they receive not less than one and one-half times their regular rates of pay for all hours worked in excess of forty-eight during a workweek.

EXEMPTIONS

Bona fide executive, administrative, and professional employees may be exempt from the minimum wage and overtime requirements of the Fair Labor Standards Act if they meet certain tests established for such exemption.

EQUAL PAY

The employer may not discriminate on the basis of sex by paying employees of one sex wages at rates lower than he pays employees of the other sex for doing equal work on jobs requiring equal skill, effort, and responsibility which are performed under similar working conditions. This applies to all employees within the establishment who are subject to the minimum wage provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

CHILD LABOR

The basic minimum age for employment is 16 except for occupations declared hazardous by the Secretary of Labor, to which an 18 year minimum age applies. Minors 14 and 15 years of age may be employed outside school hours in a variety of nonmanufacturing and nonmining occupations but not after 7 p.m. or before 7 a.m., nor over 3 hours per school day, 18 hours per school week; 8 hours per non-school day, 40 hours per non-school week. Where both Federal and State child labor laws apply, the higher standard must be observed.

RECORD KEEPING

Every employer must maintain accurate records of earnings, hours worked, and other data required by the Regulations, Part 516. An official "NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES" furnished by the Wage and Hour and Public Contracts Divisions must be posted where employees can readily see it.

CONSTRUCTION INDUSTRY

under the Fair Labor Standards Act
as amended in 1966

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF LABOR
W. Willard Wirtz, Secretary

WAGE AND HOUR AND PUBLIC CONTRACTS DIVISIONS
Clarence T. Lundquist, Administrator

This pamphlet is for general information and is not to be considered in the same light as official statements of position contained in Interpretative Bulletins and other such releases formally adopted and published in the Federal Register.

THE FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT

Workers in the construction industry[1] are covered by the Fair Labor Standards Act which contains minimum wage, maximum hours, overtime pay, equal pay, and child labor standards. Before the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1966, the Act applied to:

(a) Employees individually engaged in work relating to construction which is closely connected with interstate commerce or producing goods for interstate commerce; and

(b) All employees employed in a construction (or reconstruction) enterprise having an annual gross volume of business of not less than $350,000, in which some employees handle or work on materials or goods that have been moved in or produced for interstate commerce.

Employees in the employments described in both paragraphs (a) and (b) remain covered under the amended Fair Labor Standards Act, and are referred to in this leaflet as employees in "previously covered" employment.

The 1966 Amendments, effective February 1, 1967, extended the Act's coverage to additional employees in the construction industry by removing the annual sales test for construction enterprise coverage.

[1]Note: On Federal and Federally financed and assisted construction, the Davis-Bacon and related Acts, and the Contract Work Hours Standards Act may apply as well as the Fair Labor Standards Act. Information about these Acts may be obtained from the Office of the Solicitor, U. S. Department of Labor, Washington, D. C. 20210.

PREVIOUSLY COVERED EMPLOYMENT

All employees engaged in "previously covered" employment, unless specifically exempt, must be paid a minimum wage of not less than $1.25 an hour until February 1, 1967, not less than $1.40 an hour beginning February 1, 1967, not less than $1.60 an hour beginning February 1, 1968, for all hours worked, and overtime compensation at a rate of not less than one and one-half times their regular rates of pay for the hours worked over 40 in any workweek.

NEWLY COVERED EMPLOYMENT

All construction employees in employment "newly covered" by virtue of the 1966 Amendments, unless specifically exempt, must be paid not less than the minimum wages for all hours worked and not less than one and one-half times their regular rates of pay for overtime, as shown in the following schedule:

$1.00 an hour, beginning February 1, 1967, and overtime after 44 hours a week;

$1.15 an hour, beginning February 1, 1968, and overtime after 42 hours a week;

$1.30 an hour, beginning February 1, 1969, and overtime after 40 hours a week;

$1.45 an hour, beginning February 1, 1970, and overtime after 40 hours a week;

$1.60 an hour, beginning February 1, 1971, and overtime after 40 hours a week;

(Wages include the "reasonable cost" or "fair value", as determined by the Administrator, of board (meals), lodging, or other facilities customarily furnished by an employer to his employees unless excluded by the terms of an applicable bona fide collective bargaining agreement. "Reasonable cost" has been determined to be "actual cost" and does not include a profit to the employer or to any affiliated person.)

(This law does not require premium pay for Saturday, Sunday, or holiday work as such or vacation or severance pay, or a discharge notice nor does it set any limit on the number of hours of work for females or persons 16 years of age and over.)

HOURS WORKED

Employees who are entitled to the benefits of the Act must be paid in compliance with its provisions for all hours worked. This includes at least all time they are required to be at their place of work or on duty and time spent in traveling from job to job during the course of the workday.

EXEMPTIONS

Bona fide executive, administrative, and professional employees may be exempt from the minimum wage and overtime requirements of the Fair Labor Standards Act if they meet certain tests established for such exemption.

EQUAL PAY

The employer may not discriminate on the basis of sex by paying employees of one sex wages at rates lower than he pays employees of the other sex for doing equal work on jobs requiring equal skill, effort, and responsibility which are performed under similar working conditions. This applies to all employees within the establishment who are subject to the minimum wage provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

CHILD LABOR

The basic minimum age for employment is 16 except for occupations declared hazardous by the Secretary of Labor, to which an 18 year minimum age applies. Minors 14 and 15 years of age may be employed outside school hours in a variety of

LAUNDRIES AND DRY CLEANING ESTABLISHMENTS

under the Fair Labor Standards Act
as amended in 1966

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF LABOR
W. Willard Wirtz, Secretary

WAGE AND HOUR AND PUBLIC CONTRACTS DIVISIONS
Clarence T. Lundquist, Administrator

This pamphlet is for general information and is not to be considered in the same light as official statements of position contained in Interpretative Bulletins and other such releases formally adopted and published in the Federal Register.

THE FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT

The Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1966, effective February 1, 1967, extended general coverage of the Act to all employees employed in laundry and dry cleaning enterprises. Before these Amendments, coverage under the wage and hours provisions of the Act was limited to employees of certain laundries and dry cleaning establishments which did not meet the requirements for the exemption provided in the Act prior to the Amendments of 1966.

PREVIOUSLY COVERED EMPLOYMENT

Establishments of laundry and/or dry cleaning enterprises having employees covered and not exempt from the minimum wage and overtime provisions prior to the 1966 Amendments include:

- any establishment performing central functions such as providing office, warehouse, or garage services for two or more establishments engaged in laundering, cleaning or repairing clothing or fabrics;

- any establishment engaged in laundry, cleaning or repairing clothing or fabrics, making 50 percent or more of its annual dollar volume of sales of such services from laundry or dry cleaning work for out-of-state customers;

- any establishment engaged in laundering, cleaning or repairing clothing or fabrics, making more than 25 percent of its annual dollar volume of sales of such services from laundry or dry cleaning work for customers engaged in mining, manufacturing, transportation and communications businesses.

Employees of such establishments in employments covered by the Act's prior provisions and not otherwise exempt must be paid a minimum wage at a rate of not less than $1.25 an hour until February 1, 1967 and at a rate of not less than $1.40 an hour, beginning February 1, 1967, and overtime compensation at a rate of not less than one and one-half times their regular rates of pay for the hours worked over 40 in any workweek. On and after February 1, 1968, such employees must be paid a minimum wage of not less than $1.60 an hour, and the prescribed overtime pay after 40 hours a week.

NEWLY COVERED EMPLOYMENT

All other employees employed in lanudry and dry cleaning enterprises, regardless of their previous status under the Act, and without regard to the annual volume of sales or business done, are newly covered employees, and unless specifically exempt, must be paid not less than the minimum wages for all hours worked and not less than one and one-half times their regular rates of pay for overtime, as shown in the following schedule:

$1.00 an hour, beginning February 1, 1967, and overtime after 44 hours a week;

$1.15 an hour, beginning February 1, 1968, and overtime after 42 hours a week;

$1.30 an hour, beginning February 1, 1969, and overtime after 40 hours a week;

$1.45 an hour, beginning February 1, 1970, and overtime after 40 hours a week;

$1.60 an hour, beginning February 1, 1971, and overtime after 40 hours a week.

EXEMPTIONS

Bona fide executive, administrative, and professional employees may be exempt from the minimum wage and overtime requirements of the Fair Labor Standards Act if they meet certain tests established for such exemption.

EQUAL PAY

The employer may not discriminate on the basis of sex by paying employees of one sex wages at rates lower than he pays employees of the other sex for doing equal work on jobs requiring equal skill, effort, and responsibility which are performed under similar working conditions. HIRED FARM WORKERS

under the

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT AS AMENDED IN 1966

WAGE AND HOUR and PUBLIC CONTRACTS DIVISIONS

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF LABOR

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF LABOR
W. Willard Wirtz, Secretary

WAGE AND HOUR AND PUBLIC CONTRACTS DIVISIONS
Clarence T. Lundquist, Administrator

WHPC Publication 1161
October 1966

This pamphlet contains only general information on the Fair Labor Standards Act and is not to be considered in the same light as official statements of position formally adopted and published in the Federal Register.

THE FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT REQUIRES A MINIMUM WAGE

of at least $1.00 an hour

Effective February 1, 1967

($1.15 an hour, effective February 1, 1968)
($1.30 an hour, effective February 1, 1969)

This minimum wage must be paid to every worker who is employed in covered employment in agriculture by an employer who used more than 500 man-days of farm labor in any calendar quarter of the preceding calendar year. Exceptions to this requirement are listed below under "Who is Exempt?"

OVERTIME

There is no requirement regarding overtime pay for farm workers.

AGRICULTURE

Workers who cultivate the soil or grow or harvest crops, or who raise livestock, bees, fur bearing animals, or poultry are engaged in agriculture. Those who do such work in greenhouses, nurseries, and hatcheries are included.

Also included are workers employed by a farmer on work incidental to their employer's own farming operations, including delivery of his farm products to market. They are not doing "agricultural" work as defined by the Act in weeks when they work on products not grown by their own employer.

An example: Workers in the ordinary farm packing shed who, as an incident to the farming, pack only the fruit grown by their employer are employed in agriculture. If any of the fruit was not grown by their employer, they are not agricultural workers, and will generally be subject to a minimum wage of $1.40 an hour beginning February 1, 1967 ($1.60 an hour beginning February 1, 1968) and to overtime pay at time and one-half for work over 40 hours in a workweek, unless a specific exemption applies.

Workers who work on a farm in work incidental to the farming operations conducted on that farm are also considered as agricultural workers, whether employed by a farmer or by an independent contractor. Agriculture as defined in the Act, however, does not include any work off the farm which is performed by any employees other than those employed by the farmer.

Workers employed by a contractor are considered to be employed in agriculture when they grow or harvest crops -- for example, when they pick fruit. This is also the case when they do work on a farm for the farmer that is incidental to the farming operations of that farm -- as when they thresh grain grown on that farm.

COVERED WORK

The act applies generally to all workers who are engaged in or are producing goods for interstate commerce, and to workers employed in certain enterprises. Thus, the Act covers workers who grow crops or raise livestock which will leave the State directly, or which will leave the State indirectly through a buyer who will ship them across the State lines or who will process them or use them as ingredients of other goods which will move in interstate commerce.

WHO IS EXEMPT?

The minimum wage (and overtime pay) is not required for

(1) Workers who are employed in agriculture by an employer who did not use 500 man-days of farm labor in any calendar quarter of the preceding calendar year;

(2) Members of the employer's immediate family;

(3) Hand harvest laborers paid piece rates in an operation generally recognized as piece work in the region, if (a) they go each day to the farm from their permanent residence, and (b) they have been employed in agriculture less than 13 weeks in the preceding calendar year;

(4) Migrant hand harvest laborers 16 years of age or under and employed on the same farm as their parents, if (a) they are paid piece rates in an operation generally recognized as piece work in the region, and (b) the piece rate is the same as paid workers over age 16;

(5) Employees principally engaged in the range production of livestock.

MAN-DAY

A "man-day" means any day during which an employee performs agricultural labor for not less than one hour. Workers listed in (2) and (3) above are excluded when counting "man-days".

CHILD LABOR RESTRICTIONS

Children under 16 may not be employed in agriculture during school hours for the school district where the child lives while so employed.

No child under 16 years of age may be employed in agriculture in an occupation found by the Secretary of Labor to be hazardous (except where the child is employed by a parent on a farm owned or operated by the parent).

These restrictions apply regardless of whether the child must be paid the minimum wage.

EQUAL PAY

Wage discrimination on the basis of sex to employees subject to the minimum wage is prohibited. An employer may not pay employees of one sex at rates lower than he pays employees of the opposite sex for doing work in the same establishment on jobs requiring equal skill, effort, and responsibility which are performed under similar working conditions.

SPECIAL MINIMUM RATES

Full-time students may be employed for not more than 20 hours a week while attending school at rates lower than the statutory minimum under certificates issued under the Act.

Handicapped workers may also be employed at special minimum rates under certificates issued by the Administrator of the Wage and Hour and Public Contracts Divisions. A handicapped worker is one whose earning or productive capacity is impaired by age or physical or mental deficiency or injury.

EMPLOYER - FURNISHED FACILITIES

Wages also include the reasonable cost or fair value, as determined by the Divisions' Administrator, of board, lodging, and other facilities customarily furnished by the employer to his employees. However, such costs are not included in wages to the extent they are excluded under an applicable bona fide collective bargaining agreement.

RECORD KEEPING

Every employer must maintain accurate records of earnings, hours, and other data required by the Divisions' Regulations, Part 516. An official "NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES" furnished by the Wage and Hour and Public Contracts Divisions must be posted where employees can readily see it.

THE FLSA AND THE 1966 AMENDMENTS

The Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, establishes minimum wage, maximum hours, overtime pay, equal pay, and child labor standards for covered employment, unless a specific exemption applies.

Effective February 1, 1967, the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1966 extended the act's coverage to more workers and increased the minimum wage for employment already subject to the law. Before the amendments, the act applied, as it still applies, to employees individually engaged in interstate or foreign commerce or in the production of goods for such commerce, and to employees in certain large enterprises (referred to in this Guide as "previously covered" employment, discussed on pp. 2 and 3).

The 1966 amendments' extension of coverage was achieved through the broadening of the definition of a covered enterprise. Also, some exemptions were revised or eliminated.

Among other changes, more retail and service enterprises were brought under the act. For the first time, the law's standards were extended, in whole or in part, to employees in certain hotels, motels, and restaurants, in hospitals and nursing homes, and in schools. Certain farmworkers were made subject to the minimum wage requirements. For a fuller discussion of "newly covered" employment see pp. 3 and 4.

The minimum wage and overtime standards for "newly covered" employment differ, for the limited periods prescribed in the law, from the corresponding standards which apply to work subject to the act before February 1, 1967.

BASIC WAGE AND HOUR STANDARDS

Unless specifically exempt, employees engaged in previously covered employment must be paid at least as follows:

Minimum wage.—$1.40 an hour, beginning February 1, 1967; $1.60 an hour, beginning February 1, 1968.

Overtime.—One and one-half times the employee's regular rate of pay for all hours worked in excess of 40 in a workweek.

WAGE AND HOUR STANDARDS FOR NEWLY COVERED EMPLOYMENT

Unless specifically exempt, employees engaged in work made subject to the act by the 1966 amendments must be paid at least as follows:

Minimum wage for non-farm work.—$1.00 an hour, beginning February 1, 1967; $1.15 an hour, beginning February 1, 1968;

$1.30 an hour, beginning February 1, 1969; $1.45 an hour, beginning February 1, 1970; $1.60 an hour, beginning February 1, 1971.

Overtime pay for non-farm work.—One and one-half times the employee's regular rate of pay is required for all hours worked over the following: 44 hours in a workweek, beginning February 1, 1967; 42 hours in a workweek, beginning February 1, 1968; 40 hours in a workweek, beginning February 1, 1969.

Employees of nursing homes, rest homes, and bowling alleys must receive 1½ times their regular rate for hours over 48 in any workweek.

A special provision permits hospitals to adopt a 14-day period in lieu of the usual 7-day workweek, provided at least time and one-half the employee's regular rate is paid for hours in excess of 8 in any workday and in excess of 80 in the 14-day period.

Minimum wage for farm work.—$1.00 an hour, beginning February 1, 1967; $1.15 an hour, beginning February 1, 1968; $1.30 an hour, beginning February 1, 1969.

The overtime provisions do NOT apply to farm work.

PREVIOUSLY COVERED EMPLOYMENT

Employees covered prior to the 1966 amendments remain covered under the amended act. They include (a) employees individually engaged in interstate or foreign commerce, (b) employees individually engaged in the production of goods for interstate or foreign commerce, and (c) all employees in certain large enterprises.

(a) Employees engaged in interstate or foreign commerce: These include workers in the telephone, telegraph, radio, television, and transportation industries; those who build, maintain and repair highways, railroads, and airfields, or service vehicles or equipment used in interstate commerce; employees in distributing industries, such as wholesaling, who handle goods moving in interstate commerce as well as workers who order, receive or keep records of such goods; clerical and other workers who regularly use the mails, telephone or telegraph for interstate communication; employees of businesses such as banks, insurance companies, and advertising agencies, that regularly utilize the channels of interstate commerce in the course of operations; and employees who regularly travel across State lines while working.

(b) Employees engaged in the production of goods for interstate or foreign commerce: Included are employees who work in manufacturing, processing, and distributing establishments, and in mines, oilfields, and quarries that produce goods for interstate or foreign commerce. This means everyone, including office, management, sales, and shipping personnel, and maintenance, custodial, and protective employees, whether they are employed by the producer or an intermediary. Employees may be covered even if their firm does not ship its goods directly in such commerce. The goods may leave the State through another firm. The workers may produce goods which become a part or ingredient of goods shipped in interstate or foreign commerce by another firm. Also covered are workers who are engaged in a closely related process or occupation directly essential to the production of such goods. Their employers may supply such items as machinery, fuel or utilities to firms for producing goods for, or engaging in, such commerce.

(c) Employees employed in the following enterprises, if—

(1) there are, in the activities of the enterprise, employees engaged in interstate or foreign commerce or in the production of goods for interstate or foreign commerce, including employees handling, selling, or otherwise working on goods that have been moved in or produced for such commerce by any person, and if—

(2) such enterprise is one which—

(i) has one or more retail or service establishments and an annual gross sales volume of $1 million* or more, and procures at least $250,000 annually of goods for resale that move across State lines, or

(ii) is engaged in the business of construction or reconstruction and has an annual gross volume of $350,000 or more from such business, or

(iii) is a gasoline service establishment which has an annual gross sales volume of $250,000* or more, or

(iv) is engaged in urban or interurban transit operations and has an annual gross sales volume of $1 million* or more, or

(v) is an establishment of any other such enterprise, where the establishment has some employees engaged in interstate or foreign commerce or in the production of goods for such commerce and the enterprise has an annual gross sales volume of $1 million or more.

The act provides that none of the above enterprises will include any establishment which has as its only employees, the owner, his spouse, parents, or children.

NEWLY COVERED EMPLOYMENT—AS OF FEBRUARY 1, 1967

The 1966 amendments increased the coverage of the act by including employees of additional enterprises and made the act applicable to other employees by repealing or revising specific exemptions. Employment thus made subject to the minimum wage provisions by these amendments is "newly covered." Thus, for purposes of deciding whether an employee is "newly covered," the act as it read before the 1966 amendments must be considered in the light of the changes made by the 1966 amendments.

*Exclusive of excise taxes at the retail level which are separately stated.

(a) Employees employed in the enterprises indicated below are covered on and after February 1, 1967, under the 1966 amendments, if—

(1) there are, in the activities of the enterprise, employees engaged in interstate or foreign commerce or in the production of goods for interstate or foreign commerce, including employees handling, selling, or otherwise working on goods that have been moved in or produced for such commerce by any person, and if—

(2) such enterprise is one which—

(i) has an annual gross volume of sales made or business done, exclusive of certain excise taxes, of at least $500,000 ($250,000 beginning Feb. 1, 1969), or

(ii) is engaged in the business of construction or reconstruction (regardless of dollar volume), or

(iii) is engaged in laundering, cleaning, or repairing clothing or fabrics (regardless of dollar volume), or

(iv) is engaged in the operation of a hospital (except a Federal Government hospital), nursing home, or school (whether public, private, or nonprofit and regardless of dollar volume).

The act provides that none of the above enterprises will include any establishment which has as its only regular employees, the owner, his spouse, parents or children, or other member of the owner's immediate family.

(b) As the result of the elimination or revision of various exemptions, employees of certain hotels, motels, and restaurants and other retail or service establishments have had their exemption status changed. Also, employees of taxicab companies and of additional transit companies have become subject to the minimum wage.

The minimum wage provisions have been extended to certain farm workers, to employees of country elevators in the "area of production," to cotton ginning employees, and to certain fruit and vegetable transportation employees. The minimum wage and overtime pay exemption for employees handling and processing agricultural products in the "area of production" has been repealed. Overtime pay exemptions applicable to certain other agricultural processing employees have been eliminated or revised. More logging crew employees are now subject to the minimum wage and overtime requirements. The number of hours beyond which overtime pay is required in "seasonal" industries has been reduced.

PREVIOUSLY AND NEWLY COVERED EMPLOYMENT IN THE SAME ENTERPRISE

It is possible for previously covered employees and workers newly covered by the 1966 amendments to be employed in the same enterprise. For example, employees in the central warehouse and central office of a retail chain having an annual gross volume of sales between $500,000 and $1 million were previously covered and must be paid not less than $1.40 an hour, effective February 1, 1967, and $1.60 an hour, effective February 1, 1968, with overtime after 40 hours a week. However, employees of an individual store with an annual dollar volume of at least $250,000 in such a chain are to be paid according to the schedule for newly covered employment shown on pp. 1 and 2, beginning with a minimum of $1.00 an hour and overtime after 44 hours, effective February 1, 1967.

ENTERPRISE

An enterprise is defined in the act to mean the related activities performed, either through unified operation or common control, by any person or persons for a common business purpose. The enterprise includes all such activities whether performed in one or more establishments or by one or more corporate or other organizational units. Thus, where there is unified operation or common control of related activities performed for a common business purpose in departments of an establishment operated through leasing arrangements, the activities performed in the leased departments are included in the enterprise. On the other hand, the related activities performed for the enterprise by an independent contractor are not so included.

Where an enterprise may be considered to consist only of the activities of a particular retail or service establishment, the act provides some special rules. If such an establishment is under independent ownership, it will not be considered to be so operated or controlled as to be other than a separate and distinct enterprise merely because its place of business and the separate premises occupied by other retail or service establishments are leased from the same lessor. Nor will such a result follow merely because of an arrangement to sell, or sell only, goods specified by a particular manufacturer, distributor, or advertiser, or to join with other such establishments in the same industry for the purpose of collective purchasing, or to have an exclusive right to sell the goods or use the brand name of a manufacturer, distributor or advertiser within a specified area.

The 1966 amendments revised the definition of "enterprise" to make it clear that activities in connection with the operation of the following are "for a business purpose" within the meaning of the act: Hospitals (excluding Federal Government hospitals) and institutions primarily engaged in the care of the aged, the mentally ill or defective who reside on the premises; elementary and secondary schools, schools for mentally gifted or handicapped children, and institutions of higher education; also street, suburban or interurban electric railways, and local trolley or motorbus carriers, if the rates and services of such systems are subject to regulation by a State or local agency. Coverage of such enterprises does not depend on whether they are public or private, or operated for profit or not for profit.

EXEMPTIONS

Some employees who would otherwise be entitled to the benefits of the act are excluded from the minimum wage or overtime provisions, or both, by specific exemptions. These exemptions apply only in those cases where their terms and conditions are specifically met. Employers should check carefully the terms and conditions of any exemption which they seek to use. The list below merely indicates some types of exemptions contained in the act and does not spell out their conditions. Information on specific exemptions may be obtained from the Divisions' nearest office.

EXEMPTIONS FROM THE MINIMUM WAGE AND OVERTIME PROVISIONS INCLUDE THE FOLLOWING:

Executive, administrative, and professional employees (including teachers and academic administrative personnel in elementary or secondary schools), and outside salesmen, as defined in regulations of the Administrator;

Employees of a retail or service establishment that makes most of its sales within the State and is not in a covered enterprise or has less than $250,000 in annual sales (exclusive of specified taxes). Covered hospitals, nursing homes, laundries, drycleaners, and schools do not qualify for this exemption;

Employees of certain seasonal amusement or recreational establishments, of motion picture theaters, of certain small newspapers; switchboard operators of telephone companies which have fewer than 750 telephones; seamen employed on vessels other than American vessels; fish farmers and fishermen;

Certain farm workers employed by an employer who did not use more than 500 man-days of farm labor in any calendar quarter of the preceding calendar year; employees engaged in certain operations relating to specified agricultural or horticultural commodities; and employees in small forestry and logging operations.

EXEMPTIONS FROM ONLY THE OVERTIME REQUIREMENTS INCLUDE THE FOLLOWING:

Employees of hotels, motels, restaurants; employees of retail or service establishments who are employed primarily in connection with certain food or beverage services;

Certain higher paid commission employees of retail or service establishments; salesmen, mechanics, and partsmen primarily engaged in selling or servicing automobiles, trucks, trailers, farm implements, or aircraft, employed by nonmanufacturing establishments primarily engaged in the business of selling such vehicles to ultimate purchasers;

Employees of railroads, pipelines, and carriers by air covered by specified statutes; operating employees of urban and interurban transit systems; drivers of taxicabs; seamen on American vessels; certain employees of motor carriers; and local delivery drivers paid on a trip rate basis or other delivery payment plan meeting prescribed conditions;

Employees employed in canning, processing, storing, marketing, and distributing aquatic products;

Announcers, news editors, and chief engineers of certain nonmetropolitan broadcasting stations.

PARTIAL EXEMPTIONS FROM THE OVERTIME REQUIREMENTS

Partial exemptions from the overtime requirements for certain periods are provided for employees in industries determined to be seasonal by the Administrator; for certain operations on agricultural commodities; and for employees of certain wholesale or bulk petroleum distributors whose annual gross sales (exclusive of certain taxes) are less than $1 million. Also there is a limited overtime pay exemption for employees of institutions primarily engaged in the care of the sick, aged, and mentally ill residing on the premises; and bowling establishments.

HOW TO COMPUTE OVERTIME PAY

Premium pay for overtime work must be paid for each hour worked in excess of the maximum workweek applicable to the type of employment in which the employee is engaged. Overtime pay must be paid at a rate of not less than 1½ times the employee's regular rate of pay.

The "regular rate" may be more than the minimum wage; it cannot be less. Except for certain types of payments specified in section 7(e) of the act, an employee's regular rate includes all payments made by the employer to or on behalf of that employee. Assuming that the employee receives no compensation other than that stated, here are some typical cases based, for example only, on a maximum workweek of 40 hours:

1. Hourly rate.—The regular rate of pay for an employee paid by the hour is his hourly rate. When he works more than 40 hours in a workweek, he is due at least 1½ times his regular rate for each hour over 40.

   Example: An employee gets paid $1.60 an hour; this is his regular rate. If he worked a 44-hour workweek, he would be entitled to at least 1½ times $1.60, or $2.40, for each hour over 40. His pay for the week would be $64 for the first 40 hours plus $9.60 for the 4 hours overtime, or a total of $73.60.

2. Piece rate.—The regular rate for an employee paid on a piece-rate basis is obtained by dividing the total weekly earnings by the total number of hours worked in the same week. The employee is entitled to payment of one-half this regular rate for each hour over the 40th in addition to the full piecework earnings.

   Example: An employee is paid on a piecework basis. When he worked 45 hours in a week, his earnings came to $81. His regular rate of pay for that week was $1.80 ($81 divided by 45). In addition to his regular rate the employee is entitled to 90 cents (one-half his regular rate) for each hour over 40, or 5 times 90 cents for the 5 overtime hours. This $4.50 overtime premium brought his total earnings to $85.50.

   Another way to compensate pieceworkers for overtime, where agreed upon in advance of performance of the work, is to pay 1½ times the piece rate for each piece produced during overtime hours. The piece rate must be the one actually paid during non-overtime hours and it must be enough to yield at least the minimum wage per hour.

   Example: An employee is paid 8 cents for each piece. In a week in which he worked 43 hours, he earned $68.40 for the first 40 hours at this rate. The employee's pay was piece and one-half, or 12 cents per piece produced in the overtime hours. Assuming he produced 65 pieces during the overtime, he was entitled to be paid $7.80 (65 times 12 cents) as overtime pay. Thus, he earned a total of $76.20 for the week.

3. Salaries.—The regular rate for an employee who is paid a salary for a regular or specified number of hours a week is obtained by dividing the weekly salary by the hours.

   Example: An employee is paid a salary of $80 for a 40-hour workweek. His regular rate of pay is $80 divided by 40 hours, or $2 an hour. When he works overtime, he will be entitled to get 1½ times the $2, or $3 for each hour over the 40th.

   If under the employment agreement a salary sufficient to meet the minimum wage requirements in every workweek is paid as straight time pay for whatever number of hours are worked in a workweek, the regular rate is obtained by dividing the salary by the hours worked each week. An employee's hours of work vary each week. But the agreement with his employer is that he will be paid $100 a week for whatever number of hours of work are required. The longest workweek ever worked by him is 62 hours. Under this pay agreement, his regular rate will vary when he works overtime. If he works 50 hours, his regular rate is $2 an hour ($100 divided by 50 hours). In addition to his salary, he is due one-half the regular rate or $1 for each of the 10 overtime hours, or a total of $110 for the week. If he works 55 hours, his regular rate will be $1.82 an hour ($100 divided by 55). In that case, he will be due an additional 91 cents for each of the 15 overtime hours ($13.65 or a total of $113.65 for the week).

If a salary is paid on other than a weekly basis, the weekly pay must be determined in order to compute the regular rate and overtime. If the salary is for a half-month, it must be multiplied by 24 and the product divided by 52 weeks to get the weekly equivalent. A monthly salary should be multiplied by 12 and the product divided by 52.

The law provides some alternative methods of computing overtime pay. These methods are given in Interpretative Bulletin, Part 778, entitled "Overtime Compensation," and Regulations, Part 548, on "Authorization of Established Basic Rates for Computing Overtime Pay."

WHAT THE "WORKWEEK" IS

A workweek is a regularly recurring period of 168 hours in the form of seven consecutive 24-hour periods. The workweek need not coincide with the calendar week—it may begin any day of the week and any hour of the day. Each workweek stands alone. Employment for two or more workweeks cannot be averaged out for the sake of figuring overtime or minimum wages except under prescribed conditions in the case of seamen on American vessels and employees of hospitals. The minimum wage must be paid for every hour worked in each workweek and overtime must be paid for all hours worked in excess of the maximum workweek applicable to the type of employment in which the employee is engaged. Coverage and application of most exemptions are also determined on a workweek basis.

WHAT "HOURS WORKED" MEANS

An employee subject to the act in any workweek must be paid in accordance with its provision for all hours worked in that workweek. In general, "hours worked" includes all the time an employee is required to be on duty or on the employer's premises or at a prescribed workplace, and all time during which he is suffered or permitted to work for the employer.

TIPS AND EMPLOYER-FURNISHED FACILITIES

Tips received by a tipped employee may be considered wages for purpose of the act in such amount, not more than 50 percent of the applicable minimum rate, as the employer may determine. A "tipped employee" is a worker engaged in an occupation in which he customarily and regularly receives more than $20 a month in tips.

Wages also include the reasonable cost or fair value, as determined by the Divisions' Administrator, of board, lodging, and other facilities customarily provided by the employer to his employees. However, such costs are not included in wages to the extent they are excluded under an applicable bona fide collective bargaining agreement.

SPECIAL PROVISIONS

Unless specifically exempt, all covered employees must be paid at least the applicable minimum wage, regardless of whether the employees are paid on a time, piece, job, incentive, or any other basis. However, learners, apprentices, messengers, handicapped workers, and full-time students employed in retail or service establishments or in agriculture under certain circumstances, may be paid special lower minimum wage rates provided that special certificates are first obtained from the Divisions' Administrator. Also, for employees in Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, and American Samoa, industry wage orders may set minimum rates below the statutory minimum.

EQUAL PAY PROVISIONS

The Fair Labor Standards Act, as amended by the Equal Pay Act of 1963, prohibits employers from discriminating on the basis of sex in the payment of wages for equal work. The equal pay amendment has been generally in effect since June 11, 1964, with deferment in the case of certain collective bargaining agreements. On June 11, 1965, the amendment became effective with respect to all employees subject to its terms.

Under the equal pay provisions, the employer may not discriminate on the basis of sex by paying employees of one sex at rates lower than he pays employees of the opposite sex, in the same establishment, for doing equal work on jobs requiring equal skill, effort and responsibility which are performed under similar working conditions. The equal pay provisions apply only to employees who are covered by the Fair Labor Standards Act and are subject to a minimum wage under the act; they apply in every establishment where the employer has such employees. They do not apply with respect to any employee who is specifically exempt from the minimum wage requirements.

The act provides an exception from the prohibition against payment of wages at lower rates to one sex than the other for equal work where it can be shown that the wage differential is based on a seniority system, a merit system, a system measuring earnings by quantity or quality of production, or on any other factor other than sex.

An employer who is paying a wage differential in violation of the equal pay provisions of the act may not reduce the wage rate of any employee in order to comply with these provisions. Wages withheld in violation of the equal pay provisions have the status of unpaid minimum wages or unpaid overtime compensation under the act, and back wages due under the equal pay provisions are subject to the same methods of recovery as any other wages due under the act.

The law prohibits any labor organization, or its agents, representing employees of an employer having employees subject to the minimum wage provisions of the act, from causing or attempting to cause the employer to discriminate against an employee in violation of the equal pay provisions.

CHILD LABOR PROVISIONS

Sixteen years is the minimum age for most employment covered by the act. This includes employment in agriculture during school hours or in any occupation in agriculture declared hazardous by the Secretary of Labor.

Eighteen years is the minimum age for employment in a nonagricultural occupation declared hazardous by the Secretary of Labor.

Fourteen years is the minimum age for employment specified in the Secretary's regulations, which is permitted outside school hours in a variety of nonmanufacturing and nonmining occupations for a limited number of hours under specified conditions of work.

Employers can protect themselves from unintentional violation of the child labor provisions by keeping on file an employment or age certificate for each young person employed, to show he is at least the minimum age for his job. State age or employment certificates are accepted as proof of age in 45 States, the District of Columbia, and Puerto Rico. In Idaho, Mississippi, South Carolina, and Texas, Federal certificates are issued. Special arrangements have been made in Alaska.

RECORDS

Certain records must be kept. Employers are required to keep records on wages, hours, and other items listed in the recordkeeping regulations, 29 CFR Part 516. Most of this required information is the kind employers usually keep in ordinary business practices and in complying with other laws and regulations. No particular form of records is required.

Records required for exempt employees differ from those for nonexempt workers. Special information is required on employees under uncommon pay arrangements or to whom board, lodging, or other facilities are furnished. Employers who have homeworkers must make entries in handbooks supplied by the Divisions. Record of the required information must be preserved for 3 years. Some supplementary items like timecards, piecework tickets, and order and shipping records need be kept only 2 years. Microfilm copies of records are generally acceptable.

SOME REMARKS

The law applies equally to men and women, to homeworkers as well as factory and office workers (certificates issued by the Divisions are necessary for homeworkers in certain industries) and (except with respect to occupations applicable to small logging operations and small country elevators) regardless of the number of employees of an employer, and whether they work full or part time.

The law does not require extra pay for Saturday, Sunday, or holiday work, as such, or vacation, holiday, or severance pay or a discharge notice; nor does it set any limit on the number of hours of work for persons 16 years of age or over.

The act does not apply to employees of the United States, or any State or political subdivision of a State, unless employed in a hospital, institution, school, or carrier operations specifically covered by its provisions.

ENFORCEMENT

Authorized representatives of the Wage and Hour and Public Contracts Divisions may investigate and gather data regarding the wages, hours, and other conditions and practices of employment. They may enter establishments and inspect the premises and records, transcribe records and interview employees. They may investigate whatever facts, conditions, practices, or matters are considered necessary to find out whether any person has violated any provisions of the act. Wage-Hour investigators generally will make suggestions regarding any changes necessary or desirable regarding payroll, recordkeeping, and other practices which will aid in achieving and maintaining compliance with the law. Complaints, records, and other information obtained from employers and employees are treated confidentially.

The act provides these methods of recovering unpaid minimum and/or overtime wages: (1) The Divisions' Administrator may supervise payment of back wages, and in certain circumstances (2) the Secretary of Labor may bring suit for back pay upon the written request of the employee. (3) An employee may sue for back wages and an additional sum, up to the amount of back pay, as liquidated damages, plus attorney's fees and court costs. (An employee may not bring suit if he has been paid back wages under supervision of the Administrator, or if the Secretary has filed suit to enjoin the employer from retaining the wages due him.) (4) The Secretary of Labor may also obtain a court injunction to restrain any person from violating the law, including the unlawful withholding of proper minimum wage and overtime compensation.

It is a violation of the law to discharge an employee for filing a complaint or participating in a proceeding under the law.

Willful violations may be prosecuted criminally and the violator fined up to $10,000. A second conviction for such a violation may result in imprisonment.

A 2-year statute of limitations applies to the recovery of back wages except in the case of willful violations, for which there is a 3-year statute of limitations.

ASSISTANCE IS AVAILABLE

Whether any employee is covered or exempt under the Fair Labor Standards Act depends on the facts in each case. If you want to know about the application of the law to any worker, write to the Divisions' nearest office. Give information on the kind of firm and what it does, with whom it does business, the job involved, the method of pay, the hours of work, and any other details you think will be needed for an adequate reply to your question.

WHERE INFORMATION CAN BE OBTAINED

Inquiries about the Fair Labor Standards Act, the Walsh-Healey Public Contracts Act, the McNamara-O'Hara Service Contract Act, and their application, will be answered by mail, telephone, or personal interview at any regional or field office of the Wage and Hour and Public Contracts Divisions of the U.S. Department of Labor. These offices also supply publications free of charge.

REQUEST FOR ADDITIONAL INFORMATION

The Wage and Hour and Public Contracts Divisions of the United States Department of Labor administers the Fair Labor Standards Act. The services of the Divisions are available to the public, employers and employees alike.

Those who receive this pamphlet may desire further information concerning the requirements of the Act. This form is enclosed to provide a ready means of securing additional information. For example, an employee or former employee may, after reading this pamphlet, feel that his employment or the employment of others is not or was not in accordance with the requirements of the Act. If so, the first box below can be checked and the Divisions will forward a confidential Employment Information Form to be used by the employee in furnishing additional details. If an employer or an employee would like to be sent any of the publications listed under "Publications Available on Request", the second box should be checked and the names of the publications entered on the lines below the box.

If you desire further information as explained above, complete the appropriate entries on the form, affix proper postage, and either: (1) tear off along the perforated line and mail the lower portion; or (2) fold over so that the address side is out, fasten with tape or staple, and mail. The requested materials will be sent promptly.

DEAR MR. EMPLOYER:

The purpose of this folder is to advise employers of the 1966 amendments (P.L. 89–601) to the Fair Labor Standards Act, which become effective February 1, 1967, and to transmit the new official NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES. Employers who have workers subject to the minimum wage requirements of the Act must post this notice where it can readily be seen by their employees.

This folder containing the highlights of the amended Act is being sent to you for information and appropriate action; the fact that you have received a copy does not mean that your employees are subject to this Act. You should examine the contents of this folder carefully and if you have questions as to how or whether the law applies to your business or to particular employees, you are urged to contact the nearest Wage-Hour office listed on the NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES or in your local telephone directory.

Sincerely yours,

Clarence T. Lundquist

THESE RATES MUST BE PAID to all nonagricultural employees, not specifically exempt, whose employment was made subject to such requirements on February 1, 1967, by the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1966 (P.L. 89–601), either through elimination of a prior exemption or by addition of the enterprise in which such employees are employed to the enterprises engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce which are covered by the Act.

NOTE: Specific exemptions from the minimum wage, overtime pay, and equal pay provisions of the Act are provided for employees in certain types of employment.

THE EQUAL PAY PROVISIONS OF THE ACT PROHIBIT wage discrimination on the basis of sex within any establishment; when subject to the minimum wage, employees of one sex must not be paid wages at rates lower than are paid employees of the other sex for equal work on jobs REQUIRING EQUAL SKILL, EFFORT, AND RESPONSIBILITY which are performed under similar working conditions.

THE CHILD LABOR PROVISIONS in general prohibit the employment in covered jobs of boys and girls under 16 years of age. For occupations declared particularly hazardous or detrimental to the health of children, the minimum is 18 years. Minors 14 and 15 years old may be employed outside school hours in certain occupations and under specified conditions.

NOTE: Compliance with this law does not excuse noncompliance with State or local laws.

ENFORCEMENT—The Government may bring civil or criminal action against employers in violation of any provision of the Act.

The Act prohibits discharging or discriminating against an employee because he filed a complaint or started or participated in a proceeding under the Act.

The Federal courts are authorized to order the payment of back wages found due in certain court actions.

Back wages may also be recovered by one of the following methods:

1. Payment of an employee's back wages may be supervised by the Administrator. When an employee agrees to accept and such wages are paid in full, he gives up his right to sue for such back wages and liquidated damages.
2. An employee may make written request to the Secretary of Labor to bring suit for back wages due the employee. If he does so, he gives up his individual right to sue for such back wages and liquidated damages.
3. An employee may bring suit against his employer to recover wages withheld, together with liquidated damages equal to the back wages due, plus a reasonable fee for the attorney, and court costs.

STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS—There is a 2-year statute of limitations for the recovery of back wages.

IF YOU have any questions about the law, you have a right to contact the nearest Federal Wage and Hour Office (listed below) where MORE INFORMATION may be obtained.

highlights of the fair labor standards act, as amended in 1966

I. EMPLOYMENT COVERED PRIOR TO FEBRUARY 1, 1967

Employees engaged in or producing goods for interstate or foreign commerce or employed in certain large enterprises were generally covered before the 1966 amendments and remain covered, except where specifically exempted.

The 1966 amendments (P.L. 89–601) increased the minimum wage for such employment to $1.60 an hour. The increase will be accomplished in two steps. As of February 1, 1967, the minimum wage shall be $1.40 an hour; on February 1, 1968, it becomes $1.60 per hour.

The 40-hour workweek standard for such employment remains the same as before the 1966 amendments. All hours worked over 40 in a workweek are compensable at a rate of not less than one and one-half times the employee's regular rate of pay unless an overtime exemption applies.

II. EMPLOYMENT BROUGHT UNDER THE ACT (EFFECTIVE FEBRUARY 1, 1967)

The 1966 amendments extended the Act's coverage to additional enterprises and revised or eliminated certain exemptions.

Employment in additional retail and service enterprises, for example, was made subject to minimum wage and overtime pay requirements. For the first time, the law's standards have been extended, in whole or in part, to certain hotels, motels, and restaurants, to hospitals, nursing homes and other institutions for the care of resident patients, and to schools. These are some—not all—of the changes made.

For such employment, the new minimum wage will be as follows:

$1.00 an hour, beginning February 1, 1967
$1.15 an hour, beginning February 1, 1968
$1.30 an hour, beginning February 1, 1969
$1.45 an hour, beginning February 1, 1970
$1.60 an hour, beginning February 1, 1971.

The amendments also establish the following general workweek standards for such employment, beyond which all hours worked are to be compensated at a rate of not less than one and one-half times the employee's regular rate of pay:

44 hours, beginning February 1, 1967
42 hours, beginning February 1, 1968
40 hours, beginning February 1, 1969.

III. ENTERPRISE COVERAGE— ANNUAL GROSS VOLUME OF SALES

Before the 1966 amendments, all employment in certain large enterprises was subject to the Act. One of the tests for enterprise coverage was the enterprise's annual gross volume of sales. With certain exceptions, this test was met if the enterprise's gross volume of sales was $1,000,000 or more a year. The exceptions were for construction enterprises, whose test was $350,000, and gasoline service stations, with a test of $250,000.

As already indicated, enterprises which were covered prior to the 1966 amendments remain covered and employment in them is subject to the minimum wage and overtime standards for employment covered prior to February 1, 1967.

Additional enterprises have been brought under the Act through the 1966 amendments' extension of coverage to enterprises with an annual gross volume of sales or business done of not less than $500,000, effective February 1, 1967, and $250,000, effective February 1, 1969; among these are retail enterprises, hotels, motels, and restaurants. Furthermore, the amendments provide for coverage of the following enterprises, regardless of any business volume test: construction, laundries and dry cleaners, hospitals, nursing homes, primary and secondary schools, and institutions of higher education.

Unless a specific exemption applies, employees in newly covered enterprises are subject to the minimum wage and overtime pay standards for employment brought under the Act as of February 1, 1967.

IV. EXEMPTIONS

Some covered employees need not be paid in accordance with the minimum wage or overtime provisions, or both, due to specific exemptions.

For instance, there is a minimum wage and overtime pay exemption for employees of retail or service establishments, even though in a covered enterprise, if the establishment has an annual gross volume of sales less than $250,000 and mostly from sales made within the State. This exemption does not apply to employees of hospitals, nursing homes, laundries and dry cleaners, or schools, regardless of the volume of business. The previous minimum wage and overtime pay exemption for automobile and farm implement sales establishments has been repealed, but there is a new overtime exemption for certain employees in such establishments. Employees of gasoline service stations with an annual gross volume of sales of at least $250,000 are no longer exempt from the overtime requirements.

There is an overtime pay exemption for hotels, motels, and restaurants. Food service employees of retail establishments are newly subject to the minimum wage provisions but remain exempt from overtime.

Executive, administrative, and professional employees (including teachers and academic administrative personnel of elementary or secondary schools) are exempt from the minimum wage and overtime requirements of the Act if they meet specific requirements of regulations issued by the Secretary of Labor.

Certain exemptions for agricultural processing have been changed or eliminated.

The Act contains other minimum wage and full or partial overtime pay exemptions. The Divisions' nearest office can give you information about them.

V. EQUAL PAY FOR EQUAL WORK

The equal pay provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act also apply to every employer having employees subject to the minimum wage provisions of the Act. This standard provides that the employer must not discriminate on the basis of sex within the establishment by paying employees of one sex wages at rates lower than he pays employees of the opposite sex for doing equal work on jobs requiring equal skill, effort, and responsibility which are performed under similar working conditions. Additionally, an employer may not reduce the wage rate of any employee to eliminate a prohibited wage differential based on sex.

VI. CHILD LABOR STANDARDS

Sixteen years is the minimum age for most employment covered by the Act. This includes employment in agriculture during school hours. Fourteen years is the minimum age for employment outside school hours in a variety of nonmanufacturing and nonmining occupations for a limited number of hours under specified conditions of work. The Act provides different age standards for employment in occupations declared hazardous by the Secretary of Labor: 16 years on farms, 18 years otherwise.

VII. NEWLY COVERED FARM EMPLOYMENT (EFFECTIVE FEBRUARY 1, 1967)

The amendments of 1966 also brought certain employees of large farms under the coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act. These agricultural workers are entitled to a minimum wage as follows:

$1.00 an hour, beginning February 1, 1967
$1.15 an hour, beginning February 1, 1968
$1.30 an hour, beginning February 1, 1969.
The overtime provisions do not apply.

VIII. RECORDS

Employers are required to keep records on wages, hours, and other items in accord with regulations issued by the Secretary of Labor.

IX. ENFORCEMENT

Failure to pay the statutory minimum wage and overtime compensation results in cumulative back wage liabilities. Unpaid wages may be restored under the supervision of the Secretary of Labor or recovered through court action brought by the Secretary or the employees. Serious violations of the law may result in civil or criminal action. Records required by the law must be available for inspection by representatives of the Divisions.

You have been provided with a single official notice with this brochure for display in your establishment as required by Regulations, Part 516, CFR, Title 29. Additional notices may be obtained by using the order blank below and mailing it to your nearest WAGE-HOUR OFFICE.

A MINIMUM WAGE CAMPAIGN

FOR LOCAL GROUPS

A new weapon in the war on poverty was introduced into your community in February, 1967, and your local organization can play a big role in using the weapon. It is the newly amended federal Fair Labor Standards Act which is frequently called the Minimum Wage Law.

Some 32 million American wage earners are entitled to new, higher minimum wages; over 9 million are being covered by minimum wage regulations for the first time. This means that some of the poorest, most underpaid workers in your community are now entitled to a federally established minimum wage with, for many of them, time-and-a-half for overtime.

While most employers will obey the law, others, through ignorance or evasion, will probably not at first pay their employees the federally required minimum or time-and-one-half for overtime. And many of these underpaid employees, through ignorance or timidity, will not take the very simple steps needed to make the employer pay legal wages.

Your local organization can very easily do an important educational job that will (1) protect employers from the consequences of breaking the law, (2) put more dollars in circulation in your community, and (3) help the people in your community--Negro and white--who most need help, by making sure that they receive the wages that they are entitled to by law.

In putting on a minimum wage campaign you will be cooperating with the United States Department of Labor, which wants help from the community in enforcing the law. And at the same time you will be extending your influence among many groups in the community, most especially among low-paid wage earners. A group that energetically extends itself to wage earners in the community will undoubtedly increase its prestige and membership.

Some Suggestions on How to Proceed

First read the leaflet "Some Simple Facts About The Fair Labor Standards Act," which explains the background of the Act, the minimum wage regulations in general, and the way to report possible violations. This leaflet is written for laymen, not lawyers or economists, and can be understood by everyone in your organization.

Then go through the rest of the material in the kit, using the table of contents as a guide. Some of the material offers further explanations and information for you, some can be used in your campaign.

Then at a meeting of your group have two or three people who have studied the kit explain the law and a possible campaign to the entire membership.

Here are some things individuals can do to help publicize the law.

Be certain that everybody in your family or among your friends who is an employer understands how the law affects him. Look in the list of publications and send for leaflets explaining the law in relation to specific industries.

Look for the brown-and-white poster, of which there is a sample in this kit, in all places of employment that you enter as a customer. Covered establishments are supposed to display it. If it is not displayed and you think it ought to be, speak to the employer.

Carry copies of the poster to your church, club, union or fraternal organization to publicize the law. Additional copies are available from your nearest office of the Wage and Hour Division of the U. S. Department of Labor.

Ask individual wage earners whom you know about wages and hours in their places of employment, and tell them about the law's new regulations.

Here are some things your organization can do to help publicize the law and inform people about how they can secure enforcement.

Become familiar with the kit and with the basic provisions of the minimum wage law.

Form a committee--it need not be large --of people especially interested in wage-hour enforcement.

Look at your community with new eyes. Where are low wage earners working? Is there some chance that they are covered by the law? What other groups or individuals can give assistance in reaching low wage earners?

Issue a news release to announce your committee's interest in minimum wage enforcement and your willingness to help all workers.

Co-sponsor with such organizations as unions, civil rights groups, human relations councils, neighborhood centers a general meeting of wage earners or of wage earners in a particular industry. You may call upon the nearest field office of the Wage and Hour Division for a speaker if your meeting is large enough. Even if you have an expert at a meeting, make sure you have a general understanding of the law so that you can explain it to the people in your community in a way that they will understand.

Arrange for distribution of the leaflet "You Should Know About Minimum Wages" through schools. The booklet can be read by any schoolchild from about the fourth grade. The leaflet would make a good basis for an elementary school civics or history lesson. It should be sent home to parents. The longer leaflet, "Some Simple Facts About the Fair Labor Standards Act," is suitable for high school classroom use.

Ask for time to explain about the law at church meetings, club meetings, etc. Concentrate on those organizations which tend to have contact with low income persons. Even if you can get only five or ten minutes to talk at the meeting you can do a lot.

Distribute appropriate leaflets or posters to all members of the meeting. Make sure to tell them where they can go for more information or more material.

Interview complainants or workers with whom you have made contact where it is convenient for them. Get as much of the information suggested in the sample information form as possible--in some cases this will not be much. If you have reason to believe or if the worker feels he has a legal complaint report the information to the nearest Wage and Hour Division. The workers, any individual, or a group may make the report.

Keep records. Names, addresses, phone numbers, places of employment, to whom did you talk in the Wage and Hour office, what action did Wage and Hour take.

Follow up with the Wage and Hour office if you filed the complaint--with the worker if he filed it. Be understanding, but request as speedy action as possible.

Where back wages are involved, urge the Wage and Hour Division to get a full settlement.

Remember, throughout, not to mislead workers or give them false hope. Offer information, assistance and follow-through--not promises. Remember that technicalities will have to be ironed out by the Wage and Hour Division.

The work you do in publicizing minimum wages will help your organization in other activities by earning you the trust of people you may not have been in contact with before. If you are successful in helping the employees of even one establishment to get the wages they are entitled to, you can go back to them and talk with greater effect about problems of interest to you such as school desegregation, community relations, or organizing a union.

Here is a chance to cooperate with the federal government, with employers, and with white and Negro wage earners in an enterprise from which everyone will benefit. Success in such an undertaking can be a source of pride to the individuals and organizations that brought it about.

SOME SIMPLE FACTS ABOUT THE FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT
(MINIMUM WAGE LAW)

Although the federal minimum wage law, like many laws, is somewhat complex, there are a few simple facts about it that everyone can and should understand. This leaflet explains these facts, the background of the law, its regulations in general, how it is enforced.

You can get additional information about the law, how it applies to a particular industry or a particular job, by sending for the free publications of the United States Department of Labor's Wage and Hour Division. Or you can visit the Division's nearest field office or ask questions by telephone or letter. A list of addresses and phone numbers of field offices is included in this kit. Also included is a list of publications.

HOW FEDERAL MINIMUM WAGES BEGAN

The first Fair Labor Standards Act, sometimes called the Minimum Wage Law or the Wage and Hour Law, was passed in 1938, during the New Deal period. It put a "floor" under wages of 25¢ an hour for the first year, rising gradually to 40¢ an hour seven years later. Only 12 to 13 million of the nation's then 55 million workers were covered by this very low minimum. Among the other 40-odd million, employers could legally pay less than 25¢ an hour.

Over the years the minimum wage has been revised upward several times. Also the Act has been amended to include new classes of enterprises and employees, so that many kinds of employment which were not at first covered by the law are covered now.

The latest revision, passed in 1966, took effect in February, 1967. On that date the minimum hourly rate for about 32 million already covered employees was raised from $1.25 to $1.40. Also, over 9 million employees who had not previously been covered had a floor put under their wages of $1.00 per hour. Among these 9 million newly covered employees are many who have been among the lowest paid employees in the nation, and probably also in your community. The floor for both groups will continue to rise. Previously covered employees will be entitled to at least $1.60 in 1968. By 1971 newly covered employees will reach the $1.60 per hour level. Agricultural workers now covered are scheduled to go to a legal minimum of $1.30 per hour in 1969.

COVERAGE AND MINIMUM HOURLY RATES AS OF FEBRUARY 1967

Every job falls into one of three categories: (1) it was already covered by the Wage and Hour Law before February, 1967; (2) it was not covered by the Act before February, 1967, but it is covered by the Act after February, 1967; (3) it was not covered by the Act before, and it is still not covered.

Industries and Enterprises Covered before February 1967. Many industries and enterprises have been covered for some time. But since February there is a higher minimum wage for these enterprises.

Beginning in February, 1967, the minimum wage for previously covered jobs is $1.40 an hour. Beginning February, 1968, it will be $1.60 an hour. Also, one and a half times the hourly rate must be paid for all hours over 40 in one week; the time-and-a half provision applies even if the employee is earning more than the minimum. (There are some exceptions to the time-and-a-half provision; consult the closest Wage and Hour Division field office if you need to know them.)

If an enterprise is covered, that means that supporting personnel like porters, watchmen, maids, elevator operators, and so on are all covered. Here are some examples of previously covered enterprises. (This is not the full list of all enterprises covered; there are many more.)

Most companies in communications industries:
telephone, telegraph, radio, television

Most companies in these transportation industries:
highway building and repair; railroads; airlines ;
interstate bus; interstate trucking

Almost all factories

Almost all wholesale enterprises

Almost all mining enterprises

Large lumbering enterprises

Large retail stores or smaller stores (doing over $250,000 of business annually) in a chain

Large construction companies

Large gasoline service stations

Most city bus companies

Banks, insurance companies, and most advertising companies.

Industries and Enterprises Covered beginning February, 1967. Beginning in February, 1967, many industries that were never covered before will be covered, and in some industries where previously only large enterprises were covered, now many smaller enterprises will be covered also. But the newly covered jobs will begin by having a lower minimum wage and a longer basic work week than the previously covered jobs.

The minimum wage for newly covered jobs is $1.00 an hour beginning February, 1967. It will go up to $1.15 an hour beginning February, 1968. One and a half times the hourly rate must be paid beginning February, 1967 for all hours over 44 in a week, and beginning February, 1968, for all hours over 42 in a week. The time-and-a-half provision applies even if the employee is earning more than the minimum. But it does not apply to certain exempted jobs and industries, of which farming is one.

Here are some examples of newly covered industries and enterprises. Again if an enterprise is covered, unskilled maintenance employees are included. This is not a full list of all newly covered jobs; there are others.

Industries That Were Never Covered Before

Hospitals and nursing homes
All schools and colleges, public and private
Laundries and dry-cleaning establishments
Farms that employed more than 500 man-days of hired labor in a calendar quarter (about seven full time employees) last year
Large motels, hotels, restaurants
Large automobile, trailer, and farm-implement dealers.

Smaller Enterprises in Previously Covered Industries

Some smaller retail stores (doing more than $250,000 business annually)
All smaller construction companies (that is, all construction companies not previously covered)
Many smaller city bus companies
Many large taxicab companies (drivers are exempt from overtime).

Industries and Jobs Not Previously Covered and Still Not Covered. The Fair Labor Standards Act does not cover employment of the following.

Professional, administrative, and executive employees
Outside Salesmen
Domestic workers
Members of an employer's immediate family
Employees of motion-picture theaters
Fishermen

There are others that are not covered.

SOME SPECIAL PROVISIONS

Equal Pay. All employers covered by the Act, whether before or since February, 1967, must pay women workers the same rate as men workers for the same job, and they may not reduce the men's pay to make it equal to the women's. This applies even if the employees are receiving more than the minimum rate.

Child Labor. All employers covered by the Act are prohibited from employing children under certain conditions. No children under 14 years of age may be employed at all, except in agriculture and then only outside of school hours. Children between 14 and 16 may be employed only outside of school hours, except in agriculture. And children under 18 may not work in certain dangerous occupations. (In addition, many states have special state regulations regarding child labor which occasionally may be stricter than the federal regulations. You also should consult your state department of labor if you believe children are being employed illegally.)

Students and Handicapped Persons. There are special, lower minimums for learners, students and handicapped persons if the employer has a certificate from the Wage and Hour Division.

Contract Services to the Federal Government. Employers who provide goods or services to any branch or agency of the federal government must pay at least the higher minimum for previously covered employees in nearly all cases.

Determining the Hourly Rate. Some workers are paid by the day, the week, the month, or by a piece rate. The hourly rate can be determined by dividing a week's wages before any overtime is added by the number of hours worked. This gives the basic or regular rate. The employee is then entitled to half again as much for each hour worked over 40, or over 44 if he is newly covered. Remember to make this calculation using the employee's gross pay before deductions, not his take-home pay. The employee has a right to know from his employer what his gross pay is.

WARNING: The regulations have been explained in a very general way here. There are many refinements and exceptions. You can find out more specifically whether a particular job in a particular firm is covered by the law by consulting the various publications listed in the booklet or by inquiring at your nearest field office of the Wage and Hour Division of the U.S. Department of Labor.

ENFORCEMENT

The Wage and Hour Division of the United States Department of Labor is responsible for enforcing the law. It acts on its own in uncovering intentional or unintentional violations. It also responds to requests for investigation and complaints.

Who May Lodge a Complaint. Anyone may inform the Division that he believes a particular employee is not being paid in accordance with the law. Complaints are sometimes made by a firm's competitors, by labor unions or by individual employees. The Division never reveals to the employer the name of the individual or group making the complaint. It will also make an investigation on the basis of an anonymous complaint. But, of course, an individual who makes a complaint without revealing his name can't receive an answer from the Division. Besides the fact that the Division will not reveal the name of the person making the complaint, any employer who fires an employee for going to the Wage and Hour Division with an inquiry or complaint can be punished under the law.

Where and How to File a Complaint. If you think an employee is being underpaid according to the law's minimum or is not being paid overtime, or if you think a woman is being paid less than a man for doing the same work you should report the case to the nearest field office of the Wage and Hour Division. If you are not certain whether an employer or an employee is covered by the law, you can still ask the field office to investigate.

You can telephone, visit in person, or write. You should have as much information about the employer's business and about the employee's job as you can get. The white sample information sheet shows some of the kinds of information the Division needs in order to investigate. But do not fail to file just because you can't get all the information, the Division investigator will get it himself.

You may want to mail the postcard in your kit to your nearest office asking for the "Employment Information Form" on which to file a request for an investigation.

What Happens after You File A Complaint. Your complaint should be acknowledged within a few days. After that, it may take several weeks to a few months, depending on how busy the office is, for an investigation to be made.

If the complaint is justified, that is, if the employee or employees are being underpaid according to the law, the Division will order the employer to make up the whole amount the employee lost during the entire time he was underpaid and to pay him in accordance with the law from that time on. In the rare case where the employer does not obey such an order, the Division may take him to court. The burden of enforcing the law is on the government, not on the employee. If the complaint is unjustified, that is if there is no violation of the law, the Division will make a report to the person who filed the complaint explaining why it holds that there is no violation.

If there is no response after a reasonable time or if the response seems unsatisfactory, you may ask the regional office of the Division to review the case.

Detailed reports are not given to organizations or outsiders. If your group wants to act on behalf of one or several employees and you want the Division's responses to come to your organization's address, file in the name of an individual employee, with his consent, with an address in care of your organization.

Problem Areas. The industries and firms that are being covered for the first time are those where there are most likely to be violations or misunderstandings. Therefore, you would do well to be especially sensitive to conditions in the following fields:

Agriculture--If last year a farmer employed six or seven employees more or less regularly, or regularly during the season, he may be covered this year. Many large farmers who have never been covered before will now have to pay at least $1 an hour, and the same piece rate to children as to adults.

Laundries, dry-cleaning establishments, hospitals, nursing homes, schools--These kinds of enterprises have traditionally paid their maintenance and kitchen personnel very low wages for very long hours. Almost all of them will now be covered by the law. The lowest-paid workers will now have to be paid at least $1.00 an hour for hours up to 44 and $1.50 for hours over 44. Most workers will have to be paid time-and-a-half for hours over 44.

Restaurants, motels, hotels--Many large hotels, motels, restaurants will be covered for the first time. Tips may be counted toward earnings, but only up to 50 percent; at least 50 percent must be paid in wages by the employer.

It would also be worthwhile to investigate the situation of any workers who were receiving $1.25 an hour before February, 1967. If they were covered by the law then, they should now receive $1.40 an hour.

The Extent of Wage-Hour Violations

Enforcement of the Fair Labor Standards Act is the key to its effectiveness and the fulfillment of the promise it holds for low-paid workers.

Actual minimum wage investigations by the Wage and Hour Division found more than 400,000 American workers underpaid nearly $90 million in minimum wage, overtime and equal pay violations in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1966. It is estimated that actual investigations discover only half the violators. However, even where violations were found, nearly two-thirds of the money or $60 million in underpayments may never be recovered.

In the last year, employers caught by wage-hour inspectors in violations have agreed or have been ordered by federal judges to pay $27 million to underpaid workers. But the Wage and Hour Division has no power to compel payments to cover past violations where the employer refuses to pay. As a result, some $60 million in illegal underpayments remain uncollected for fiscal 1966 alone.

In these cases, the cheated workers must sue for reimbursement or ask the Secretary of Labor to do so on their behalf. Too often the collection suits are never brought, especially where the workers involved have no union representation and fear employer reprisals.

The Act provides these methods of recovering unpaid minimum and/or overtime wages:

1. The Administrator of the Wage and Hour Division may supervise payment of back wages.
2. In certain circumstances, the Secretary of Labor may bring suit for back pay upon the written request of the employe.
3. An employe may sue for back wages and an additional sum, up to the amount of back pay, as liquidated damages plus attorney's fees and court costs. (An employe may not bring suit if he has been paid back wages under supervision of the Administrator or if the Secretary has filed suit to enjoin the employer from retaining the wages due him.)
4. The Secretary of Labor may also obtain a court injunction to restrain any person from violating the law, including the unlawful withholding of proper minimum wage and overtime compensation.

According to a 1965 survey by the Labor Department on the extent of compliance with the Fair Labor Standards Act, it is estimated that 1,770,000 employes were underpaid at one time or another during the two-year period, 1964-5. Underpayments amounted to $310 million or an average of $172 per worker. Over 343,000 establishments were involved in violations of one or more of the monetary provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

The compliance survey of the Labor Department gives a fairly good picture of where the violations are and the enormity of the underpayments. During the two-year investigatory period, an estimated 700,000 workers failed to receive the proper minimum wage. Over $72 million was due workers not paid the statutory minimum.

Of the 700,000 employes paid less than the minimum, it is estimated that 38 percent were employed in manufacturing firms, with the worst violators in food processing and tobacco. Retail trade accounted for the largest single group of these underpaid workers. Over a quarter of the employes were in large establishments employing 100 or more workers. A majority of the workers were employed in firms or plants located in metropolitan areas. Nearly half the workers were in firms with more than one store.

The Labor Department survey also estimates that nearly a million and a half (1,463,000) employes were not paid in accordance with the overtime provisions of FLSA. Estimated back wages owed for overtime violations during the two-year period amounted to $236 million. Over two-thirds of the employes were engaged in non-manufacturing firms, with a large concentration of violations in construction and wholesale trade. Over one-fourth worked in establishments employing less than 10 people. Two-thirds of the employes worked in metropolitan areas and 41 percent worked for multi-plant firms.

The government survey estimates that over 8,000 employes were not paid in accordance with the equal pay provisions and nearly $2 million was owed for equal pay violations during the previous six to twelve-month investigatory period. Extensive violations were found in the chemical, petroleum, rubber, textile, apparel and leather industries.

The study of child labor violations showed that an estimated 72,400 minors were illegally employed by 48,000 establishments during the two-year period. The worst child labor violators were: lumber, furniture, paper, printing and publishing, construction and retail trade.

The South showed a significantly higher concentration of violating establishments than any other region of the country, according to the Labor Department's survey estimates.

SAMPLE INFORMATION FORM

For Developing a Minimum Wage Law Complaint

Fill in as completely as possible. You do not have to have all of this information in order to make a complaint to the nearest office of the Wage and Hour Division of the U.S. Department of Labor. An official form (Employment Information Form) can be obtained from that office.

A STATEMENT ON THE DEATH OF DR. MARTIN LUTHER KING

Issued by the Executive Committee of the Southern Regional Council, Inc., meeting in Atlanta, Georgia, April 6, 1968

The assassination of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., once again reveals the psychosis of violence and the cancer of racism in American society. Once again, America is stained with the blood of a courageous and noble leader, with the tragedy of a husband and father senselessly destroyed. His murder violates the ideals for which he stood, ideals which express the great tradition of America.

This is not the time for bitter and unrestrained recriminations against the society which killed Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., but rather the time for all of us to pay heed at last to all that has already been said to the conscience of the nation in the grim, ghastly past — at the murders of John F. Kennedy, Medgar Evers, of the four little children in a Birmingham Sunday School, and so many others.

This is the time for white America to forego lecturing black Americans against violating the non-violent philosophy to which Dr. King's life will stand as a memorial for all time. Let white America for once concede to black America strength and dignity sufficient to make that decision without advice or admonishment. Let white America acknowledge that black Americans, as Dr. King has proved, have equal moral personality as human beings and have the qualities of leadership and courage and dignity which all Americans need.

The life of Dr. King transcends the violence done throughout his career to the American ideals for which he stood and the final obscene violence to him. His leadership during his life and the pangs of conscience white America feels in his death give all Americans the chance — and perhaps the last chance — to make the choice between the kind of society for which Dr. King lived and died, and the kind of society which denies equal opportunity and relies on force above justice and equity. If America cannot produce leadership toward the society that Dr. King saw in his dream for America, then America is finished.

Let white America look into its own heart.

CONFERENCE PROCEEDINGS

SOUTHWIDE CONFERENCE OF BLACK ELECTED OFFICIALS

DEC. 11-14, 1968

DINKLER HOTEL
ATLANTA, GEORGIA

Sponsored by
The Voter Education Project
Southern Regional Council, Inc.
Atlanta, Georgia

PREFACE

Late in 1967 and early in 1968, as it became apparent that the number of black elected officials in the South was growing rapidly and would continue to do so in the months ahead, the Voter Education Project of the Southern Regional Council conceived the idea of a southwide conference for these officials. Most—indeed, almost all—had been elected in the middle '60s as black voter registration advanced markedly.

Being closely associated with the dramatic registration increases of the '60s, VEP felt an obligation to the officials who had been elected largely as a result of these voter gains. Most of the officials had little political experience—or, indeed, previous contact with the political process—and giving assistance to these officials is an important part of VEP's broad goal of extending political participation. Moveover, it was felt that a regional meeting would be a means of bolstering the spirits of black officials, many of whom serve in extremely trying circumstances, and motivating prospective black officials throughout the South.

A number of foundations were approached with requests to supply special funds for such a conference. Almost all responded not only with approval, but also with enthusiasm. Arrangements then went forward to bring all the black elected officials to Atlanta for a four-day conference, with all expenses to be paid by VEP. The Rev. John Morris, former executive director of the Episcopal Society for Cultural and Racial Unity, was employed to coordinate the conference.

It was decided that a variety of workshops would be held for the elected officials, in addition to general sessions (see conference agenda, Page 2). A date subsequent to the November 5 general election was picked so that officials then elected could be invited to the conference. (It was determined that only elected officials would be invited, since the list of appointed black officials is even larger and more varied than the list of elected officials.)

Of approximately 385 Negroes holding elected positions in the South in late 1968, nearly 200 attended the conference, which was the first of its kind ever held in the South. The Voter Education Project is grateful to the foundations and to the individuals who contributed in countless ways to the success of the conference. The results of the program planning described above are presented in these conference proceedings.

'...A More Just Society...'

The Rev. John Morris, coordinator of the Southwide Conference of Black Elected Officials and an Episcopal priest, delivered the invocation at the opening dinner Dec. 11. The Rev. Mr. Morris was in charge of planning the program and making arrangements for the conference. He is a founder and former executive director of the Episcopal Society for Cultural and Racial Unity.

ALMIGHTY GOD, Who hast given us this good land for our heritage and helped us to begin to turn back the forces of oppression and injustice;

BEHOLD NOW Thy people who have gathered here in the pursuit of greater service of their fellow man. Grant that these days may be both profitable in helping us build a more just society and a witness to the spirit of free men.

THOU WHO are Lord of Lords and King of Kings, hidden and yet on every side, preserve from self-serving ambition those to whom the authority of government is entrusted; but, rather, give them an untiring zeal to see that Thy will is done and all men are free before they rest.

AS WE MEET we also honor the memory of thy servant, Martin, whose vision of a beloved community still beckons, and whose death reminds us of the sacrifice of many who have gone before.

FOR his love and for Thine we are grateful; and for our fellowship here and the food of which we are about to partake.

BLESSED ART THOU, Lord of the harvest, who bringest forth bread from the wheat fields and wine from the vineyard. Keep us in Thy love for ever and ever.

AMEN.

'...A Rapidly Growing List...'

Text of opening remarks by Vernon E. Jordan Jr., director of the Voter Education Project, Dec. 11.

Three years ago, just after passage of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, the Southern Regional Council compiled a list of elected Negro officeholders in the South. The list totaled just over 70 names.

Today, counting some 80 black candidates elected for the first time in the Nov. 5 general election, the list totals over 380 names. The roster thus is more than five times as large today as it was just three years ago.

This dramatic increase is one of the more significant developments in Southern politics today. Not even the fact that five Southern states gave George Wallace his only electoral votes can overshadow the deepening involvement of black Southerners in the region's political process.

It is true, of course, that most of these officials were elected by predominantly black voting lists and are a result of heavy increases in Negro registration. Indeed, many represent all-black districts—as do, for example, the mayors and councilmen in all-black towns. Nevertheless there are some black officeholders—notably several of the legislators—who represent districts in which large numbers of white voters live. In any event, the list of black officeholders is growing very rapidly and will continue to do so in the months ahead.

This rapid growth in the number of Negro officeholders poses a new issue for Negroes in the South—a welcome issue, but an issue nevertheless. That issue is how to make these new officeholders as effective as possible in filling their offices. Like politicians of all races, black officeholders must be able to produce in behalf of their constituents. But Negro officeholders face several additional problems.

Black voters often feel that officeholders should produce instantly, almost magically, all those benefits and services that had been denied down through the years by callous white officials. Usually—almost always—this is impossible.

In many cases the Negro officeholder finds himself serving Negroes who live outside his district but have no spokesman. Thus a Negro legislator—to use that office as an example—might find himself speaking on some issues for all the Negroes in the state.

The Negro officeholder is being observed closely by both races. Some of the watching eyes are friendly, but many are hostile. Often the new Negro officeholder will be measured by yardsticks far more exacting than those applied to his white predecessors. The difficulty that Julian Bond had in claiming his seat in the Georgia Legislature stands as an example of the sort of roadblocks that can be thrown in the way of black elected officials.

Finally, most of the newly elected black officials carry a heavy burden of political inexperience. Historically, the white political structure of the South has deliberately and systematically denied blacks the opportunity to gain experience in the political process.

This is the sort of practical problems we will be dealing with these four days at the first Southwide Conference of Black Elected Officials. We will not solve all the problems at one conference. But we hope to establish, at this conference, some machinery for dealing with the problems on a continuing basis in the future, as the number of black elected officials continues to grow.

'...An Attack on All of Us...'

Rep. Julian Bond of Atlanta opened the four-day Southwide Conference of Black Elected Officials with a keynote speech Dec. 11 at a dinner. Rep. Bond, refused his seat by the Georgia House of Representatives because of his opposition to the war in Vietnam, was elected three times before he was seated by order of the U. S. Supreme Court in 1967. The 28-year-old legislator's name was placed before the 1968 Democratic National Convention as a nominee for vice president.

It is difficult to know what to say to an audience like this one. We come from so many different backgrounds, we hold so many different jobs, we have so many different ambitions. All that we have in common is the fact that we are politicians, we are black, and we are very largely elected by black constituencies.

Those last two facts are the most important—our race and the race of people whom we represent, the people who have chosen us to make important decisions for them.

Without knowing what kinds of people have selected you, let me tell you something about the people I am proud and privileged to represent in the Georgia General Assembly—the citizens of the 111th House district of Fulton County.

They are almost all black—nearly 85 per cent of them. They are nearly all poor—their average yearly income per family is $2,500. They have trouble finding work—unemployment in my district runs between 30 and 40 per cent. They are poorly educated—on the average they completed only the sixth grade. Most of the men have trouble finding work, and so the labor force in my district is predominantly female. You all know the kind of work poorly educated black women do—day work, domestic service, cleaning someone else's kitchen, caring for someone else's children.

Incidentally, the white citizens of my district share the same condition; but unfortunately for them, most of them think that somehow the color of their skin makes their small amount of money go further, or that their whiteness makes their poor sixth grade education better than the one my black constituents have.

But the point of all these statistics is simply to demonstrate that my constituents are probably very much like yours—they are poor and black, and they depend on government, very largely—their city and county and state governments and their federal governments—to help them do the things they are unable to do themselves. That is why they have chosen you to represent them, because they still retain some faith in the power of the democratic process to solve people's problems.

I am very much afraid that for the next several years they are in for some disappointments.

If your constituents are like mine—and like most other black Americans—they voted very heavily for Vice President Humphrey. They wanted him to be President. They may have had some other first choice, but that was denied them by an assassin in Los Angeles. They may even, like I did, have had a second choice; but that was denied them by democracy in Chicago. So therefore they voted for Mr. Humphrey. He represented warmth, while one can only find coldness in the iciness we now hear described as the "new" Nixon.

So while we were voting one way, the rest of the country voted another. They chose a man who said he didn't expect to get black votes and therefore never sought them out; they chose a man who said he was publicly for open housing but privately against it, and they chose a man who says the federal government is enforcing the 1954 Supreme Court decision too swiftly.

They chose a man who has tremendous power to set a positive or a negative future for black Americans.

—He perhaps may choose five new Supreme Court justices and therefore may determine the nature of the decisions that Court makes in civil rights cases over the rest of this century.

—He will certainly choose a new attorney general and a new head of the civil rights division of the Department of Justice and will decide how vigorously—or whether at all—they enforce the legislation that affects us most vitally.

—He is going to name the staff and set the budget for the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, the Department of Housing and Urban Development, and the Office of Economic Opportunity. He will determine how these agencies respond when they are asked to deal with our problems.

He will have a great deal to say about the nature of the 92nd Congress.

Now those are not the kinds of decisions one wants to leave to a man whose closest advisers include Strom Thurmond.

But we are faced, now that the election has passed, with being ruled by a man who was not the choice of 90 per cent of us, with being ruled by a man who has yet to demonstrate that he has any concern for the poor or the black. We will be ruled by a man who says he wants to rebuild our slums with black capitalism, which can only mean exchanging the race of the people who have been exploiting us. Faced with that kind of government over the next four years, the way that all of us act from now until 1972 is going to be very important.

We face these next four years a Congress that is more conservative than the last one, and we face a nation that has grown tired of the demands of the black and the poor. We are in a position worse off, relatively speaking, than our position has been over the past several years.

You all know the statistics that show more black people working, more living in decent homes, more getting an education, more earning more money. There is another set of figures that shows we make less money now—more in comparison with what we used to make, but less in comparison with white people. We are moving out of poverty, but while white poverty in America has decreased 27 per cent, black poverty has decreased only 3 per cent.

The most frightening figure is this one. The infant mortality rate for blacks—compared with whites—in 1940, 28 years ago, was 70 per cent higher. In other words, our babies died 70 per cent faster 28 years ago than white babies did. There has been some change, however—in 1962, just six short years ago, the figure was 90 per cent.

Now in addition to these kinds of problems, we face involvement in a problem of national proportions, a problem that affects every American, black and white. That problem is America's imperial war in Vietnam. The difference, black and white, is that it affects us more.

It feeds on our community. It takes our sons and fathers and brothers and uncles to fight and die in it in greater proportion than it takes any other group of Americans. Is that because we are braver, or because we love fighting more than anyone else, or because we are greater patriots? I think not. I think it is because young black men find the Army uniform and three square meals a day more attractive than they find life in Harlem, or Watts, or the Delta of Mississippi or the bayous of Louisiana. And so the war takes them. It sends them 8,000 miles away from their homes, telling them they are defending freedom, the kind of freedom they often find lacking in the communities they leave behind.

The war places many of them in an integrated situation for the first time—a front-line foxhole, next to some white boy. America has not yet discovered how to get that kind of integration at home.

Most of us are spectators to the war. We watch the young black man and the white boy on television, often in living color, as they burn down the huts of some poor Vietnamese village, and realize the two of them could not live on the same block in most American villages. We may realize further that if the young black boy is lucky enough to survive the war without being killed, he may come home and may become so frustrated at the discrimination and racism he meets in the land of his birth that he may burn down some American village—using, of course, the skills and the techniques he learned while defending America's freedom overseas.

Now I have heard some black politicians say that the war didn't affect them, that it was a foreign policy matter, and that we ought not say anything about it, that it wasn't our business. Well, let me say that any time you live in a country that is willing to pay $500,000 for every enemy soldier it kills, and only $50.75 for every poor person in the war on poverty, then that is your business.

Every time you find yourself living in a country that tells you violence is all right when it results in death and destruction for some little brown people 8,000 miles away but not when it is done by black people here at home, then it is your business.

Every time your government tells you that the trouble in Vietnam is caused by outside agitators from the North, think back to George Wallace and Marvin Griffin telling you that you would be happy and satisfied if it wasn't for the outside agitators from the American North.

Ladies and gentlemen, it is everyone's business.

So we have to make it our business to tackle some of the evils of 20th Century Americanism—racism and militarism. We could begin to do that by making our own communities strong and by controlling the goods and services and the institutions of our communities. For a long time we've only had the church. That was the only thing that was ours and ours alone. But I hope in the future that we'll begin to widen our sights and say to ourselves that if it operates in a community of black people, black people have got to control it. That means the businesses and it means the schools and it may mean the police as well.

I was in New York City on Monday, and I went to Intermediate School No. 201, one of the Harlem schools that is controlled and run by the people of Harlem. I spoke to a class of eighth graders, and in my speech, I mentioned some great people who have come from Georgia; and with Roy Hamilton and Ray Charles and James Brown and Otis Redding and Gladys Knight and the Pips, I mentioned the Honorable Elijah Muhammad. Now you may not think that eighth graders ought to be taught about Ray Charles or James Brown, and I'd agree with you; and you might think that Elijah Muhammad might not be a proper subject for an eighth grade class either, but they knew who he was. One eighth-grader told me, "Elijah Muhammed taught racist doctrines, and that's why Malcolm X left the Muslims." Another told me, "The Honorable Elijah Muhammad is the leader of the Nation of Islam and the Messenger of Allah."

Now I submit to you, that's a wonderful thing. Not that one child agrees with Mr. Muhammad and another does not, but that both know about him, and both know he is a part of our peculiar history in the United States. That, I think, is what it means when black people control their community.

Additionally, I think we've got to be aware of and suspicious of attempts to turn us against our own interests. Take Mr. Nixon's Black Capitalism, for instance. (Now before any one of you begins to think I'm against capitalism, let me correct you. But I think we'd all admit that if it had not been for white capitalism, none of us would ever have been sold into slavery.) As Mr. Nixon explains it, Black Capitalism means that General Motors will be given tax credits to come into my community to set up a factory that will hire and train black people. Now that is wonderful, but it's not Black Capitalism by any stretch of the imagination. That is white capitalism once again coming into the black community and taking the only thing we have to offer, which is our labor.

Instead, we ought to become interested in—now here's a terrible, dirty word—community socialism. We ought to be interested in the kind of economic development in our communities that will not only give us jobs but will give the community the profit as well. A minister in Philadelphia, the Rev. Leon Sullivan, the man who began the idea that became Operation Breadbasket, has a project like that working now. Mr. Nixon has seen it, and we ought to hope that he gets the message.

We are additionally going to have to look around us for the kinds of people we can join forces with. It would be nice if we could go it alone. I am sure there is not a single person here who hasn't said to himself, at one time or another, I wish I could just get away from all this. But we can't, and our numbers are so small nationally that we have got to find the kinds of people who can help us. Those we used to depend on have deserted us.

Organized labor used to call itself our friend, but you saw where labor was in the 1968 presidential election.

White liberals and moderates used to help us, but this terrible war has attracted nearly all their attention.

So we have got to try to find new friends, while we hope the old ones will come home. We naturally ought to look to the other colored minorities—the Mexican-Americans and the Puerto Ricans and the American Indians. If we could get some kind, any kind of response from the heavy shield of racism that blinds poor white people, they would be our natural allies too.

In the future, we will have to beware of the kinds of coalitions like the one that has existed in this city for so long. That coalition put all of us together with some of the white people—the moderates and the liberals. It worked out fine while it was intended to maintain order; but since the blacks began to demand justice, the coalition is beginning to show some signs of wear. And now they want to expand the city limits to cut our numbers down.

So we have to always be on the lookout for any other forces in American political society that can help us. We ought not to turn anyone down. If your house is on fire, and a man runs up with a bucket of water, don't ask him where he got it or who he is. Just make sure it's not gasoline and then pour it on.

Finally, although we need fast action, we have to move with care. We are living in strange times. For the first time in the last eight years, the forces of conservatism have won a national election. For the first time since 1948, we have had a presidential candidate who appealed to racism. This year the hillbilly Hitler from Alabama won nine million votes. In 1972 he will be back again, and we must be ready for him.

We live in an era in which the next Vice-President of the United States makes jokes about Polacks and Japs—you know that any man who does that will also joke about Wops and Spics and Niggers. We live in an era in which a committee of the U.S. House of Representatives has said we ought to reopen the concentration camps that the Japanese were put in during the Second World War; but this time they don't want to put the Japanese in them, they intend them for us.

In an era like that, we ought to consider that an attack on one of us is really an attack on all of us.

We ought to remember what a German minister had to say when someone asked him what he did to stop Hitler from coming to power. He said: "When they came for the Jews, I did not cry out because I was not a Jew. When they came for the Catholics, I did not cry out because I was not a Catholic. When they came for the union leaders, I did not cry out because I was not a union leader. But when they knocked on my door, then and only then did I think of screaming; but there was no one around to hear my screams."

In closing, let me say one final thing. I have believed that we are and will be a great people because we come from a great people. We have great heroes. But a people with a limited view of their own past will have a limited future. So let me close by reading to you two short pieces that come from our past. One comes from a man who was, I believe, our greatest hero, Frederick Douglass. His words of 100 years ago ought still apply to us today. One comes from a man like us, a black politician, who was thrown out of the Georgia House of Representatives 100 years ago.

Frederick Douglass:

> "He who would be free must strike the first blow. You know that liberty given is never so precious as liberty sought for and fought for. The man who is outraged is the man who must make the first outcry. Depend on it: men will not care much for a people who do not care for themselves. Men will organize to prevent cruelty to animals, for they are dumb creatures and cannot speak for themselves; but we are men, and men must speak for themselves or we shall not be spoken for at all. We hold it self-evident that no class or color should be the exclusive ruler of this country. If there is such a ruling class, there must, of course, be a subject class; and when that condition is established, the government of the people, by the people and for the people shall perish from the earth."

Henry McNeill Turner.

"Even though we are not white, we have accomplished much. We have pioneered a civilization. We have built up your country. We have worked in your field and have garnered your harvest for 250 years. Do we ask for compensation for the sweat our fathers bore for you—for the tears you have caused, the hearts you have broken and the blood you have spilled? Do we ask retaliation? We ask it not. We are willing to let the dead past bury the dead. But we ask you now for our rights. You have all the elements of superiority on your side—you have our money and your own, you have our education and your own. You have our land and your own. We are strangers in the land of our birth; without money, without education, without aid, without a rook to cover us while we live, nor clay to cover us when we die. It is extraordinary that a race such as yours, professing gallantry and chivalry and education and superiority, living in a land where Bibles are read and where Gospel truths are spoken and where courts of justice are presumed to exist—it is extraordinary that with all these advantages on your side, you can still make war on the defenseless black man.

"The great question is this: Am I a man? If I am such, I claim the rights of man. You may expel us, but I believe firmly that one day you will repent it. The black man cannot protect a country if the country cannot protect him, and if tomorrow, a war would arise, I would not raise a musket to defend a country where my manhood is denied. The fashionable way in Georgia is for the white man to sit at ease while the black man does the work, but I will say this much to the colored men of Georgia: never lift a finger or raise a hand in defense of Georgia unless Georgia acknowledges that you are men and invests you with the rights pertaining to manhood. You may expel us by your votes today; but while you do it, remember that there is a just God in Heaven, whose all-seeing eye beholds alike the acts of the oppressor and the oppressed, and who despite the machinations of the wicked, never fails to vindicate the cause of justice and the sanctity of his own handiwork."

Let me suggest that those two men were men, real men. Their words are 100 years old, but their thoughts and ideas are as fresh as tomorrow. If each of us can approach his job with one half the fire and fervor that those two men did, then we will have vindicated the trust our constituents put in us.

'... The Key to Southern Liberation ...'

Dr. Samuel D. Cook, professor of political science at Duke University, gave "an historical sketch of the Negro in the Southern political process" at the opening session Dec. 12. His talk was followed by a panel-audience discussion. Dr. Cook is chairman of the Voter Education Project's Advisory Committee.

Just as politics "makes strange bedfellows," it begets baffling meanings, events, and experiences. It sometimes makes realities of illusions and illusions of realities. Politics can enslave "the high and the mighty" even as they celebrate the delights of power and privilege. There is a politics of deception, but there are also deceptions of politics, including brutal self-deceptions. The history of Southern politics is a grim reminder and prophetic warning of the perils of politics of fear, negativism, memory, separation, and brutally irrational collective egoism and pride.

The historic position of the Negro in the Southern political system is an awfully strange phenomenon, full of paradox and irony, simplicity and complexity, mystery and meaning, public injustice and poetic justice. Strange as it may seem, the black man's influence on Southern political systems, structures, events, and public policies has been profound, central, and universal. Somehow, the harsh and startling truth is that the Negro is the key to Southern politics. Take him out of the equation and the politics of Southern history does not, in substance, make sense; it is, clearly, beyond the realm of rational intelligibility. Put him in the key role and the tawdry pieces, like a symphony, fall into their proper places and perspectives.

Though, in essence, powerless, helpless, and victimized, the black man, because of the tyranny of racism over the mind of the white South, has been able, without intention or knowledge, to dominate Southern political and governmental life. Essentially outside the political arena, his presence in Dixie largely determined the content, style, rhetoric, direction, and issues inside the Southern political process. How paradoxical and ironic!

Driven by a paranoic fear of black control or "domination," the political thought and practices of the South produced by way of the back door (how symbolic!) that very "black domination" it most feared and sought so desperately to avoid. Slaves tyrannized masters; subjects tyrannized citizens; those who monopolized the structure and process of power fell victim to the very men against whom, above all, their terrible power was directed. Whites fell into the trap they had so cleverly and determinedly made for blacks: absolute dominion.

The very presence of the Negro exercised a dominating influence on the public philosophy and life of the South. The heart of Southern history has been informed and inspired by memories and anticipations, hopes and fears, beliefs and doubts, cocksure complacency and blinding restlessness issuing from the troubling and universal presence of Negroes. Unwittingly, the Negro has exercised tyrannical power over the Southern political process. Just as he was victimized by the albatross of racism, so was the white man. With all his awesome and unlimited power, the white man of the South was powerless—psychologically, emotionally, intellectually, spiritually, culturally, economically, and politically—to shake off the tyrannical influence of the black man. The black man has been the Southern white man's "hang-up." The Negro, like a fearsome ghost, has haunted and driven the white man. The white South's actions and reactions, plans and counter-plans, contemplative flights and manipulative processes were, in large measure, simply echoes and reflections of the agonized, agonizing, and fearsome presence of politically alienated and powerless black men. Deep and irrational fears can enslave even the most powerful. The Southern white man's genius—political and otherwise—has been exhausted in "the race problem." Southern politics is, at bottom, the politics of fear, and the object of fear is the black man.

The changes that have occurred on the Southern political scene—symbolized by your election to positions of power and responsibility—are indeed radical, but the most radical ones are yet to come. The key to Southern liberation is black liberation—liberation from the cancer of racism. When black men are fully free, the South will be fully free. It will overcome its legacy of national alienation, poverty, illiteracy, economic colonialism, cultural and ideological isolation, and tragic and self-defeating enslavement to the tyranny of the past and the seething despair of a collective existence born of entrapment to the paralysis of memory. Freed from the heavy yoke of racism, the South—and, on a deeper level, the nation as well—will take wings.

I. The Nature of Politics

Politics, shorn of its non-essentials, is a struggle for power and for the values associated with, and derived from, the possession of power. Politics, said Max Weber, "means striving to share power or striving to influence the distribution of power, either among states or among groups within a state."[1] Political institutions and activities are, essentially, power relations. Power is the ability to get things done, to influence others, to create the desired consequences or conditions.[2] It is the capacity to manipulate and control the world of men as well as the realm of nature in accordance with one's interests and desires.

"Political power is social power focused on the state. It involves control of other men for the purpose of influencing the behavior of the state, its legislative, administrative and judicial activities."[3] Political power determines the authoritative allocation or distribution of public benefits. It involves public decision-making in terms of form and substance, personnel and policy, input and output, privileges and privations, punishment and reward, protection and exploitation, enrichment and impoverishment. Accordingly, the stakes of politics are indeed high and precious. The political system determines who gets what, when, and how. The fruits of political power are many and varied. Public services—from physical protection to street lighting, sewage and garbage disposal—taxation, opportunities for education, enjoyment, employment and other life chances, and related bread-and-butter decisions are largely political matters. Ultimately, politics has profound bearing on the quality and destiny of human life and culture.

Politics is, therefore, a high and honorable calling. It is no better and no worse than other honorable professions. Because of the nature of their office and responsibilities, what political leaders do, in terms of virtues and defects, successes and failures, devotion to public good and pursuit of self-serving ends, is more glaring, visible, and dramatic than that of most men and women. The public properly expects high standards from politicians. After all, they are supposed to be the servants and guardians of the public interest.

The political system and the people who manage its operations have great responsibilities and opportunities for public service. Conflict and disagreement, owing both to human nature and to the scarcity of goods or objects of satisfaction, are an inherent part of the human scene. Politics is peculiarly the arena of conflict, tension, clash, and competitive pursuit for the satisfaction of desires and the achievement of advantage and privilege. It is an eternal battleground of pressure and counter-pressure, demand and counter-demand, pushing and shoving.

As Miller asserts,

> Politics . . . is about disagreement or conflict; and political activity is that which is intended to bring about or resist change, in the face of possible resistance . . . . Political activity . . . arises out of disagreement, and it is concerned with the use of government to resolve conflict in the direction of change or in the prevention of change. It is about policy and position.[4]

Conflict is at the heart of politics. Herein lies perhaps the most creative power and responsibility of political life. Politics is concerned with the adjustment, regulation, accommodation, management, and resolution of conflict growing out of competitive desires, needs, interests, and preferences. It has been well said that "politics is the most inclusive process by which social conflict is regulated in a community."[5] The quality of the political system and the character of political leaders are best determined by how they deal with conflict. The response of the political system to the stubborn reality, power, and persistence of conflict discloses its viability, character, and worth. A political system is creative or destructive in accordance with the pattern and quality of its response to the basic problems and dimensions of human conflict.

Race, in its many manifestations, has been the chief source and expression of conflict and tension in Southern political life. The response of the political system has been destructive and sterile rather than creative and imaginative. Radically absent were creative encounters and responsible responses. The fundamental dimensions and human realities of the situation were never faced; indeed, a premium was placed on not facing them. Methods of political sidestepping were endlessly elaborated and faithfully implemented. Exclusion, oppression, suppression, and victimization of blacks were the chief methods and techniques of the South in dealing with racial conflict and tension. They prevailed.

Regulation, adjustment, accommodation, and resolution of conflicting interest were accomplished by the ruthless mobilization and brutal application of "White Power." The idea of shared power and mutuality of political respect was totally lacking. Conflict communication, participation, and representation were not only irrelevant; they were viewed as dangerous subversion of law, order, justice, and the common good. Issues, therefore, were never confronted, and hence their resolution was made an obvious impossibility. The system not only fostered but celebrated and glorified collective hypocrisy, conceit, egoism, and dishonesty. Majestic principles were invoked to justify the reduction of black men to the status of subject and victim of the political process. Lip-service was dutifully paid to democracy even as Negroes were systematically excluded from the experience of every element of citizenship.

II. Southern Politics and the Tyranny of Racism

A. Black Men As Subject, Issue, and Victim

To understand the depth and power of racism over the Southern political process, it first is necessary to grasp what politics has meant to the South. In a way unique to America, politics has been dear to the heart of Southerners; they have loved it with a passion. It has been a source of profound meaning, attachment, value and fulfillment. If racism was the South's first love, politics was its second. The Southern love of politics, Cash insisted, is inseparable from its love of rhetoric and oratory.[6]

He went on to say that,

> Thus the politics of the Old South was a theater for the play of the purely personal, the purely romantic, and the purely hedonistic. It was an arena wherein one great champion confronted another or a dozen, and sought to outdo them in rhetoric and splendid gesturing. It swept back the loneliness of the land, it brought men together under torches, it filled them with the contagious power of the crowd, it unleashed emotion and set it leaping and dancing, it caught the very meanest man up out of his own tiny legend into the gorgeous fabric of the legend of this or that great hero.[7]

Besides, politics in the South has been a form of entertainment, relaxation, and escape from the painful burdens of life. All this must be understood in terms of the region's legacy of poverty, misery, illiteracy, disease, national alienation, and tragedy. Politics has been precious to the Southern collective experience.

Politics provided a psychological and emotional outlet from the soil, which was both a prison and a shrine, a curse and a blessing.

Atlanta Constitution columnist Celestine Sibley perceived the heart of matter:

> If there had been anywhere else to go, any other form of public entertainment, it's possible the rural Southerner wouldn't have developed such a marked taste for oratory and barbecue. Having little enough to divert them, however, at 'lay-by time,' when there was nothing to do in the fields except let the crops grow, and the summer protracted meeting had run its course, a political rally at the county seat was a welcome event. Men of all ages from bearded grandpas to shirt-tail boys saddled up horses, hitched the mule to the wagon or set out afoot to hear such spellbinders as fiery Bob Toombs, Little Alec Stephens, Tom Watson and, in later years, Ol' Gene Talmadge . . . . You have but to read some of the old speeches to realize that politics . . . was better than any road show.[8]

No wonder the South produced so many colorful political figures. One thinks of "Kingfish" Huey Long—"Every Man a King"; "Ma" Ferguson—elected governor to serve as proxy for her husband, barred from office by an earlier impeachment and indictment; Ol' Gene Talmadge—displaying his red galluses, appealing to the "wool-hat" boys, and insisting that he didn't want any votes from any county big enough to have street car tracks; "Kissing Big Jim" Folsom; Georgia's two or three governors at the same time; Cotton Ed Smith discoursing with great eloquence on the virtues of Southern womanhood; Lester Maddox, in the early days of his campaign for the governorship, proclaiming his opposition to school consolidation on the ground that it would prevent some nice little girl from being chosen school queen; George Wallace standing in the "schoolhouse door" in symbolic defiance of the whole majesty and power of the United States government. Behind all the comedy was a serious commitment to political life. It satisfied deep needs.

"The South has always been a great land for politicians. This isn't mere happen-so. It results from the character of the people and the nature of their life."[9] Politics in the Old South was something sacred, something of a religion, perhaps a substitute for, or an extension of, religious experience, rituals, and symbols. The South, according to Dabbs, "tended to replace religion with politics, and to make politics, religion, and the moral life one."[10] He goes on to speak of the "Southern tendency to keep questions in the political realm and to prevent them from becoming moral and religious."[11]

Accordingly, the oppressed status of the Negro in Southern political life represented his victimization and exploitation by something precious and sacred to white Southerners. Deep beliefs and commitments were involved. The region's first and second loves were united in political and governmental institutions and processes to the detriment of black humanity. Politics was, "so to speak," said Cash, "the temple wherein men entered to participate in the mysteries of the common brotherhood of white men, to partake of the holy sacrament of Southern loyalty and hate."[12] Thus racist demagogues, with all their oratory and manipulative skill and power, provided to whites not only enjoyment and entertainment but enrichment, satisfaction, meaning, and fulfillment at the heavy expense of black men. Negroes were excluded from, and victimized by, the Southern political process with a passion that partook of the "sacred."

The raping of Negroes by the Southern political process was, therefore, born of and nurtured by the search for meaning as well as the will-to-power. There was, in fact, a marriage of the will-to-meaning and the will-to-power. Psychological and spiritual components combined. The domination and control of black men satisfied not only the egoistic ambitions, imperialistic aims, and aggressive inclinations of whites; they also satisfied certain spiritual and moral impulses as well. It may sound strange, but the white South gave the political process a moral, spiritual, and religious interpretation. It was also viewed as a commanding agency of organic social cohesion and unity. The Negro was caught up in the throes of a variety of convergent forces and values. A racist public order issued from, and pointed to, more fundamental concerns of the moral, social and religious sphere. The intensity, persistence, and evangelical character of the political persecution of black Southerners is beyond rational comprehension unless linked to perception of certain ultimate concerns.

A broad perspective is essential in order to understand the constant preoccupation with the presence of the Negro and the expenditure of endless energy as well as moral, rational, and political resources to keep him in a state of oppression. The South felt it necessary to make the alienation and domination of Negroes absolute and total—and even that did not produce satisfaction. The desire for security against a weak and black minority was insatiable; the hunger and thirst were beyond satisfaction. It was not enough to make black men powerless; they had to be humiliated and consistently and brutally reminded, in the public forum and in the boondocks, of the contempt and scorn in which they were held. They were easy targets and victims of political evangelism, and the peril of their presence had to be denounced with fervor and earnest dedication.

What's more, the white South could never shake off the feeling of the mysterious and perilous presence of the Negro. Serious threat of "black domination" was always lurking in the background. Negro strength would, according to the perceptions and fears of whites, somehow break through the stone walls and steel barriers of oppressive laws, caste, and custom. Danger was omnipresent; black invasion of sacred white temples was always an immediate possibility. Watching had to be constant; new walls of protection had to be built; new devices for the detection of rebellion had to be invented.

There was, on the ultimate level, a feeling of the powerlessness of power to prevent attempts at social and political change. Prevalent was the paranoic syndrome of a secret but powerful conspiracy against the Southern "way of life." The white man never felt secure. He was haunted by an inner doubt and fear that he had not done enough to maintain the political enslavement of the black man. Complete disfranchisement of blacks did not bring serenity and confidence to whites. Doubt still lurked. Black men were still viewed as a threat, a problem, a nightmare.

Perhaps subconsciously, the feeling that the Negro would rise was substituted for the sorry myth that the Confederate South would rise again. It is strange, but power does not necessarily produce security, and absolute power, if it were possible, would not inevitably bring about absolute security. Ironically, black men, in their powerlessness, exercised tremendous power over whites, who monopolized the process and substance of power; relegated to subjects, black men informed and inspired the basic political philosophy and practices of white citizens. There is an element of mystery in all this, but there is also a core of meaning.

Southern politics has been primarily the politics of race. Racism has presided over perhaps every major aspect of the political life of the region, if the situation is viewed in large terms—in the pre-Civil War era, the Civil War itself, the Confederacy, the Democratic split in 1860, Reconstruction, the Redemption, the establishment of various restrictive voting laws, the Black Codes, the rise and perpetuation of the one-party system,[13] the birth and death of Populism,[14] the Dixiecrat movement, the numerous independent electors exercises, the Wallace movement, and so forth. Alexander Heard asserts, "Southern concern over the Negro is the most deeply rooted source of political contention in American politics."[15]

In his classic study, Southern Politics, V. O. Key observed:

> In its grand outlines the politics of the South revolves around the position of the Negro. It is at times interpreted as a politics of cotton, a politics of free trade, as a politics of agrarian poverty, or as a politics of planter, and plutocrat. Although such interpretations have a superficial validity, in the last analysis the major peculiarities of Southern politics go back to the Negro. Whatever phase of the Southern political process one seeks to understand, sooner or later the trail of inquiry leads to the Negro.[16]

The "Southern bloc" in the Congress exists only in reference to the race issue. After analyzing Southern voting behavior in the Senate, Key concluded that "on the race question, and on that question alone, does a genuine Southern solidarity exist. On other questions Southern Democrats split and Southern solidarity becomes a matter of degree." [17] After examining Southern voting behavior in the House, Key concluded: "Thus the inference to be drawn from House behavior is similar to that deductible from Senate voting: Southern attitude toward the Negro provides the bedrock of Southern sectionalism."[18] The celebrated Southern doctrine of states' rights—from its initial formulation to the present—is, at bottom, an ideological weapon, political imperative, and respectable camouflage for a free hand in the management of race relations. It has no consistent and meaningful application elsewhere. The South "has not stood consistently for states-rights, except on issues associated with slavery and the Negro question."[19]

Somehow, then, the Negro has, unwittingly, exercised a curious tyranny over the mind of the white South. Of the centrality and universality of Negro influence, it has been well said that the > fundamental determinant of Southernism has been the presence of the Negro in large numbers relative to the whites, and resulting white supremacy doctrines and patterns of behavior. A South divorced from the problem of race would not have been a Solid South; a South preoccupied with race problems became a Solid South.[20]

It is of timely relevance to note that racism, fearing that, in a system of competitive party politics Negroes would hold the balance of power, is chiefly responsible for the historic one-party system in the South. "The South is a one-party area," commented Rossiter nearly a decade ago, "primarily because of the Negro."[21] Perhaps the crowning irony of Southern political history and process is that the party of Lincoln—which, owing to its image of association with the rights and aspirations of Negroes, was for nearly a century reduced to impotence in the South—must attribute a large part, though, of course, not all, of its modern rebirth and success to racism.[22]

Significantly, the pervasive influence of the Negro on the political process of the South has not been as a political agent and participant but as a political issue and object.[23] It has been, in other words, his function as a subject, not citizen. Essentially outside the political process and system, the Negro has been the chief source of animation, dynamism, inspiration, strategy, style, issues, and direction.[24] Southern politicization and political socialization issued from, in large measure, the very presence of the black man. The heart of Southern political socialization is the proposition that the governing process is the business of whites only. The Negro, in this view, is only subject—not citizen; a tool to be manipulated, not a political agent to be reckoned with and whose demands are to be responded to. "A democratic citizen," it has been well said, "speaks the language of demands."[25]

B. Consequences of the Tyranny of Racism on Southern Politics

Owing to the tyranny of racism, the Southern political system and process have been built on exclusivist rather than inclusivist principles and ideals. Interpretations of democracy, equality, justice, progress, and other moral ideals that inspire and inform the Southern political process were provincial and made in a manner to deny that very exclusiveness. The principles of democracy, in this framework, were not violated but, on the contrary, affirmed and institutionalized with religious fidelity. As Louis Hartz observed, "One of the crucial factors in the solidarity of the South was a democratic spirit enhanced by the slavery on which it rested."[26]

Some spokesmen of the Old South saw in Greek democracy their model and inspiration. Democracy for whites only was idealized. "The dominance of all white men over the Negro created a sense of brotherhood not unlike the Greek concept of democracy."[27] But even as Athens was invoked, fidelity to the American Creed was proclaimed. "The proslavery argument was so cleverly combined with American ideals that servitude appeared the very condition of democracy."[28] The very slavery of blacks was viewed as a basis of the freedom, equality , citizenship, culture, civilization, and humanity of whites.[29]

Ante-bellum political philosophy, attitudes, public policy, and vision have been continuous and productive of some awesome fruits. The Old South mothered the legacy that whites are born to rule and Negroes to obey, that the governing process is the business alone of whites. Because of slavery, said Tocqueville, "the citizen of the Southern states becomes a sort of domestic dictator from infancy; the first notion he acquires in life is that he is born to command, and the first habit which he contracts is that of ruling without resistance."[30] The operation of the particularistic version of democracy spawned an institutionalized negation of the ideal of the universality of participation inherent in the democratic process. It has meant not only the total alienation of Negroes from, but, even worse, their victimization and exploitation by, the Southern political process.

Down through the years, Southern public life has adhered to the principle of racist exclusivity. Even progressive and reform movements, weak at best, have espoused the ideology of racism. In his monumental Origins of the New South, C. Vann Woodward has a chapter whose title is: "Progressivism—For Whites Only." He maintains, "Southern progressivism generally was progressivism for white men only," and notes the "paradoxical combination of white supremacy and pregressivism."[31]

Self-defeating for whites have been the consequences of the centrality of racism in the total political culture. If it emasculated blacks, it produced the sterility of whites. Low electoral and other forms of citizen participation, a one-party system, (or, rather, a no-party system), a primitive political culture, diversion of energies and imagination from the real and vital issues of regional growth and development, alienation from the mainstream of the public life of the nation, vast restrictions on freedom of choice, archaic political, governmental, and constitutional structures, fertile soil for demagogues, tragic illusions, romance with negativism, and wild-eyed and futile adventures, and an inability to perceive the ultimate dignity, vitality and creative and higher possibilities of political life are all, in great measure, the product of racist-dominated politics. Great visions have been vitiated and buried because of racism. There is deep pathos here. The "tragedy of the South," says Dean Acheson, "has been that racism has corrupted an otherwise respectable strain of protest and experimentation in the search for economic equality, dating back to Jefferson, Mason, Randolph, and Jackson."[32]

Worthy of emphasis is the low level of electoral participation. Voting is only one aspect of political consciousness and involvement, but it is crucial. The record of the whole country is a terrible commentary on our public life,[33] but the South's record is the most depressing.[34] "By any standard," said Key, "precious few Southerners exercise the rights of citizens in a democracy."[35] Many reasons may be adduced, but they are all related, in the end, perhaps, to the "Negro problem."[36] Restrictions on Negro suffrage were vast and constituted "the most impressive systems of obstacles between the voter and the ballot box known to the democratic world."[37]

But restrictions on Negro suffrage took their toll on whites as well, both directly and indirectly, resulting in a small segment of the white population monopolizing the governing process. Indirect limitations on white voters flowed from the quality of the whole political system—the lack of competitive politics, the absence of issues and choices beyond personalities and self-serving factions, the hegemony of routine, and the sheer weight of the cumbersome mechanics of registration and voting. Direct restrictions on whites proceeded from laws aimed at Negroes but also militated against whites of low socio-economic and educational background and status. Laws directed against Negroes almost invariably affected some white voters.[38] The poll tax, for example, Key held, "insofar as it has deterred voting, has operated primarily to keep whites away from the polls,"[39] because Negroes could be kept from the polls by other means. Besides, the landed aristocrats and Bourbons held no special love for "poor whites." Thus, ironically, in the Southern political system certain whites have been victimized by the mythology and practice of the politics of white supremacy. In fact, "in sheer quantity nonvoting whites outnumber the voteless Negroes of the South as a whole."[40] In terms of substantive public policy, the region's legacy of poverty, low per capita income, disease, illiteracy, and undevelopment of resources—human and natural—is a pathetic reminder of the depth and persistence of human folly. In every major crisis of the South, its leadership has defaulted. It has misled.

III. The Day and Night of Reconstruction

With legal emancipation and ratification of the Civil War amendments, the hope and expectation prevailed that former slaves would become, in reality as well as in theory, citizens and therefore full and equal participants in the Southern political process. Hopes, among the four million freedmen and their friends and allies, soared. Expectations and aspirations took wing. Reconstruction got under way.

Obviously, the new freedmen had no political experience or civic education. What is less well-known—and this tells us much about the character of the whole American political tradition as regards black men—is that even free Negroes, before the Civil War, had been, on the whole systematically excluded from the processes of politics. "Prior to the Civil War, Negroes had the right to vote in only four Northern states—Massachusetts, New Hampshire, New York, and Vermont. One Southern state, North Carolina, for a period allowed freed slaves to vote."[40] The voting laws of New York had discriminated against free Negroes.[41] When the Fifteenth Amendment was ratified in 1870, Negroes could vote in only seven Northern states.[42] "During the period between the Philadelphia conventions of 1787 and 1865, only Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, and Massachusetts permitted Negroes to vote on equal terms with whites. All others, at some time, have barred Negro Americans from the suffrage."[43]

Despite the tragically scarred legacy of slavery, Southern resentment and hostility, political chaos, and partisan wrangling for the advantages of power and privilege, Negroes plunged deeply into the muddy waters of Southern politics. They registered and voted in large numbers. They filled significant elective and appointive offices. They were familiar figures at state constitutional conventions, in state legislatures, and in local positions of responsibility. Between 1869 and 1880, 16 black men served in Congress from the South—two of whom, Hiram R. Revels and Blanche K. Bruce, represented Mississippi in the Senate. By 1895, 21 Negroes, representing eight states, had served in the House of Representatives.

Many myths have been created and perpetuated about "Negro domination" during Reconstruction—powerful myths that have been used to justify the political oppression and degradation of black men. The facts, however, are quite different. As John Hope Franklin observed,

> No group has attracted more attention or has had its role more misrepresented by contemporaries and by posterity than Southern Negroes during Radical Reconstruction. The period has been described as one of Negro rule, as one of gross perfidy with the Negro as the central figure, since the reins of misgovernment were supposedly held by black militiamen. Negroes were not in control of the state governments at any time anywhere in the South. They held public office and, at times, played important parts in the public life of their respective states. But it would be stretching a point to say that their roles were dominant, and it would be hopelessly distorting the picture to suggest that they ruled the South. It was in South Carolina that they had the greatest numerical strength. In the first legislature there were eighty-seven Negroes and forty whites. From the outset, however, whites controlled the state senate and in 1874 the lower house as well. At all times the governor was white. There were two Negro lieutenant governors. . . .[44]

Negro public officials, during Reconstruction, were neither better nor worse than their white counterparts. Both virtues and defects, both successes and failures were shared. Black men made real contributions.[45] A major contribution was to the establishment of public education for both races. "It is fair to say," asserted DuBois, "that the Negro carpetbag governments established the public schools of the South."[46]

The hopes of Reconstruction were dashed for a variety of reasons. The failure of the national government to enforce the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments, partisan calculations, Southern determination to make the political process the exclusive prerogative of whites, the low economic, social, and educational status of blacks and other forces conspired to end the experiment in shared power and responsibility. With the withdrawal of federal troops, the Negro was abandoned to his enemies. White power was restored with vengeance. Force, violence, economic pressure, psychological coercion, and various "legal" devices were employed to reduce black men, once more, to the status of subject and victim. Virtual slavery returned.

IV. Conclusion: Citizen at Last?

"The citizen, unlike the subject, is an active participant in the political input process—the process by which political decisions are made."[47] Is the Negro, at long last, a free, equal participant in the Southern political process? The answer is clearly in the negative. The input must be increased; the output even more so. Changes in public philosophy and policy must come.

While it is true that the Negro still is part subject, it is also true that, because of numerous changes in the political landscape, he is much nearer the shore of political equality than at any previous time. He now has a toehold in the Southern political process. He can, on the whole, vote. Negroes are, in increasing numbers, elected to public office. A handful hold appointive positions in state and local governments. Black men are beginning to participate in the conduct of party affairs. A new day has dawned in the political and governmental life of the region. Because of pressure, barriers continue to fall. Because of increased participation, black men are developing a fund of public experience and increasing their political confidence and skill.

Negroes can help redeem the past of the Southern political process. They can be liberating and redemptive agents. Just as the Negro was the key to Southern political enslavement, he is the key to Southern political emancipation. The Southern genius has been exhausted in the "race problem." Black men, working with whites of reason, good will, and a sense of justice, can largely free the South from the chains and illusions of the past. The chief problem is racism.

Freed from the prison of racism, the South will be freed from the heavy yoke of deceit, hypocrisy, negativism, obstructionism, and provincialism. It will be freed from the vain illusion of the possibility of the restoration of a public order "gone with the wind." It will be freed of the exhausting and painful efforts to maintain a closed corporation. It will be freed from enslavement to the past and to memory. Freed of the Atlas burden of racism, the Southern political process will be able to say, ironically, with Martin Luther King: "Free at last."

'...Real Kind of Revolution...'

Dr. Vivian Henderson, president of Clark College in Atlanta, was luncheon speaker Dec. 12th. Dr. Henderson is author of a Southern Regional Council study on "The Economic Status of Negroes" and is co-author of several books, including "The Advancing South: Manpower Prospects and Problems" and "Jobs and Color: Negro Employment in Tennessee State Government." He is a member of the VEP Advisory Committee and the SRC executive committee.

I am interested in discussing with you what I believe to be a very important set of background phenomena in terms of the South. This audience, by virtue of its structure and the structure of its agenda and its program, obviously is interested in the South. Subsequently I'd like to try to pinpoint some kind of strategy for black elected officials.

Now I won't be too successful here, because I'm not a political scientist and I'm not a political figure. But I've had some experience in the practical field of trying to arouse a community and particularly to help organize Negro political groups for the purpose of effecting a sophisticated kind of strategy (I use the word sophistication without apology here.)—a sophisticated kind of strategy that would enable us to know something about what we ought to do under a variety of conditions involving political participation.

We hear a lot of talk about the revolutions of today. And, of course, to me, when we talk in terms of revolution, we think in terms of violence, physical upheaval—and of course there is some of that. But I think the politics of the South and certainly the representation here today manifests the real kind of revolution that is going on in this country and particularly in the South.

Any person with minimum intelligence would sense the fact that what is here today would not have been here three years ago. Any person with minimum intelligence would recognize the fact that what we have here is a conglomeration of personalities from varying black groups representing different kinds of interests but all currently having one thing in common—and that is, being black and, at the same time, trying to pursue, like a people, the best life and the good life within the framework of a democratic society. It is this kind of a revolution that doesn't get enough attention in the public press and in the media. It is usually the soapbox orator who gets the attention.

The issues facing the South today emerged from traditional and persistent problems. This is so with regard to race relations, and it is also the case with regard to the broader of politics—of economics, education and leadership. On the other hand, I do think that the forces which condition and shape these issues are of recent vintage. The forces of urbanization, the forces of technological change, mobility of labor and capital and the swiftness with which such forces play havoc with the lives of many people—this is certainly of a new origin.

As Southerners and as people interested in working in Southern politics, it is important for us to recognize the two faces of the South. The concept of the old order —the only face the South exhibited—was that of a rural and backward South. Now I see that there are at least two faces today. One is the face of Southern cities and metropolitan areas, smaller towns with an urban mentality—plagued, to be sure, with the systems and traditional problems and images, but trying to carry the South into the mainstream of American and rural life, and yet encumbered with problems ushered in by the forces of urbanization and technological change. This is the face that we recognize. This is the face that is represented here in this conference—a face of black men and women struggling to emancipate the region from its traditional backwardness and its traditional images. One gentleman from Portsmouth, Va., last night said to me that the South will rise again, but it will be rising with the leadership of black people and rising with a new kind of image and not in terms of the old kind of image.

But we can not suggest that with all the progress that apparently is being made that there is a continuance of that second face. And that is of the old order—the face of racism, segregation, discrimination, anti-unionism, down with the federal government, preservation of the status quo, agrarianism, and a Communist under every rock and stone. It is the face of rural-dominated legislatures, ultra-conservative representatives in the U. S. Congress, low-wage industry, the faces of George Wallace and Lester Maddox, and the faces of hungry children and poverty as established by recent reports. These are the forces or the issues that black elected officials must recognize.

At the same time I recognize the fact that many of America's problems today are not regional in character.

Certainly they do not carry the regional thrust of a few years ago.

We know, for example, that the South's problems, like the nation's problems, are basically urban problems. Only a few years ago the South's problems were mostly rural, and those of the rest of the nation were basically urban. Race relations problems were a few years ago confined to the South because overwhelming proportions of black Americans lived in the South. But today the problems of Southern job-seekers, income recipients, housing tenants, school children, the problems of those who pursue welfare rights and quality education, the problems of those who seek health improvement and relief from hunger and malnutrition—they have only limited differences in the South than those Americans in other regions.

The solutions certainly have lost some of their regional character. Since World War II Southern progress economically, politically and socially and in race relations has been directly tied to national programs, national policy and national trends. It is for this reason that I question the whole concept of grants to states and the whole concept of the reversal to states' rights. Recent economic gains in the South and improvements in employment and so forth, these have been directly tied to the national force of economic and political power.

It may appear irrelevant for a conference of this sort to deal with problems of people in the South in a regional context at this point in our history. But the South does have problems peculiar to the region. Its politics, its economics, its race relations and its history—these are all peculiar to the region.

One of the great differences between the South and other regions today is what I believe to be a realistic kind of opportunity—an opportunity for the South, even at this late hour, to avoid the mistakes of the North in favor of building up in its society a generating force of participation by all its citizens. To me this is the great significance of the conference here today. One of the great challenges to black elected officials is recognition of a role that the Negro elected official must play in building up a society capitalizing upon the fact that there may be an opportunity here for the South not to make the mistake of the North and build into rigidity a housing segregation, etc. that the North is plagued with today.

While the South's history is laden with scars of demogogic politics—agrarianism, demeaning race relations and a history of the severest kinds of racial dualism and hate—it is also a history of black and white poverty existing side-by-side and a peculiarity of less-than-rigid distribution of population by race, within cities and within rural areas. Strange as it may seem, the data will suggest that urbanization, for example, has not developed in the South as it has in other regions. In spite of the farm mechanization and the displacement of many people from farms by farm mechanization, the technology is still relatively novel in its impact on Southern non-agricultural industry.

We began by talking about the region, the place that's being represented here. It has made several strides in the areas of unemployment, per capita income and the like. It has made great strides in the area of politics. (As I understand, there are 385 black elected officials in the states that represented the Old Confederacy, the highest degree of concentration of legally elected public officials than anywhere else in the nation. I would say we need more. The most important thing is for the black elected officials who are in office today to recognize this goal and help to get others to be a part of this participation.) There are several things that have influenced this kind of progress. One has been the development of national policy to promote full employment to combat poverty, and so forth. Two, the part of national policy to combat racial discrimination and segregation through schools and hospitals and employment and voter registration and voting.

It's on this second point that I am concerned. I have yet to see in the South, in spite of the positions of our black elected officials, the kind of initiation of public policy legislation which really brings the problem and the solution from the national level to some of our local and state levels. It seems to me that we have just about gotten what we are going to get from national policy; and if the Cabinet that was appointed last night is any criteria, then I'm quite sure that we have gotten just about all we are going to get for the next few years. It means, in other words, that rather than being passive as elected officials and responding and reacting to legislation introduced by others, the great challenge we have for the black elected officials today is to take the initiative and introduce this legislation formulating the public policy, pushing it, riding it, and making these policies known to their constituents.

Number three is the forces of the redistribution of the Negro population. Now these and other kinds of things and work will continue to influence public change and they will continue to influence public employment.

Now let me just mention one thing here which I think is extraordinarily important and which I think we live with every day and which I think is the kind of a thing which we can get our hands on pretty quickly in terms of effecting public policy for ourselves. I mentioned population redistribution. I also mentioned that the South has had what I call less-than-rigid distribution of the population by race, particularly when it comes to housing. Now I didn't say there was no segregation in housing—I didn't say that. I simply said it was less than rigid. This is a very serious problem. Local, regional political leadership must deal with it. Now cities like Houston with its third ward and fifth ward, Atlanta with its Southwest section—these have long had rather rigid housing segregation. But most Southern rural towns and rural areas and urban areas have not been rigid in this respect.

Through urban renewal and construction of new expressways, more and more citizens now in the South have built—have in fact planned and engineered development of—racial ghettos and race lines in terms of housing and citizenry. The negative aspects of this passage, in my judgment, will far outweigh any positive impact that has been proved. Consequently, whereas school desegregation could have been dealt with as easy to come by in many areas of the South, insofar as residential patterns were concerned, it is more and more repeated by concentration of public housing, housing developments and single-family dwellings in racial enclaves and racial ghettos. Any elected official who sits up and watches this go by without trying to do something relative to it has missed the boat, and I believe this is only one example of the kind of problem we face in urban circles and in smaller rural farms. And to it black elected officials must address themselves.

Negroes are going to continue to move to the urban areas. It is projected that by 1975, 72 per cent of the Southern brothers and sisters will be in urban cities and towns.

The rise of racial ghettos in the Southern region should be a matter of concern to all of us. And yet I recognize that two parts of this most of us have been able to capitalize on on one hand—and how it hurts us on the other hand. For example, many of you here would not have been elected to public office had it not been for the racial ghetto. And I recognize the power of politics within the racial ghetto. This is an educated kind of opportunity. It presents a greater kind of opportunity for greater political participation. And indeed it represents perhaps a new kind of opportunity for political leadership in our cities, including mayors of cities and towns. But it also means on the positive side the things that black elected officials recognize as the cities become more concentrated with the brothers and sisters: that the problems of poverty and progress are mounting. We must understand that issues will become more important to the brothers and sisters than personality. This will become more important then to the black constituency as they feel the pressures that must accompany the higher degree of concentration of people in a small area.

In sum, at this point what I'm trying to say is that we in this region know the South has made a lot of gains, and they've made them on all sides. Then we know that civil rights gains have benefitted all black Americans one way or another. But despite these gains in the South and despite the gains and improvements among Negro Americans, there are several things I want to cite just to keep you reminded of the fact that we've got a long way to go before we reach the kind of parity with the larger part of the population that we ought to have.

The South continues to be the most depressed area in the economy. Per capita income, for example, in the region is less than three-fourths that of the rest of the nation. Eighty-five per cent of the 200 most poverty-stricken counties in the United States are located in the South. And I don't have to add that these are heavily populated by black people.

A recent report by the Citizens Board of Inquiry indicated that 242 of the 256 counties in the country which were in the hunger count were located in 13 Southern states. And these are the very states and counties, I might add, where congressmen and senators work most effectively to block policies designed to feed the hungry and to alleviate the poverty—while they also promote agriculture and other policies to lower the amount of production and drive people off the farms and out of rural areas to the cities so they can fill their pockets with $13,000 worth of payments from the taxpayers' pockets in Soil Bank and other kinds of payments designed to promote agricultural development. You know who I am talking about from the state of Mississippi, Sunflower County, who gets $13,000 a month not to produce while people are going starving right there in his county.

I'm saying here that these issues cannot be dealt with just on the basis of personality. We must come to grips with the hard issues that affect the people's stomachs, their lives, their schooling, their health and their liberties of life. The kind of thing I've just described, incidentally, is what some people call free enterprise for the poor and socialism for the rich. It was what was said about Mr. Nixon's Black Capitalism.

Negroes in the South—in Atlanta, Birmingham, places like Sunflower County, Issaquena County—on the average only earn 43 per cent of what Negroes in the North earn. Whites in the South, on the other hand, earn about 75 per cent of what whites in the North earn. The region continues to lag in education, and Negroes bear the brunt of that lag. Negroes in the South still constitute the largest and most depressed group of the nation's population.

Finally, many elements of traditional race relations persist in the South. And there are many industries and plants with all-white work forces, and these are the rule rather than the exception. We find it in our banks and our insurance companies and in communications and in radio, television and newspapers.

We've heard a great deal about the urban crisis—the crisis of our cities. One of the most obvious consequences of the concentration of black Americans in central cities is the increased difficulty in taking them out of poverty.

I would argue at this point that the thing that black elected officials must take seriously is the development of a carefully conceived body of political strategy for the Negro electorate in the South. Colleges and universities have failed miserably in providing that body of strategy, the framework of the strategy for black elected officials. But somebody is going to have to do that.

Political fortunes that have come to Negroes up to this point have come in spite of themselves more than because of political astuteness. Now, I don't mean to be indicting people—I am indicting myself as well. But I suspect that it is because of the terror of the racial ghetto, more than political astuteness, that we have been able to come by some of the political fortunes that are manifested by the group assembled here today. And while most of this strategy is applicable to all races, strategy in different situations can evolve from general principles.

For example, politics among Negroes in Atlanta is almost wholly—and I would say about 99.9 per cent—oriented toward personality. Now, a certain amount of politics is always going to play a role. In my view, Atlanta desperately needs issue-oriented politics. Anybody who knows the city of Atlanta knows what personalities do here.

The issues are clear. They are found in the poverty of our black people. They are found in our manpower inadequacies. They are found in the quality of our ghetto schools. They are found in the related services to the poor. The issues are found in the inadequacy of the grievance procedures, in the inability of people to reach certain aspects of the city government. The issues are found in the lack of consumer protection and programs. They are found in the nth degree. The issues are found in the destitution of families and children.

That brings us to the future.

We must re-examine the strategy of racial blocs. I'm not too sure but that in the near future we can rely upon racial solidarity. Now we may have a slight difference of view here, but we can rely on racial solidarity as a vehicle to accomplish our goals. This is particularly true as the two-party system in the South gains strength. That doesn't mean for a moment that I'm saying tomorrow we're going to come together when it comes to a political issue involving race. I don't think we can. But how about someone to enlighten us to the possibilities of the two-party structure and legitimate two-party structures to provide settings for the ways to proceed on racial issues? I think this strategy will have to work. I feel that the question of issues, personality politics and coalition politics also must deal with the question of the role of racial blocs. I'm simply citing this as a matter that has to be dealt with.

I was very interested in the Cabinet and the appointments made by President-elect Richard Nixon as I was visiting last night in Washington. It was said earlier that if these appointments are any criteria of what is to come, then Negroes really must come to grips with the question of strategy, because we may be in for a period of standstill in politics, insofar as national leadership is concerned. Mr. Nixon appointed a Cabinet with no Negroes, no members of the Jewish faith, no ethnic representation, and obviously pretty close to the white Anglo-Saxon principle.

The only appeal that I heard regarding the brothers and sisters by the incoming administration has been the call for black capitalism. I have studied Black Capitalism. I'm not really too sure what Mr. Nixon is asking with his Black Capitalism, but I can assure him and I can assure you and I can assure everybody else that even Black Capitalism would be of little use to the masses of New York who need help. For we want and I want all the black businesses, everybody I can get. I want all the black entrepreneurs. I want them in Harlem and I want them on Fifth Avenue in New York City, not just on Hunter and Auburn Streets in Atlanta, but at Five Points. It is an illusion to think that this approach (Black Capitalism) will transform the lives of the millions of black brothers and sisters whose lives need transforming and restitution to a reasonably normal standard of living.

I was very interested in the new representative from Mississippi, Mr. Robert Clark. He said what has happened is that Mr. Nixon did not go into the Negro community, he did not campaign, he did not seek the Negro vote, he made no effort to get it; he made it by his attitude. He said what this meant to him, if I read it correctly, is that Negroes are left out and they will be left out of what's going to happen.

Now I hope we're all wrong on this—and obviously we are not trying to prejudge completely. But the fact is that we're going to talk about political strategy on the national scene. The brothers and sisters have had to depend upon the national scene to effect the policies and the things by which we could get things done at the local scene. If we lose a hold on the national scene, if they sort of look at us as being on the periphery and not an integral part of the pursuit of the mainstream, then we've got to really re-think the strategy. And I don't think this can be done on an ad hoc basis. I don't think this can be done with people going in so many different ways. Perhaps it becomes incumbent on those who are assembled here to try to come up with the kind of things that might have meaning in this respect.

It seems to me that most political strategy—and the strategy that has caused the dynamics in urban and rural life contrary to where we thought we were just about five years ago—must continue to recognize the dynamics of race relations as a continuing and central factor in the life and order and growth and development of our people. Racial attitudes and practices continue to be factors conditioning one-third to one-half the population. Now, I say that because of the second point I want to make about this strategy: It seems to me that we must keep in mind that we are not at the point where we can abandon racial and color consciousness under the facade of color blindness. Even some of the black brothers and sisters who got elected to office right here say, I'm going to represent all of the people. That's fine. You just keep in mind that those who elected you 99 per cent of the time were black.

Secondly, you must keep in mind the fact that you must be responsive to and responsible to a color-conscious society. And it seems to me that for any black elected official to go around and say "I'm elected by all the people" without also adding "I'm going to give some special attention to the black brothers and sisters," he's going on the wrong track. I say this hoping at the same time we continue to pursue with all dignity a color-blind society.

Even the white elected officials now are always talking about, "I want to pursue this without regard to race, creed or color." Now you know that too many injustices have been heaped upon the black brothers and sisters under a color-conscious institution of racial segregation for us to expect the consequences of those injustices to be erased under a scheme of color blindness. And I've been so careful of telling you of color consciousness as a political strategy, and it must necessarily underride the strategy of Negro elected officials.

Now, I'm not a black nationalist. I'm not a Black Power advocate according to the rhetoric and slogans that you hear now. I want to be sure to be clear on that. But I am arguing here that for the forseeable future color consciousness must be part of our political strategy and our urban strategy.

What we have found in the last few years in the lives of black people appears to be a conflict in goals in race relations. And that conflict revolves around survival of racial separatism as a goal, as a philosophy and as a strategy vis-à-vis racial integration. Objectives concentrating on the development of economic and political power among black people are objectives that aren't new.

We started a group in Madison some years ago called Eagleton County Independent Political Party, and one of the first things we did back there was say it would be all Negro. That was in 1961. And we said to our white friends, we've got a role for you but not right now. The point is, there was nothing new about the building of economic and political power for the Negro. We developed a high sense of black self-respect. These were all verbal objectives.

But this does not mean building black racism. This does not mean that we have got to build hate. This does not mean that we have got to go off trying to build, as a matter of strategy, separate societies. What it does say to me is that Negro life and institutions need to be strengthened, not for separatism but for the purpose of achieving intelligent integration and maximizing contributions to the total of our pluralistic and multi-racial and democratic society. Indeed, as W. E. B. DuBois said many years ago, only when black people and white people, and black institutions and white institutions, can accept one another and interact with one another and be interwoven as part of each other's operation, respecting each other for his worth as an individual and not on the basis of color, will democracy in this country be subjected to a true test and have its opportunity to be achieved.

It is desirable that black institutions be strengthened, but not for the purpose of establishing some mystique called Black Power or for the purpose of creating black racism. They should be strengthened for the purpose of achieving a rightful place in a pluralistic society, a rightful place in a multi-racial society. You see, I'm going to have my cake and eat it too. Not only am I unwilling to abandon the goals associated with racial integration—at the same time, I reject the idea of apartheid. I also am not in favor of abandoning Negro institutions; because I believe pursuit of a democratic and interracial society is the only one that counts, and it will not be achieved without strong Negro institutions as part of that society.

I would caution those who call for even a limited separatism that this is a dangerous course. Yet somehow this still has a relevance in pursuit.

I am deeply disturbed as a president of a college over our failure to work effectively in servicing black elected officials. I have received in my office on several occasions requests from elected officials throughout the South asking for help in developing policy positions, examining the literature, examining bills, trying to help them get through to commissioners; and I have been at a loss as to how I could effectively do this within the amount of time that I have had. And yet for some reason or other I have been able to stay up at night and do some of these things to help the brothers and sisters.

We've started at Clark College what we call the Southern Center for Studies in Public Policy. We received a grant the other day for almost $200,000 to develop this center, and it has several projects. The idea is to provide some services to the brothers and sisters. Hopefully that service center and the others that are going to be established in various places in the South will be able to provide a resource whereby the black elected officials and others might call to get the kind of help they need in order to be effective in the kinds of things I've been trying to describe.

I'm going to close by simply repeating a prayer Dr. Martin Luther King used to offer on many occasions, because I think it says much about what I've tried to say here. He said: "Lord, we ain't what we've got to be, we ain't what we want to be, we ain't what we are going to be; but thank God, we ain't what we used to be."

CONFERENCE

'...America's Last Hope...'

James Mays, president of the student body at Clark College, welcomed Mayor Richard Hatcher to the college campus when he spoke at a public forum there Dec. 12. Hatcher is mayor of Mays' hometown, Gary, Ind.

Perhaps one of the tragedies of the masses of black people in the United States today is the lack of information concerning the history of their black leaders. Going through a Negro history book recently, I was amazed at the things about black politicians during the Reconstruction following the Civil War that I had never heard of. For instance, how many of us knew that at one time a black man was governor of the state of Louisiana or that from 1870 to 1901, 22 Negroes served in the Congress of the United States or of the many, many black people who served in their respective state legislatures?

All of this occurred during what we call the "old" Reconstruction, but now we speak of the "new" Reconstruction in which we are currently involved. But the sad fact is that even though we are involved in a type of political reconstruction, some of us as black students (perhaps because we so seldom see the face of a black politician in the news) still do not seem to want to become involved in the world of politics. In fact, it now seems fashionable to be as anti-government as possible. If there is a new political reconstruction going on among black people, most black students don't seem to be aware of it, or if they are aware of it, they appear to want no part of it.

Being interested in law and politics myself, I have often tried to analyze this disinterest manifested by students I associate with. After a little discussion, the answer is quite apparent. The first question a student wants to ask when you ask him if he is aware of the "new" political reconstruction is: "What happened to the old one?" And when you answer this question for him, you begin to realize from where the roots of this political disenchantment have stemmed.

Checking the Negro history book again, we read:

> The downfall of the Negro-white governments of the South was inevitable since Negroes had few guns, little land, and less government protection. Organized violence was the main weapon of those who sought to restore the old order. Masked night riders such as the Ku Klux Klan sprang up everywhere to terrorize Negro voters and their white supporters. The main Klan targets were Negro officials, teachers, and successful farmers. In 1875, a tall, muscular Negro farmer had stood before Senator George Boutwell of Massachusetts and demanded that something be done about the continued murder of his people. He was considering killing the Klan leaders responsible, saying, "We could do it in a night." "No," answered the Senator, "We intend to protect you." The promise was never kept. For the black man and for the South the result was tragedy. The torch of democracy that had burned brightly for a short while was extinguished. And Southerners would live from that day until this in the darkness of tyranny, poverty, and ignorance.

This information was taken from a book called Eyewitness: The Negro in American History.

This little passage only tells part of the story of why, as I have learned, black students are disenchanted with the political system, per se.

Some of you are probably thinking: "Why don't you remind them that the Ku Klux Klan no longer carries on its reign of terror?" If I did, they would answer: "Maybe not, but there are so many more subtle ways of keeping the black man in his place that we still see politics executed from the black frame of reference as being futile." Then they would go on: "Witness what Georgia tried to do to Julian Bond, and look at what Congress did to Adam Clayton Powell—and to take it even closer to home, notice what they tried to do to your own Mayor Hatcher during his campaign."

The question, gentlemen, is this: Is this really a "new" reconstruction or is this the same old reconstruction with the same old ending, but with different variations? My fellow students have their doubts; and I don't blame them as I, too, to some degree, have my own doubts.

But if what is happening in the realm of politics for black people today is not a fraud, then it is up to you as our spokesmen and leaders to make this crystal clear. There is no one, I repeat, no one, who can do this for you.

When Stokely Carmichael stood here where I'm standing yesterday and told an auditorium-packed audience that the only answer to our problem in this country is for us to get our guns, I wondered if it was already too late. For many students, it is. For others of us, we're saying: "O.K., America, we're willing to give you one last chance. We're foolish enough to believe that this time you may possibly allow us to grow into and of your political system." For almost all of us, this is America's last and final chance.

As we go into our new presidential administration, I can already feel the wheels of the "new" reconstruction grinding to a halt. No black man was appointed to the new Cabinet. Maybe this is nothing to become alarmed about, but many of us seem to hear Stokely's words more and more clearly each time we face this type of setback.

What this means, gentlemen, is that you have your hands full. From a student's point of view, you are America's last hope. I do not believe that I can overemphasize that point. What you accomplish while you are in office will inevitably determine the destiny of this country.

'...Power of the People...'

Richard Gordon Hatcher, completing his first year as mayor of Gary, Ind., spoke Dec. 12 at a public forum at Clark College. The 34-year-old attorney and former city councilman is one of two black mayors of major U.S. cities. A native of Indiana and one of 13 children of a Michigan City factory worker, Hatcher was graduated from Indiana University and Valparaiso University School of Law.

When Stokely Carmichael shouted "Black Power, Black Power" in that Mississippi schoolyard, he performed the mythic function that some poet must always perform at the proper moment in history. He gave voice, he gave a name to a development in the life of Black America which was happening anyway and which needed naming so we could talk about it and think about it. I say he named it, rather than created it, because the movement towards Black Power, under other names, has had a long and honorable past. If it has become the dominant tone of our emotions and thoughts in the last two or three years, that is only because, like the proverbial snowball, the accretion of time and frustration has turned incipience into actuality, has made of the snowball an avalanche. I want, today, to look at these two words, "black" and "power," from the vantage point of a man who has had some connection with both words.

It is beyond dispute that I am black—I am too abashed to add "and beautiful," though it is tempting—and it is also a fact that I have held, for a year now, a position of at least a modicum of power. It is a good time, then, as the first year of my administration as mayor of Gary draws to a close, to examine what black power has meant to me.

My blackness has been the dominant fact of life's experience, as it is the dominant fact of the life of every black man in America, and perhaps in the world. James Baldwin, with his usual brilliance and cogency, describes the condition in his famous essay, "Stranger in the Village," in which he discusses his experience as a black man in a little Swiss village:

> For this village, even were it incomparably more remote and incredibly more primitive, is the West, the West onto which I have been so strangely grafted. These people cannot be, from the point of view of power, strangers anywhere in the world; they have made the modern world, in effect, even if they do not know it. The most illiterate among them is related, in a way that I am not, to Dante, Shakespeare, Michelangelo, Aeschylus, Da Vinci, Rembrandt, and Racine; the Cathedral at Chartres says something to them which it cannot say to me, as indeed would the Empire State Building, should anyone here ever see it. Out of their hymns and dances come Beethoven and Bach. Go back a few centuries and they are in their full glory—but I am in Africa, watching the conquerors arrive.

Because of the white man's rape of Africa, because of the ignominy of slavery, because of the long and barbarous history of segregation and discrimination, I am a stranger in this, the American village. Because white Americans have developed the ideology of racism to justify the sociological and historical experiences I have mentioned, I am a stranger in this country, in this village. But from another point of view, because I am a man, because I have been reared on the words, though not the facts, of Christianity and democracy, I am also an inhabitant, and in a strange sort of way a citizen, of the village.

Much of the history of Black America is dominated precisely by this contradiction. We have been told one thing—democracy, freedom, "We hold these truths to be self evident, that all men are created equal." We have lived quite another—slavery, the Ku Klux Klan, white liberals so concerned with black people that they will tell them exactly what they ought to want, schools that don't teach us, promises from the Supreme Court which turn to ashes in strikes against Ocean Hill-Brownsville in New York. That is why we have been forced to fall back on our own resources. For you cannot be a stranger always. To be continuously strange is to pay a psychological price so great that no people can endure it forever. When Black America, then, turns to blackness, to what in Africa has for a long time been called "negritude," we have no apologies to make.

From the time I was a little child, before I ever heard of Othello, or, for that matter, Shakespeare—I knew I was black. No wonder, then, that as a grown man I must turn to the words of Leopold Senghor, the black African poet from Senegal, or to those of Langston Hughes or Arna Bontemps or Leroi Jones or Gwendolyn Brooks. From the time I was a little child—before I ever heard of Beethoven or Bach—I knew I was black. No wonder, then, that I turn to Jimi Hendrix and Aretha Franklin, and that I recall with anger the black American symphony conductor Dean Dixon, who had to go abroad to practice his art. From the time I was a child—before I ever heard of Paul Bunyan or George Washington or Jaques Danton—I knew I was black. No wonder then, that as a grown man I turn to John Henry, Jomo Kenyatta and W. E. B. DuBois.

I will stop being a stranger, because I will recall that, though a stranger in this village, I have lived there nonetheless, and I have a history there, and elsewhere, as in Africa, and that history will make me less the stranger. We assert what we are, and we may wear a dashiky and look with favor on a "natural." Being ourselves will make us less the stranger. We tried being like the so-called natives, and were not allowed to be like them, and so we must turn to our own resources. Baldwin says,

> The black man insists, by whatever means he finds at his disposal, that the white man cease to regard him as an exotic rarity and recognize him as a human being.

So my experience with the word black is that of all black people. Being black has made me a stranger; being black has dominated my life. I cannot, nor would I wish to reject my blackness, and so I turn what the white world has attempted make a handicap precisely into its opposite. Black America is fortunate in that our history and culture are more than rich enough so we can find in blackness an advantage, a source of pride, a way to end our estrangement.

But there is another side to this. Even though I may find in negritude and in black culture a way not to be so strange any longer, especially strange to myself, that is not enough. For my estrangement has also included my powerlessness. I have not only been a stranger in the village, but I have also been a stranger without power. There are times in history when strangers have had sufficient power to keep themselves at least supplied with the necessaries for decent living. This has been true of many who came as strangers to American shores, as, after a generation or so, the Irish, the Italians, what have you. It has not been the case with black Americans. We have been kept strangers, in part at least, because our strangeness has provided the others, white Americans, I mean, with a cheap source for the sawing of wood and the drawing of water. Because black people have had no power, because the ideology of racism has permitted white Americans to think it natural, we have been exploited and used, deprived of the minimum wherewithal for a decent life, have provided the nation with back-breaking and menial labor, and sometimes with its best brains, all for the aggrandizement and enrichment of others.

That is why pride in being black is not enough for our survival. That is why we have increasingly had to turn our attention to a means of wresting from the majority not only a new perception of our humanity, but also a new place in the nation, so that we can enforce our demands for the satisfacion of our needs.

This is nothing new. The African chief Cinque sought power when he led a mutiny on the slave ship Amisted in 1839. Nat Turner is quite explicit when he says that the reason for his revolt is so that he can strike terror into the hearts of the planters and thus have the power to establish a black community in the Dismal Swamp. Toussaint L'Ouverture knew about the need for power, and so did, in more recent history, such often unheeded thinkers as W. E. B. DuBois and Paul Robeson, or, for that matter, Marcus Garvey. There is nothing new in the search for power by black Americans. What is new, perhaps, is that our search has been intensified because we have combined pride in being black with that search for power, and that we have found, in various stages of our experience, that power shared with the white majority doesn't seem to work.

Power means, quite simply, a force strong enough so you can get whatever it is you need. Let me recall that in the last two decades or so we have tried all sorts of ways of achieving power.

The Brown decision by the U.S. Supreme Court concerning equal education represented an effort to use the power of the courts to win needed improvements in the lives of black children. We won that skirmish, but we have discovered, almost 15 years later, that there was not enough strength in the power of the courts to guarantee any fundamental change in the education of black children. Legal power, which helped a little, did not help enough.

Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. tried another form of power. Beginning with the Montgomery Bus Boycott of 1955, Dr. King tried with all of his skill and dedication—indeed, he gave his life for it—to use the nonviolent power of black masses to achieve their needs. An eloquent man, he said it much better than I can hope to do. Writing in Liberation in 1959, Dr. King said:

> There is more power in socially organized masses on the march than there is in guns in the hands of a few desperate men. . . . All American history teaches us that like a turbulent ocean beating great cliffs into fragments of rock, the determined movement of people incessantly demanding their rights always disintegrates the old order. . . . This is the social lever which will force open the door to freedom. Our powerful weapons are the voices, the feet, and the bodies of dedicated, united people, moving without rest toward a just goal.

This, too, was a form of black power, though we did not then call it such. But this form of power, in and of itself, we also found not adequate to our needs. Nine years after he had written those words, Dr. King had fallen to the white assassin's bullet. Nine years after he had written those words, though segregation was a little less blatant in the South, though more black people had found their way to the voting booth in the South, the bulk of Black America, living in the horror of the crowded, fire trap-haunted ghettos of the North, had not advanced two inches. This society, it would appear, was not prepared to yield easily to the needs of Black America, and so the search for a lever, for an effective means of achieving power, had to go on.

We learned something else at this point, taught by Malcolm X and Leroi Jones and H. Rap Brown and Eldridge Cleaver. We learned that when the stranger allies himself with the so-called natives, to return to Baldwin's metaphor, it is very hard for the stranger to play anything but a secondary role. In the many struggles black Americans carried on together with white people, we found all too often that well-meaning whites nevertheless conceived of us as strangers, assigned to us the role of strangers in our own struggle. Thus, well-meaning white people knew what was good for us—better than we did. They knew what our feelings about things ought to be—better than we did. I say that many of these men and women were well-meaning white people, because history records that they worked very hard and often sacrificed a good deal for our causes. I cannot forget that it was a white Goodman and Schwerner who died along with black James Chaney in the red dirt of Mississippi. But it takes nothing away from their heroism or dedication to say that they were always, willingly or not, the natives, and we were always the strangers.

To stop being strangers, we had to find the road to power ourselves. Whether or not one fully accepts other aspects of the thought of Franz Fanon, it is clear that rising black consciousness requires that we be led by our own, determine our own destiny, recognize our own needs, and that white Americans have quite another task to perform—perhaps an impossible one—which is to work to cure the sickness of racism among their own people, to work on changes needed in the total society, which affect everyone who lives within it.

Efforts at achieving power in various forms, combined with the rising tide of black self-confidence, then, bring us to the heart of the problem faced by Black America today, and to the heart of the problem about which this conference is deliberating, and to the heart of my own problems as a man who has achieved some modicum, as I have said, of power. It is clear that pride in blackness, and all that this implies, from a revival of black history and other Afro-American studies, to a new appreciation of the beauty of our women, to being led on the road to a better life by black leaders, is an absolute necessity if we are to end our status as strangers. This we are beginning to do. We have not yet, however, solved the riddle as to what lever or levers can provide the power we need to wrest a better way of life from the power structure within the total society. We have a number of options, and I would like to discuss a few of these now, including the one about which I am most knowedgeable.

One option is, of course, to leave, to return not only spiritually but physically to the lands of our African heritage.

No doubt some will choose that solution, but it cannot be a solution for most of us. There are physical problems as to where such a massive migration would go, and cultural ones stemming from our distance from African cultures. But there are also other aspects. We own a good part of these United States—not physically, but morally. Our sweat has gone to make the railroads run and to make cotton king. Our brains helped building Washington, D.C., and made heart transplants possible. Our talents have helped enrich the music, the stage, the poetry of the nation. Our blood has been shed in too many wars—including the fiasco in which we are now engaged. So we have a great investment in this nation, one we ought not to be forced to give up. Our power ought to give us our rightful share in what we have wrought. Therefore, I for one choose not to leave.

There is another approach. We can demand a piece of the nation for ourselves. We can demand five or six states as the territory for a black nation, or we can carve out the old ghetto in each city as our own turf. This has possibilities, and it has been explored by many thinkers both black and white, including so thoughtful a man as W. H. Ferry, the vice-president of the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions. Ferry writes, in the Saurday Review of June 15, 1968:

> But what Blacktown most wants, Whitetown cannot confer. Blacktown wants independence and the authority to run its own affairs. It wants to recover its manhood, its self-love, and to develop its ability to conduct a self-reliant community. . . . A successful plan for coexistence (that is, between Blacktown and Whitetown, to use Ferry's terms —I continue to quote) will not bring Utopia into being in Blacktown. Autonomous, interdependent Blacktown will be no better and no worse than other parts of the urban scene. Blacks can be expected to exploit blacks, even as whites exploit whites. There will be quarrels and walkouts and demonstrations and the inevitable ambiguities about leaders and leadership. . . . Whitetown will be accused of parsimony and trying to control things even if it enters into the scheme of coexistence with the best possible intent. . . . So the vision of coexistence is not that of the New Jerusalem, nor is it that of a national community struggling with the untenable doctrines of integration. It is a vision of a new federalism that will give 10 per cent of our citizens the chance they are seeking to make whatever they want to make of themselves, their culture, and their community.

I do not reject this form of power either on moral grounds, or on grounds of feasibility. But I have not seen any evidence within this society that Black America can get such communities without first achieving the tremendous power necessary to force them into existence. The white power structure which pinches pennies from Model Cities plans and Headstart programs will not readily give up control of major sections of New York, Chicago and Los Angeles. The slumlords who live in pretty suburbs on the profits they make from hellholes in the ghetto will not turn their hovels over to other owners for the asking. Blacktowns are intriguing, but they beg the question; for we must, should we decide we want them, first find the power to get them.

There is also the power of violence, in direct opposition to the kind of power Dr. King sought to use. I do not wish here to discuss this form of power—and that it certainly is—from an ethical point of view, though that is surely a matter for consideration. Rather I want to ask about the efficacy of the use of street violence, about its ability to achieve results.

Like it or not, violence cannot readily be dismissed as a source of power. It is true beyond dispute that the white section of the nation sat up and listened hard when it heard the fire engines race to Hough and Watts and Harlem and Chicago's West Side. But I am afraid that, to date, this form of power has also not paid off very much. White America talks better about what it ought to do, in the wake of one of these insurrections—but such talk has been around for a long time, and is hardly new. In fact, all that street violence has provided so far is more white talk and burned-over ghettos. The Kerner Report is a nice piece of rhetoric, which has not fed one black mouth. I do not reject violence out of hand then, but I have yet to see how it becomes a useful lever for power.

Let me turn finally to the kind of power I know the most about, that is, political power in cities of large black populations. I think it clear, in the first place, that my election as mayor of Gary has done something for Gary's black community in so far as its pride and sense of self is concerned. While we may still be strangers in our village, it surely makes us feel less strange that one of us has been chosen to head the village government. Furthermore, this fact guarantees that local efforts will be made so that we will not be exploited quite so mercilessly, that our people will get their share of whatever they have coming, to the extent that anything is available.

But right there is the rub. I may be mayor of Gary, but I cannot, by that token, guarantee that black people will share in the unbelievable profits of the U.S. Steel Corporation which dominates our city's economic life. I am mayor of Gary, but I cannot stop a war in Vietnam which drains the national treasury to such an extent that only very limited programs are available to the city for the reconstruction of its black community. I am mayor of Gary, and I was elected as a Democrat, but I am not able to sway the white Democratic Party so that it will reverse the present trend of national priorities and make the needs of black communities first on the list. I am mayor of Gary, but I cannot change the fact that our schools are too poorly funded, from state or nation or even local sources of revenue, to provide the catch-up educational process that the city needs in order to bring our black youngsters up to educational standards.

I want to confide a further problem to you. I am mayor of Gary, and thus I am mayor of all the people of the city, and I would like to do my best for all of them, black or white. But you know, what I cannot do for my black brothers, I cannot do for white people either, try as I might. Though the black community's needs are infinitely greater, the white community in our city is not without problems. But for the same reasons which prevent me from solving many black problems, I cannot solve many white ones, either—and neither could my white predecessors. Though I have some local political power, it becomes clearer to me that this is not enough, and that the power structure of this society is not prepared to give up enough of its profits to solve the problems of city living—for whites or blacks. Though black kids in Gary are badly educated, white ones are not getting nearly what they should, either. Though black communities are devoid of parks and play spaces, white communities do not have adequate park facilities either.

There are, rumor has it, a few white people in Gary who wish to disaffiliate from the municipality a predominantly white section of the city because they "don't like what's going on in City Hall." It seems that, while they were able to stomach the jailing of several earlier mayors for one form or another of municipal corruption, they just can't abide whatever it is that a black mayor is doing, though not one has accused him of appropriating for himself one dishonest penny. But I would warn these white citizens that disaffiliation will not solve one single problem for them—except perhaps their hurt racial pride. For the fact of the matter is that the local political lever for power, black or white, can only do very limited things, that it cannot really solve the problems faced by the American city until the entire power structure is in some way forced to yield up to the people—first to black people, but eventually to all the people—what the people need and deserve.

The question of power, it becomes more and more apparent, cannot be left at the level of parochial power. Black Power, whatever its form—political, non-violent confrontation, street riots or terror—may help us to feel less the stranger; but it will not eliminate poverty, or inadequate educational facilities, or slum housing, or provide us even a portion of the economic control of the life of the nation. Even if it were possible to establish the blacktowns that Ferry talks about, black people would not have control over the basic economic, foreign policy or social welfare priority decisions which will determine the welfare of black people as well as whites. Blacktowns might make us feel better—and that is terribly important and so I do not reject such ideas —but they will not make us live better.

And what is true of Black Power is also true of other forms of group power. Our campuses, for example, have seen a demand for student power which has a great deal of legitimacy.

Surely students ought to play a much larger role in the life of the university, which is their community for four or more years. But student power will not, by itself, change the national system of priorities in which education runs far behind spending for super-weapons of destruction, in which drafting young men for war is more important than letting them continue their studies beyond a bachelor's degree so that they can apply their knowledge to the alleviation of human suffering. Student power, like Black Power, like youth power, like other parochial forms of power, can only achieve very limited gains.

Where does this leave us? Am I rejecting the drive for Black Power? Am I hopelessly saying that nothing we may do can be of use? The answer is a clear and decisive No! The drive for Black Power is an essential, it seems to me a no longer debatable need; for it will help to end our strangeness in the village, and that is absolutely necessary. So I support all forms of Black Power which will help Black America to define itself, to recapture its heritage, to assert its abilities, to realize its most immediate demands.

It is not immodest on my part to say that Gary's black children will be richer and stronger human beings for the knowledge that one of their own can govern the city, for the knowledge that their mothers and fathers were able to get themselves together enough to elect one of their own and thus assert their dignity. Nor is it immodest to say that Gary's black community is being given, for the first time in its history, some of the attention and concern which it so richly deserves, and that the lives of black men and women will be somewhat the better for it. These are among the things which Black Power can and ought to and must do.

But beyond that, if I look to the alleviation of our poverty and the improvement of our standard of life, logic compels me to place hope in the eventual coming-together of the demands for power by people of many sorts. I see hope in the rising tide of student militancy, if that militancy is carried, in time, from the campuses into the communities of the entire nation. I see hope in the demands of Spanish-speaking Americans for their share of power. I see hope in the growing radicalism of the young, who demand youth power and are no longer content to accept a dehumanized status quo. I see our only hope for a decent society in the coming together sometime in the future, of all these demands for partial and parochial power into a total demand for people power.

I do not pretend to be very hopeful. The experiences of Black America with other segments of our society have most often been disappointing. Perhaps they will be again. But I am certain that the only way to rescue our lives from the poverty for some, the alienation for all which are its hallmarks, is by the combination of the kinds of people power I have been talking about. Should that fail, what lies before us is chaos and dark nights of despair and destruction. The leaven in such a rising power cake must be, and already is to some extent, Black Power, for Black America has the least to lose, and the most to gain, by its assertion of power.

In the essay I have already quoted, Baldwin concludes with the following:

> No road whatever will lead Americans back to the simplicity of this European village where white men still have the luxury of looking on me as a stranger. I am not, really, a stranger any longer for any American alive. One of the things that distinguishes Americans from other people is that no other people has ever been so deeply involved in the lives of black men, and vice versa. . . . It is precisely this black-white experience which may prove of indispensable value to us in the world we face today. This world is white no longer, and it will never be white again.

That is what we hope America will realize as we achieve more and more the power which our blackness demands. If we try to save ourselves, if we achieve the full potential of what Black Power can do, then it will be up to the rest of America, white, Spanish-speaking, student, youth, and so on and on, to join us in the establishment of the power of the people in a world in which none are strangers. If they fail, or if we fail, we may have no way left to live in this country. If they can succeed, and if we can succeed, if the people can wrest control from the hands of the economic overlords and the political self-servers, the rich and the powerful, then and only then do we have some hope that the good society can be ours.

One of the finest of our black poets, Margaret Walker, ends her poem "For My People," with a kind of incantation to the future. Let me cite it here, for her vision, the vision of a black woman who wrote these words more than a quarter of a century ago, still holds true:

> Let a new earth rise. Let another world be born.
> Let a bloody peace be written in the sky. Let a second generation full of courage issue forth; let a people loving freedom come to growth. Let a beauty full of healing, a strength of final clenching be the pulsing and the spirit in our blood. Let the martial song be written, let dirges disappear.
> Let a race of men now rise and take control.

A race of men, Margaret Walker says! For God's sake, for America's sake, let's get ourselves together!

'...Difficult Decisions Must Be Made...'

Alfred M. Pelham, chairman of Great Lakes Mutual Life Insurance Company in Detroit, appeared on a panel on "Revenue and Taxation and the Elected Official" Dec. 13. He is a former controller of the city of Detroit.

Before proceeding to any discussion of revenue and taxation, I believe it to be of utmost importance to emphasize the fact that the levy and collection of taxes and the collection of other forms of revenue and other income from whatever source constitute only one aspect of the responsibility and the problems which confront elected officials at every level of government. Of even greater importance are the judicious determination of the purposes for which available resources are to be expended, the selection of programs best calculated to accomplish these purposes, the best possible allocation of available resources to carry out these programs, and appropriate systems to assure that such resources are expended as effectively as possible for authorized and intended purposes.

In order to attain these ends, difficult decisions must be made and orderly operational programs must be carried out on the basis of carefully developed plans. It is obvious, therefore, that financial resources, while absolutely indispensable, constitute only one of the ingredients required for the effective and efficient conduct of government.

Another vital ingredient is a sound budgetary process. The word budget means different things to different people. In the simplest terms, a budget is a projected and reasonably flexible plan for the effective use of available resources for the accomplishment of one or more carefully defined future objectives. As a matter of fact, all of us, whether consciously or unconsciously, are almost constantly involved in the process of budgeting: budgeting of time, budgeting of space, budgeting of energy, and budgeting of money and other material resources.

In any case where available resources exceed the cost of all needed and desired services, formal budgeting might seem to be of less importance; but even in such a case effectual results would almost certainly depend upon carefully planned usage of such resources. Whenever, on the other hand, there are many demands on limited resources, the processes of priority establishment and resource allocation must be utilized if anything approaching optimum resources is to be attained. Where the unit of government is small and the demands for service are few, the process of budgeting is not likely to prove too difficult even in the face of limited resources. For those charged with the responsibility of conducting the affairs of larger and more complex governmental units, an adequate budgetary system is absolutely essential. In every case, it is important to maintain complete accounting records in order to assure proper accountability for the expenditure of public funds.

The brief reference that I have made in the foregoing to program planning, evaluation, and selection and to the budgetary process has been included only in order to put the fiscal responsibility of elected officials in proper perspective. In-depth coverage of these other important aspects of financial management should be given consideration as the subject matter for future meetings of this group, since our attention today is to be focused primarily on revenue and taxation.

Before proceeding to the discussion of any specific taxes or other sources of revenue, certain general observations seem to be in order. In considering the levy of any new tax, or even in reviewing an existing tax structure, attention should be given to certain basic criteria, chief among which are: equitableness, productivity, flexibility, collectibility, and administrative feasibility.

Since the primary purpose of taxation is to provide essential revenue, it is obvious that the productivity of any tax is of great importance. When the extent of need for revenue has been established, the potential productivity of any tax or combination of taxes should be estimated as accurately as possible in order to predetermine whether the projected goal can be attained by the levy of such tax or taxes. It is further desirable that such tax or taxes be subject to upward or downward revision within reasonable limits in order to provide a degree of flexibility which may avoid the subsequent necessity for the levy of some new or additional tax.

Careful consideration should also be given to the factors of collectibility and administrative feasibility. Some apparently proper subjects for taxation pose problems of collectibility because of indicated difficulties in enforcement. In other cases, estimated costs of levy and collection constitute such a high percentage of potential yield as to make such taxes impracticable. In this area of concern, every effort should be made to avoid a multiplicity of different taxes, not only because of administrative problems and higher costs of collection, but also because too many different taxes are a nuisance to the tax-paying public.

The most important criterion in determining the use of any tax or combination of taxes should, in my judgment, be that of equitableness. An equitable tax structure might well be defined as one in which each person bore his or her fair share of the tax burden, or as one in which taxes were levied in accordance with ability to pay. It is obviously easier to define such a tax system than it is to attain it. There are wide differences of opinion as to what constitutes a fair share, and neither economists nor political scientists have been successful in satisfactorily measuring the limits of ability to pay.

However, despite the fact that there is no pat formula for attaining tax equity in designing a tax structure, in modifying an existing one, or in levying a new and additional tax, the best possible judgment should be used in attempting to make equitableness a primary consideration. This consideration, of course, should be extended to all, but with particular attention to those least able to pay and also to business and industry lest a too heavy tax burden result in a loss of potential job opportunities and a weakening of the economic base upon which the community depends for its existence. It should, perhaps, be mentioned at this point that certain types of taxes can be made more equitable by the appropriate use of exemptions.

Unfortunately, our present-day tax systems at every level of government have tended to grow by a series of patchwork additions from time to time as additional revenue was needed, with the result that by and large they are not equitable. In an article entitled "Who Really Gets Hurt by Taxes," which appeared in the December 9, 1968 issue of U. S. News and World Report, it is stated that the widely held idea that taxes in the U.S. "soak the rich and spare the poor" is erroneous, but rather that families with the lowest incomes tend to bear the heaviest tax burden in terms of ability to pay. While it is true that the graduated federal income tax takes a greater percentage of the income of those in the upper brackets, many other taxes make a bigger dent in the pocketbooks of lower income families.

The latter is particularly true of the payroll tax (Social Security), the property tax, and the sales tax. As an example, on Jan. 1, 1969 the payroll deduction for Social Security will be 4.8 per cent on earnings up to $7,800. Obviously everybody earning $7,800 or less will be paying 4.8 per cent of their earnings for this purpose; but because of the limit, those earning $12,000 will pay only 3.12 per cent of their total earnings, those earning $18,000 only 2.08 per cent, those earning $24,000 only 1.56 per cent, and so on down the line.

In the case of property taxes, according to the article referred to above, those making less than $7,000 a year pay six to eight cents out of each dollar of income, on average, whereas those in brackets above $25,000 average only 2 per cent of income for property taxes. It was further indicated that sales taxes take nearly a nickel out of every dollar earned by families in the lowest income brackets, as against a penny or two at the upper end of the income scale. It should be remembered that the above figures are based on nationwide averages and, therefore, that they may vary significantly between states and communities. In any event, the property tax and the sales tax tend to fall with heavier impact on those in the lower income brackets with relation to ability to pay, and yet state and local governments lean most heavily on those two taxes as major sources of tax revenue.

At the federal level, at least, increasing concern is currently being expressed relative to the heavy burden of taxation on low-income taxpayers; and many forms of possible relief are being tentatively proposed, such as increasing the income below which no federal income tax would have to be paid, reducing rates in the lowest income tax brackets, increasing the minimum standard deduction for expenses, increasing personal exemptions, giving tax credits for each personal exemption claimed by a low-income family, refunding Social Security taxes paid by low-income families, payment of "negative income taxes," etc. From time to time, studies have been conducted at both the state and local levels of government aimed at tax reform; but few, if any, of these have thus far resulted in any significant improvement of tax structures. Hopefully some of this good intent will soon be translated into action.

Although taxation provides the largest source of governmental revenue, there are many other potential sources of income including license fees; other fines, fees, and permits; income from sales of services; reimbursements for services performed; grants-in-aid; shared taxes, and other miscellaneous sources. These non-tax sources are utilized for a number of different reasons and, in some cases, a combination of reasons, such as:

1. To provide added revenue
2. To exercise control in the protection of health, public safety, property, etc.
3. To protect other public interests
4. To serve as a punitive measure
5. To secure total or partial reimbursement for certain services
6. To provide for intergovernmental cost sharing
7. To stimulate activity and improvement in respect to specified public services

In order that some of you who have had only limited experience in the field of public finance may get a better idea of the large number and great variety of potential tax and other revenue sources that are currently being utilized by state and local governments, you have or will be furnished with an outline of such sources. While fairly complete, it is not professed that it is inclusive of all such tax and revenue sources in use throughout the country. In some cases, comparable taxes may be levied in different governmental jurisdictions bearing entirely different names. I wish to make it very clear that, in presenting this outline, there is absolutely no intent on my part to suggest the use of any particular tax or combination of taxes. Local conditions, economic factors, and legal restrictions vary significantly between geographic areas and must, or should, be taken into consideration in the structuring or restructuring of any tax and revenue system.

At this point in time, practically all governmental units at every level are being confronted by the same dilemma-increasing demands for public services, sharply increasing costs, and an inadequate tax and revenue potential. In many cases, therefore, unless there is to be a sharp curtailment in these public services or a lessening in their quality and effectiveness, it seems (even after every reasonable effort has been made to improve efficiency) that increases in existing taxes, or the levy of some new and additional tax or taxes, or the seeking out of some alternate source of revenue is inevitable. Wherever and whenever this proves to be the case, it is of the utmost importance that the five basic criteria mentioned earlier in this discussion be given most careful consideration before any decision is made to change the tax structure.

Quite obviously time does not permit any attempt on my part to discuss each of the different tax sources that are listed on the outline to which I have made previous reference. In the question and answer period which I understand is to follow the presentation of your panelists, there will be an opportunity for you to ask about any of these in which you may have a particular interest. Two of them, however, the property tax and the sales tax—which are heavily depended upon by both state and local governments—deserve at least brief mention. Both of these taxes are productive and reasonably flexible, but both tend to place a disproportionate burden on taxpayers in the lowest income brackets, as has been previously pointed out.

The property tax is one of the oldest and most used among all taxes currently being levied. It does not pose any serious problem of collectibility, for, if there is a failure to pay, the tax becomes a lien upon the property in question. It is not a particularly easy tax to administer, for there is involved the necessity of separately assessing each individual parcel of property, of maintaining extensive tax and assessment rolls, of keeping property assessments accurate and up-to-date, of developing uniform assessment procedures, and of equalizing assessed valuations on a state or county-wide basis. The use of the property tax is further complicated in many jurisdictions by statutory and constitutional restrictions and by a large number of different provisions for complete or partial exemption. In some jurisdictions the property tax is also extended to personal property; and, in these cases, administration becomes even more difficult and problems of enforcement are introduced. Nonetheless, the property tax is apparently here to stay for at least the foreseeable future, and it is therefore important that it be administered as effectively and as equitably as possible.

There is considerable variation in the manner in which the sales tax is used by governmental agencies across the country. It can be made applicable to the sales of services, as well as the sales of commodities. It can be made applicable to all sales, or provision can be made for exemption on the sales of such commodities as fool, drugs and/or certain basic clothing items. In the latter case the administration of the tax, which normally poses few problems, becomes more difficult and complicated, particularly for those who collect the tax at the original source.

In conclusion, I wish to make brief reference to the financing of major capital projects such as the construction of public buildings, highways, water and sewer facilities, etc. In some cases and to a certain extent, capital improvements may be financed out of current revenue, which method is generally referred to as financing on a "pay-as-you-go" basis. This method has considerable merit and may prove desirable in the case of long-term capital programs which provide for large annual expenditures over a considerable number of years, as might be the case in an extended highway construction program.

More frequently, however, major capital projects which are expected to have a relatively long life are financed by the issuance of bonds. This method of financing is justified by the fact that, at least to some degree, it tends to spread the costs over the period of years during which the capital project will continue in use. In no case is it desirable that the payment of a bond issue extend for a period in excess of the estimated useful life of the capital improvement. It is, of course, possible to finance capital improvement programs by an appropriate combination of "pay-as-you go" and bond financing.

Bonds issued by states and local units of government fall into two general categories—full faith and credit bonds and revenue bonds. The former category, which involves a pledge of the full faith and credit of the particular governmental unit, is normally used in cases where the capital project will not generate any revenue or insufficient revenue to cover the debt service of the bond issue. In the case of capital projects in respect to which it can be demonstrated that sufficient revenue will be generated to cover the debt service by an adequate margin, revenue bonds are generally used.

At the local level of government, a third category of bonds may be used which are known as special assessment bonds or special district bonds. The legal establishment of a special assessment district is a prerequisite to the issuance of such bonds. These bonds are issued to cover the costs of such projects as drains, sewers, water facilities, roads, etc., and require that the debt service be adequately covered by the levy of special property tax assessments against the benefitted property within the district over a long enough period to pay off the bond issue.

The ability of any unit of government to issue bonds and to issue them at a favorable interest rate is directly related to the financial stability of that unit of government. If such financial stability is questionable, it frequently becomes either impossible or prohibitively expensive to issue bonds. For this and many other reasons, I urge upon all of you most serious concern for the sound and effective management of the financial affairs of your respective units of government.

REVENUE AND TAXATION

An Outline of Potential Sources
Prepared for Use at Southwide Conference of Black Elected Officials
By Alfred M. Pelham
December 13, 1968

TAX SOURCES

Taxes used primarily by state government:
- Corporate Franchise Taxes (organizational and annual)
- Business Activities Tax
- Motor Vehicles Taxes:
  - a. Weight
  - b. Horsepower
  - c. Motor Carriers' Privilege
  - d. Gasoline
  - e. Diesel Fuel
- Inheritance Tax
- Intangibles Tax
- Utility Property Tax
- Liquor, Beer and Wine Taxes
- Horse and Dog Wagering Taxes
- Chain Store Tax
- Unemployment Compensation Tax
- Domestic Building and Loan and Savings and Loan Association Franchise and Privilege Taxes
- Foreign Building and Loan and Savings and Loan Association Privilege Tax
- Federal Savings and Loan Privilege Tax
- Insurance Company Privilege Tax (domestic and foreign)
- Oil, Gas and Minerals Severance Tax
- Stumpage Tax
- Other (aircraft, vessel tonnage, watercraft, etc.)

Taxes used by both state and local government:
- Property Tax (real and/or personal)
- Income Tax (flat or graduated)
- Sales Tax (on commodities)
- Sales Tax (on services)
- Cigaret Tax
- Amusement Tax

Taxes used primarily by local governments:
- Property Tax-Special Assessments
- Payroll Tax
- Utilities Tax (on customer billings)
- Hotel-Motel Occupancy Tax
- Motor Vehicle Operation Tax
- Property Transfer Tax

SOURCES OF REVENUE OTHER THAN TAXES

Licenses:
- Motor Vehicles (automobiles, trucks, trailers, motorcycles, etc.)
- Motor Vehicle Operators
- Liquor Dealers
- Liquor Establishments (bars, clubs, cabarets, etc.)
- Restaurants
- Other Business Establishments
- Street Vendors
- Marriage
- Dog
- Other

Fines, Fees and Permits:
- Traffic and other Court Fines and Fees
- Registration Fees:
  - a. Deeds, Mortgages, Chattel Mortgages, etc.
  - b. Births and Deaths
  - c. Assumed Name
  - d. Annual Reports
  - e. Professional
  - f. Other
- Inspection Fees:
  - a. Safety (building, elevator, etc.)
  - b. Fire
  - c. Food
  - d. Other
- Parking Meter and other Automobile Parking Fees.
- Other Fees and Charges (zoo, golf course, marina, etc.)
  - a. Building
  - b. Food Handlers
  - c. Sidewalk
  - d. Other

Sales of Service and Reimbursement for Services Performed:
- Hospital and Health Services
- Other Institutional Services
- Water and Sewer Services
- Welfare Services
- Rubbish and Garbage Collection (commercial)
- Other

Grants in Aid (from state and federal government)
- Welfare
- Health
- Education
- Urban and Community Renewal
- Highway Construction
- Office of Economic Opportunity
- Water and Air Pollution Control
- Civil Defense
- Other

Shared Taxes (from state government)
- Varies between states

Miscellaneous Sources:
- Income from Investments
- Rentals and Concessions
- Gifts and Bequests
- Proceeds from Sale of Bonds
- Other

'... Know Your Authority ...'

Gerald A. Lamb, a native of Elizabeth City, N.C., is treasurer of the state of Connecticut. He has also served as president pro tem of the board of aldermen and as acting mayor of his present home, Waterbury, Conn. He was one of three Negro financial experts on a panel on revenue and taxation.

I am indeed most honored to serve on this distinguished panel of financial experts, but of equal honor is this opportunity to share with you some of my experiences that may offer to you an expressway of financial genius and expertise in your transactions rather than a dirt road of bumpy pitfalls, frustrations and despair.

It is always gratifying for me to return to the South, for after all I am a product of a proud but poor family of the South. In fact, last evening when I flew over the eastern shores of North Carolina where I was born, I found myself in a rather nostalgic mood. Reflecting back over the years, I could remember vividly the day more than 26 years ago I marched off to defend this nation, and how paradoxical it was that I should want to defend this nation, for I had just spent more than two months searching for a job behind doors that remained closed to us. I reconciled my concern for this nation or this system at that time by saying that "things will be better some day." How prophetic, for I returned to the South last night, not as a frustrated, disillusioned and angry young man, but as an individual somewhat older, yes, somewhat balder, but also the treasurer of one of the 50 states. Let no one deceive you, this is progress, and the number of elected officials present today suggests to me that you in the South are also enjoying progress.

Our topic or theme, as has been stated, is "Revenue and Taxation." If we, as panelists, are to complement but not duplicate each other, perhaps each of us can touch generally on the broad implications of the topic but zero in on the areas that touch our present responsibilities. As treasurer of a state, I would like to at least discuss one area that perhaps the other panelists may overlook.

My remarks to you as elected or potential public financial officials will stress two general themes: the necessity of having a clear definition of one's authority and responsibility, and the necessity of utilizing competent advice.

Let us review carefully the first question for a moment—What is your authority and responsibility? May I first caution you against asking your predecessor or any other elected or appointed official in your locale. All too often their advice is both inconsistent and incomplete. My advice is simple—review, analyze and thoroughly familiarize yourself with your city or town charter, state or county statutes, ordinances, rules, and regulations pertaining to the office you hold.

The obvious reason to know your authority and responsibility is to perform and execute your duties properly, but of equal importance is to always be on guard that someone else does not perform your job for you by usurpation of authority. Your authority and jurisdiction may be much broader in scope and dimension than you anticipated or realized. It is no secret in Connecticut that my election as treasurer of Connecticut has made everyone aware of that constitutional office and its vast jurisdiction. And, I might add, for those few who were not aware of it, I have a way of reminding them—and this includes other state officials frequently.

It is not unusual for me to quote my powers enumerated in chapter 32 of the general statutes. It says: "The treasurer is responsible for receiving, depositing, and disbursing all state funds; collecting and distributing certain taxes and fees; servicing all state bond issues, investing surplus money; borrowing of funds when required, administering the financing of all state-owned public housing."

The treasurer is custodian of all securities pledged by insurance companies, all pension funds, and deeds to properties owned or controlled by our state. He is the escheat or abandoned property administrator and serves on the Banking Commission, Bond Commission, and Finance Advisory Commission.

I have listed these responsibilities to illustrate to you the necessity for knowing your authority. The position of treasurer had gone unnoticed because my predecessors either did not know the scope of their authority or did not elect to use it.

It has been suggested by some that the true impact of my job was not known until it was too late. With your indulgence, I would like to add a bit of humor. Those of you whose wives are the keepers of the family purse realize the influence of the mate with the money. I am certain you can almost agree that if you have the money, you have almost everything, because at least you have some influence.

Moving quickly to my second theme (utilizing competent advice), I cannot overstress the importance of seeking advice in this complex society because it is impossible to be an expert on all facets of finance. Public officials are and must be especially dependent on both legal and financial advice. Any man who thinks he knows all is destined to ruin himself and his state, county, or town.

I have used these two central themes with emphasis, because as we proceed through five important areas of special interest to local finance officers, you will realize their importance.

Using some personal experience and observations in these five areas, I will not attempt to give a technical discourse on each because the technicalities differ by state and area; but instead I want to offer some helpful hints.

The five areas of concern to public financial officials that I will comment on are:

I Administrative practices

II Public relations responsibilities

III Handling deposits

IV Investment of money

V Borrowing money

If I were giving a lecture on administration, I would discuss the practices of setting goals, selecting personnel, and coordinating and guiding their efforts with sophistication toward these goals. But today, rather than misguide or deceive you about our genius, I would rather talk about a very simple but helpful everyday tool I use for accomplishing these rather lofty goals, i.e., a "calendar of events." A simple, accurately maintained calendar goes a long way toward making a good administrator. In addition to maintaining a prompt and efficient personal calendar, this also enables you to coordinate your many diverse office functions and carefully program and project duties. As a public financial official this is especially important, because your responsibilities are very often defined in terms of legal dates and it would be disastrous to miss timely execution. Maturing dates of notes or bonds or restrictions specifying dates, often written into the authorizing legislation, are prime examples of important dates to be listed on calendars of events.

I cannot stress too strongly the continuing aspects of your public relations responsibilities. If you are an elected official, you must always remember the first requirement is to get re-elected. This means consideration of public relations factors every day and not just during election year.

It goes without saying that the basis of good public relations is a sound and efficient operation. After all, one cannot cover over inefficiencies for long. Granting this, you still have to communicate the soundness of your operation day in and day out to the public. Overlooking public relations has increased the casualties of some extremely expert and efficient finance officials.

One of the most basic rules for good public relations is to do everything within reason to "avoid inconveniencing the people."

Let me give some concrete examples of the public relations considerations that affect a finance officer's responsibilities in just one area, the issuance of bonds.

First, to the voters, here I can point out:

(A) A need for stressing the positive benefits of a proposed bond issue and the merits and benefits to be derived from this capital expenditure. This is particularly important if the authorization is by public referendum.

(B) The necessity for not confusing the voter with side questions or complicating his understanding by combining projects into large, incomprehensible, omnibus packages.

(C) Above all, when possible, time the referendum away from vacations and holidays. The support of the more affluent citizen, who could possibly be away, may mean the difference between success or defeat.

Second, to the bond rating agencies:

It is extremely important that the rating agencies of Moody's, Standard and Poor's and Dun and Bradstreet be continually informed about the financial and economic condition of your community. In essence, you should make full disclosure on a continuous basis. All positive attributes of community should be stressed. A credit rating of AAA or A or BA can mean hundreds of dollars in interest cost savings to the tax payer.

Third, to the underwriters and investors:

Again I repeat the importance of keeping this group completely informed about the community's financial and economic condition. If you desire a good sale, schedule the sale for a convenient day (not a holiday) and at a convenient time (11 a.m. rather than 9 a.m. or 7 in the evening).

These examples of public relations considerations at all levels of contact when issuing bonds is cited to stress the continuing aspects of your public relations responsibilities. Careful attention here not only helps the community (a lower borrowing cost) but also helps you (a requirement for re-election).

Leaving these more general administrative and public relations responsibilities, we can now discuss the more specific functional areas of concern to a finance official —handling deposits, investments, and borrowings.

As a finance officer, your core duties usually center around this important public trust. There are several recommendations that I deem important. You must not delegate the responsibility for determining the bank depositories or the cash level of each account. It is your neck if a bank fails or defaults, and it is also your responsibility to determine your cash requirements based on projected expenditures and experiences of prior years. A good system of checks and balances along with accounting controls are mandatory. We in Connecticut believe in the honor and integrity of our state employees, and this is the reason for bonding all individuals who handle money (smile). We bond them as a precaution in the event that we have misjudged their character. I would suggest that you do likewise. I repeat, accounting controls are absolutely necessary.

As a financial official you will have monies on hand above needed working balances, monies upon which you want to earn a return!

Again, the legal question—What authority do you have to invest? For example, in Connecticut, most local communities can utilize only treasury obligations or bank certificates of deposit. Some states have broader authority which often includes commercial paper or other government agencies. Once you have ascertained the legal authority or requirements, you still have the need for determining the amounts, maturities or the type of investments.

Here, competent financial advice must be sought. The rationale for investing is simple—define your needs, select investments to meet your needs—but the execution demands specialized knowledge of the characteristics of many different but legal investments as well as up-to-date knowledge of markets.

One source of investment help can be your local banker. Select those bankers with competence in the investment area. It may be beneficial to seek out a larger institution with trained specialists in another community if your local banker has only a limited knowledge of this area of work, especially the mechanics of buying and selling securities, an important consideration when selecting your investment advisor.

Pension funds and other custodial and trust accounts in most instances, because of their long term investment features, require other types of consultants such as investment brokers, actuarial scientists, or those with insurance expertise.

I must repeat once again, competent legal and financial advice is mandatory.

Under legal advice—the field of law surrounding borrowing money by government units is highly specialized. You should:

—Select a bond attorney experienced in your state whose legal opinion is marketable, or in other words, whose legal opinion has proved acceptable to bidders of previous issues. Your close friend who happens to practice law or your town attorney cannot be used if you want to sell your bonds;

—Consult bond counsel early since he must approve all proceedings relative to the bond issue including all notices, resolutions, adoptions and/or approvals by boards and offering circulars. In fact, I virtually hire bond counsel many times in advance of drafting of bond proposals. Their assistance is invaluable. May I repeat, a legal opinion concerning public financing is a very specialized field of law and should not be undertaken by a firm inexperienced in this area.

Financial advice—Here again, the same theme prevails. Select competent advisors to help guide you through the maze of considerations surrounding the issuance of bonds or notes.

Let us look at some of the considerations:

1. The timing of the sale—Is it a favorable market?
2. The date of sale—Is it a holiday or does it conflict with a major national sale or sales (100 million of California and 50 or 60 million of Connecticut)?
3. Presentation to the rating agencies—What kind of information do they require?
4. Preparing the prospectus—Is it clear and concise?
5. Setting the maturity schedule—Are the dates convenient for investors? Is the schedule reconcilable with the flow of cash or resources?
6. Details of handling the sale—Is it a place convenient for bidders and is there a local proxy agent that can submit bids telephoned from the money centers (New York, Chicago, San Francisco, etc?)

I could go on at length, but instead I would highly recommend the reference booklet covering this area, "Pitfalls in Issuing Public Bonds" published by Moody's Investors Service, Inc.

In conclusion, I hope my message is clear enough—As you operate in the five principle areas of concern to public finance officials, you should carefully (A) consider the scope and limit of your responsibility and authority, and (B) seek competent advice, both legal and financial.

I am cognizant that I have not created many financial wizards in 15 minutes, but if any one of you is elected or appointed in a financial responsibility, I would be most happy to offer you several weeks of training in my office.

I purposely have avoided the topic of taxation, for we are indeed fortunate to have two experts in that field on the panel. I trust that I have aroused some curiosity and stimulated some interest, for questions will be most welcomed.

'...Services and Benefits...'

Theodore A. Jones, director of revenue of Illinois, spoke on "Problems of Revenue Administration" on the revenue and taxation panel Dec. 13. He is former regional director of the Office of Economic Opportunity for the Great Lakes Region and is a director of several financial institutions in Chicago.

I am deeply honored by your invitation. I am here, of course, as the representative of my state government's most popular agency—the tax-collecting Department of Revenue.

I am particulary grateful for this opportunity of speaking to you because of your particular professional interest in public administration. You are in a position to provide heavy influence upon some of the enormously complex decisions which lie immediately ahead of us.

I believe that it is time to make a decision as to whether state government will continue as a responsive and responsible instrument of the public will—whether it will continue to meet its responsibilities, or whether it will, by default, shift those responsibilities onto the federal government and itself assume a somewhat passive and ceremonial role in solving the people's problems and in some instances, the role of a spoiler, denying service to disadvantaged citizens. Every state faces decisions on this order.

Mere words will not answer that question. We must answer it with actions, and unless we do answer it satisfactorily, history will supply answers we do not relish. Are state governments going to respond realistically to local needs while the federal government waxes ever stronger and all-pervading?

Our ability to carry out the responsibilities of government is measured in what Abraham Lincoln called "the legitimate object of government" and defined as "to do for the people what needs to be done, but which they cannot, by individual effort, do at all, or do so well, for themselves."

If we are to do these things, it seems to me that we will have to do some rearranging of our opinions—to rid ourselves of some of the folklore that has grown up around the acts of government and the collection of taxes.

Too often we hear government discussed as if it were a business, as if it should be expected to make a profit and pay a dividend. This is utterly false. Government has no purpose as an institution other than the services and benefits it can provide for the people, better than they can do it for themselves.

Too often we forget that our democratic representative government was set up by inspired non-conformists expressly to provide services and benefits which they believed were justly due to the people, and which they had despaired of securing under colonial government.

If government is not created to "serve," what then is its purpose?

You cannot divorce state taxes from the federal and local taxes in preparing a program. They all come out of the same pocket, including your pocket and mine. In dealing with revenues, we must consider the total impact of all taxes, federal, state, and local, including those new ones which may be proposed.

In and of themselves, taxes are sterile. They have no real meaning except in terms of the payments of past debts or the purchase of services—paying workmen for their labor, and contractors for their work, materials for industry and goods bought and used by the state.

When Chief Justice John Marshall, in McCulloch vs. Maryland, said that "the power of tax involves the power to destroy," he laid the groundwork of a mischievous folklore that all taxes are, per se, bad because they will be abused. Had he said "the power to tax, carried to the extreme," he would have been much more precise.

The power of tax involves much more than John Marshall said: It involves the power to maintain responsible government, to provide police protection, health and education, highways and transportation facilities, schools and airports and sewage systems, hospitals and medical services—the things that Abraham Lincoln had in mind, and the things that the people, who own the government, want and are determined that they shall have.

Levying, collecting and expending taxes is not an exercise of futility and self-destruction. It is a function of maintaining those very services which ensure the permanence of democratic government and which are closest to the people and their needs.

It is in this area of services that the states are shifting the responsibility over to the federal government.

I should like to say parenthetically here that there is a very good reason why the federal government has been able to assume responsibilities that belong to the states, and that the states haven't been able to meet. The federal Constitution, liberally construed over the years, confers vast, indeed almost unlimited powers in its clauses on the general welfare, commerce, and taxing power. State governments, Illinois being a prime example, operate under constitutions that for the most part are narrowly drafted, unduly restrictive, and narrowly construed. Hence you have the paradox of the remote government being given virtually unlimited powers while those governments closest to the people are handcuffed and rendered incapable of meeting their historic responsibilities; or providing cover for state inefficiencies and for state administrators to deny equal treatment for disadvantaged citizens.

The "tax climate," which we hear so much about, cannot be divorced from the total business climate. I assume that everyone wants to maintain a business climate that is healthy and vigorous and full of opportunity.

Andrew Mellon, when he was Secretary of the Treasury, gave us a guideline that is still relevant. He said:

> "A sound tax policy must lessen, so far as possible, the burden of those least able to bear it; and it must remove those influences which might retard the continued steady development of business and industry on which, in the last analysis, so much of our prosperity depends."

It seems clear to me that at certain strategic points, many state tax systems fail utterly to measure up to those standards. We can agree that good taxes should, then, have certain characteristics: They should hold reasonable promise of being stable sources of revenue; they should be uniformly levied so that everyone shares in supporting the government; they should be easy to collect and hard to evade; they should be levied according to ability to pay.

And, above all, they should be levied on the other fellow!!

I think we can agree, too, that if every man could build his own hospital, his own school, his own highway and transport system, clean his own river, dispose of his garbage and sewage, act as his own policeman, install his own street lights and pave his own street—we then wouldn't need taxes at all!

Let us consider briefly what is occurring in some areas of historic state and federal responsibility.

Increasingly, in some states, the federal government has been called upon to restore law and order and here and there to provide some justice. Here, we must move as rapidly as possible with every resource available, to erase the social and economic conditions which produce mass disorders. Maintenance of respect for law is a primary and historic state responsibility which all too often has not been exercised well, if at all. All government has responsibility here.

No responsibility rests more squarely upon the state than that of providing for education, and our plight is desperate. It is desperate statewide and most critical in cities. School administrators everywhere are faced with the urgent need to find money to carry out programs that must be undertaken.

I would like to note an example of the wide variation in the quality of education contained in the report of the Illinois Scholarship Commission last year. Of the high school students enrolled in City of Chicago senior classes, 22.4 per cent of those eligible to compete for scholarships did so. But only 5.5 per cent of the total eligible were actually qualified for scholarships. For the state as a whole 23.4 per cent of senior classmen entered the competition, and 7.1 per cent qualified for scholarships. For Cook County suburban schools, 29.3 per cent of senior classmen competed, and 10.1 per cent qualified for scholarships.

What does this mean? It means that City of Chicago seniors fall significantly behind the state level and very far behind the suburban level of education, as indicated in the grading for scholarships. Educators will tell you that other factors (environment, economic pressures, family and community disturbances) may affect the student's performance. But the conclusion that a gigantic educational effort must be made in the city and the state is inescapable.

We may congratulate ourselves in Illinois that we have unexcelled prosperity and an unemployment rate of only 3 per cent, which is far below the level of other industrial states. But do not be misled by generalizations on this theme. Averages are tricky.

In the Lawndale area of Chicago, 17 per cent of adult males are without jobs, and 12 per cent in the Woodlawn area are unemployed. In some sections unemployment among Negro youth is 30 per cent or higher. It is dangerously high in many of the poorer white sections. These are the drop-outs, the aged, the uneducated and untrained who are unemployable in a highly technological economy. They are the elements of what Dr. James Conant called a "time bomb" in our midst.

Dr. Phillip Hauser, sociologist at the University of Chicago Center for Urban Studies, has said, "All of the welfare and educational provisions today are only a band-aid on a gaping, massive wound." (Time Magazine, July 28, 1967).

Gunnar Myrdal, the eminent Swedish economist, in his recent study of our economy, says: "In society at large there is more equality of opportunity today than there ever was. But for the bottom layer there is less or none."

These people, and many others, are telling us that despite our booming economy, our good intentions and our efforts thus far, we must find ways to give great numbers of sorely disadvantaged persons—some one-sixth of our population—a chance to learn, an opportunity to gain skills, a way to find some gainful work. We must find ways to help them break the chains in which they but barely exist—the cycle of unemployment, the relief roll, the broken family, the loss of faith, the loss of motivation, adult and juvenile crime.

Training and education and new approaches and methods of training are the major factors in accomplishing this goal. It is—I would like to point out—the only means by which we shall insure that in the future, business and industry and government will be able to find men and women with the technological (or scientific) skills that are needed to maintain our competitive advantages. Before the world, I doubt that there is a person present here today who could not add at least a score of other major problems of our states and cities that call for emergency measures.

There are social and economic costs attached to any policy of "too little, too late" carried on in the name of "economy in government." What are some of the costs?

Tax values are destroyed on a massive scale as whole vast areas of property decay into slums.

Clients for the relief rolls are manufactured at an expanding rate, and the tax burdens thereby increase.

Families are destroyed, by the hundreds and thousands, as social units.

Crime and juvenile delinquency and police and court costs fall into a vicious spiral of inflation.

Relationships between the individual and the surrounding society, and between the individual and his government, are eroded.

Human dignity is emasculated.

When I see these things, I ask myself if we can afford not to undertake that which is needed. Will not the eventual cost of inaction be far the greater?

58.6 per cent of Illinois' general revenue fund in the last biennium came from the so-called sales tax. 27 per cent of our total revenue came from the federal government. The 1967 increase in the sales tax—to 5 per cent—undoubtedly makes it one of the most regressive levies in the nation.

Our tax excludes a very wide range of proper objects of taxation: Our combined state-local rate is among the highest in the nation, and it rests most heavily on the food and clothing necessities purchased by those with the larger families—namely the poor.

It is clear that if federal grants and other payments were withdrawn, Illinois, as would all states, overnight would be in a colossal financial crisis. You cannot pull 27 per cent out of any revenue system without producing chaos.

A word about Federal Domestic Assistance. Shift is one major characteristic, most notable from federal to local city direct relationships rather than through state control and reallocation. OEO was the leader here followed by HUD, the Department of Labor and now some HEW programs.

U.S. Aid as Percentage of State Budgets 28 per cent in 1966.

Ala.	36%	Miss.	32%
Alaska	52%	N.C.	23%
Arkansas	36%	S.C.	23%
Fla.	22%	Tenn.	31%
Ga.	29%	Texas	28%
Ky.	31%	Va.	28%
La.	28%

Ninety-three per cent of the Governors believe that federal aid has stimulated state activity; 70 per cent believe it has improved state standards, and 35 per cent believe it has produced interference with state affairs. (This was in 1948).

With the partial shift from state control mentioned earlier, I believe many more will now claim interference—witness the new drive for block, unrestricted grants to states, sharing of income tax, etc.

With this shift has come a massive increase in federal grant programs:

1. War on Poverty—heavy local participation
2. Twenty-one basic education measures by Congress—1964-68
3. Fifteen vocational education and manpower bills
4. Four mass transit programs
5. Twenty major health statutes
6. Thirteen housing and urban development bills

In all about 219 new grant-in-aid programs with cost are going from $3 billion in 1960 to $20 billion in 1968-69.

With some imagination and firm resolutions we could do a much better and much fairer job of raising the revenues needed for schools, roads, welfare, training, housing and other purposes.

The more you involve yourselves in these matters, the more likely we are to devise a tax system that is fair and just and sufficient to our needs. Give leadership and participate.

President Roosevelt, who had to wrestle with unprecedented domestic problems and a depression of calamitous severity, proved to us that new thinking and new methods are required in meeting new challenges. I recall that he once said that, "Taxes are the price of breathing the free air of a free country, the price of a living and not a dead world."

'...Our Real Dream...'

Paul Anthony, executive director of the Southern Regional Council, greeted U. S. Attorney General Ramsey Clark and the black elected officials at the banquet Dec. 13.

It is with misgivings that I appear on the program this evening. Long dinners and the involvement of many people serve no function other than that of boring our guests.

However, in the next several moments, it is both a privilege, and certainly a pleasure, to do two things.

First, on behalf of the Southern Regional Council I should like to express our appreciation to Attorney General Ramsey Clark for being with us this evening. There is good in the South and there is good in the nation. This audience, Mr. Attorney General, represents a significant part of the good and the promise in this region. And the Attorney General, ladies and gentlemen of the audience, represents the good and the honorable of this nation. It is important, most important, that we meet here tonight recognizing this.

Secondly, and again on behalf of the Southern Regional Council, I should like, belatedly, to welcome the black elected officials of the South to this meeting and to thank you for coming. This is, as I am sure you agree, an historic occasion, and Atlanta is the appropriate site for it. Earlier, we have gone from "Gone with the Wind" to the Cotton States Exposition. At that latter event, of course, Dr. Washington attempted to make peace with the white South for "his people." I do not demean Dr. Washington, I hurt for him and the choices he faced.

The black elected officials here tonight give proof that now we are privileged to have new choices, and I rejoice that we do. The Southern Regional Council has for 20 years had a strong interest in access to the ballot, we have developed a sound reputation for our knowledge on this subject, and we have consistently expressed our faith in the power of the ballot. (And we are pleased that our current Voter Education Project is our most ambitious and successful effort to date in this area.)

Yet, for all the encouragement, pleasure and, indeed, honest rejoicing that this gives us of the Southern Regional Council, we, too, are sad. I am sad that in 1968 we should need a conference of black elected officials. For the Southern Regional Council to have such a conference is a confirmation that we are right, particularly in believing in the democratic society. We are gratified that this represents such a significant movement up the rungs of the ladder. But, we shall not be really gratified until we have climbed the ladder. We shall achieve our real dream in cooperation with men like the Honorable Ramsey Clark and that which he represents, and with the cooperation of the honorable black elected officials here present. This dream is to have a conference of elected officials.

Then we will all be blessed, whole, and a nation of honor.

'... Equal Justice To All of Its People...'

Ramsey Clark, retiring Attorney General of the United States, was speaker Dec. 13 at a banquet at the American Motor Hotel. He is a native of Texas and the son of former U.S. Supreme Court Justice Tom C. Clark. He came to the Justice Department in March, 1961 after his appointment by President John F. Kennedy as assistant attorney general.

I wish there were some way that I could tell you how deeply pleased I am to be with you tonight. My reasons fall into three groups: One is personal. I am Southern and white, and I know how very desperately we need black elected officials here.

Second is official. I have been awfully fortunate through all my life, but during no time have I been so fortunate as these last years that I have had the opportunity to serve justice. There are many, many men and women who have been in the Department of Justice these years who should be here tonight; and they would be, as am I, deeply pleased to be here and to know what you represent for this nation.

We are here tonight because we are a democracy and a democracy that will ultimately extend equal justice to all of its people. We are here tonight because we are making progress toward that end. We are making progress because we care. I well remember the long nights in the Department of Justice in the winter of 1964 when we were trying to find the legal techniques for a voting rights act. I well remember President Johnson's deep personal commitment to liberating the Negro, the minority in America; to bring the vote to all Americans.

As the principal federal officer in charge of the enforcement of the federal court order under which the march from Selma to Montgomery took place in the spring of '65, I had the privilege to see great men—brave men, men who believed in America—march that we might be here tonight. Dr. Martin Luther King was in the front rank. Bob Kennedy, who had been Attorney General, contributed there in the early days toward the Voting Rights Act. Men like Nick Katzenbach, Burke Marshall and John Doar were there and did what they could with their might.

Then there was that moment, Aug. 6, 1965, when the rotunda of the nation's Capitol was filled with the nation's great, and the President of the United States signed the Voting Rights Act of 1965, and it became the law of the land. It was less than a week later that the first deep rumbles from South-Central Los Angeles in an area called Watts—originally a bus depot, the first stop in Los Angeles County from the Southern states—were felt throughout the world; and we were reminded how imperative it is that we persevere.

I am deeply honored to be here for a third reason: to be with black elected officials of the South because I am a concerned American; because I know there are thousands and thousands of people in these United States who have come to doubt and some who do not believe, that this nation has either the purpose or the capability to bring equal justice to all of its citizens (and you demonstrate, better than anything perhaps, that this is not so); that the system, however awkward, however slow, can work; that our purpose as a people and the purpose of our laws is equality and justice for all.

The Voting Rights Act is a bold experiment in democracy. It has made a difference. Four years ago we could have held this meeting in the telephone booth in the lobby and not interfered with anybody who wanted to make a phone call. Two years ago in Washington, the leadership—as I recall, Louis Martin, primarily—met with what was comparatively a handful of black elected officials from all over the nation. What a difference you can make! What a difference that law has made and must make further, because we are only beginning. We have miles to go before we sleep.

The Voting Rights Act of 1965, like every contested piece of legislation, has compromises. One compromise was the expiration of many of the most important sanctions and controls—in what then seemed a long time and now seems no time. After five years, on Aug. 8, 1970, there will be the opportunity for jurisdictions to reinstate qualifications to vote through subjective tests, such as literacy. Then, unless something is done, the power of the Department of Justice to place examiners and observers in places where they are needed to protect the fundamental right of a democratic people will also expire. Then state legislatures will be empowered to prescribe new standards, new procedures for voting throughout this land.

It seems imperative to me that we redouble our efforts today to enlist in the support of democracy, under the auspices of the Voting Rights Act and this great Voter Education Project, all of our people and that we provide for the future by extending these sanctions of the Voting Rights Act of '65 for yet years to come. Their necessity, to me, seems clear.

I would not be fair if I said that voting, the right to vote, the exercise of that right, is the entire solution. Far, far from it. It is terribly important, it vests power. You now have new power; you must cherish it and nourish it, and build it, and increase it, and exercise it for justice. But if it were the entire solution, then how would we explain the conditions of Central City America, of our great metropolitan areas—of a New York and a Chicago and a Los Angeles?

We must go forward, seriously, on many fronts and with rare courage—the rare courage that you black elected officials have shown us and of which I am grateful. We know the areas. We sometimes think because the struggle is so difficult that, perhaps, the road isn't clear; but it is.

Separate, but equal, was never so; could not be; will never be. There can be no equality with separation in any society, least of all in a highly urban and complex nation of two hundred million such as ours. Separation must be ended, and all of its manifestations, to bring equality. The task is terribly difficult.

An area is education. Start with the children. Education is America's greatest industry. One in three in this country is engaged, full time, in education as student, teacher or administrator. In 1954, May 17—a time had begun so much, so late—the Supreme Court said, as to public schooling, there can be no separation. For nine years, through litigation in the courts of the South, the constitutional rights of our citizens were litigated. In September, 1963, those who knew saw one per cent of the Negro children in the public schools of the 11 states of the Confederacy in schools that were desegregated. All deliberate speed meant nine centuries.

People with vision saw this. People of determination changed it, in large measure, because of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, because of Title VI, because of the much-maligned guidelines of the Office of Education promulgated in conformity with law thereunder. One per cent in '63 became 16 per cent in '67. When the returns are in, it will surely be over 20 per cent in '68. This, a law that has had barely three years to work its way, has made a major difference and has shown that the constitutional rights of our citizens in the South can be fulfilled.

Because of the immensity of this nation, and while we concentrated here where the need was so great, we barely noticed the new segregation building up steadily and swiftly in urban America.

In five short years, from 1950-1955, the percentage of Negro children in the public schools of Baltimore increased from 50 to 61. In St. Louis, it was from 49 to 60. In Chicago, from 42 to 50. A profound change reflecting patterns of living meant a new segregation in Central City America unless we awoke. The 25 largest school districts in the United States saw a shift in five short years in the percentage of Negro children in public schools of nearly 10 per cent—10 per cent more Negro children and 10 per cent fewer white. America cannot stand that.

Slowly the resources of the law are brought to bear; and now four suits, outside the South, are brought to desegregate our schools there. And soon, soon we must recognize, among other things, that the litigations that take so long and the guideline techniques that can work so well must be brought to bear elsewhere. And soon, we must recognize that segregation in schooling is incompatible with our principles and, alas, I believe, with the Constitution, whatever the cause.

On the forefront today, we are moving in the area of employment, and only beginning. There is vast discrimination in employment—the opportunity to get a job, to keep a job, to improve in your job, to get a better job. The '64 Act, Title VII promised to remedy this. It's essential that we enlist all of our energies, as a people, to do it. Today, we have brought finally 34 suits. When you think of the immense industry of the United States, you see how very slow the beginning is. Twenty-four this year, with so far to go.

One reason you must understand. For all the might of the federal government, the resources that we, as a people, have provided there are terribly inadequate. The Civil Rights Division—as devoted a group of people to the principles of this country as has ever been collected in one place, with one mission, in my judgment—is fewer than a hundred lawyers. Their average age is under 30. Their burden is to enforce the Voting Rights Act, to litigate school desegregation in perhaps 30,000 school districts over the U. S., to bring Title II of the Act, promising open accommodation, to a reality; to enforce all of our Civil Rights Laws. This small resource would be inadequate for one state. It would be inadequate for one single law throughout the United States. We must look to you, in your local community, to generate commitment and action to bring equality.

The reasons that black and white in America must show the world that they can live together with respect, with stability and with love are many. One is human dignity—my dignity, your dignity. Another is to remove this gross imperfection from our national character, to show that we can be what we say we are.

But there is another. It is survival. It really is, you know. We will add on this planet, in the next decade, one billion souls, and most will be blacks and browns and yellows. And we are impelled by change so vast that, in a few short years, the fundamental way we live is more greatly altered than in history to this moment. And change means that millions will starve, and millions will live in more than affluence, amidst surfeit, more than they can use. It means that science and technology, with 90 per cent of the scientists who ever lived working today, accelerating change and population explosions, compel now equality. And if we do not demonstrate that it is possible, that it can be, that it is, here in America, black and white together with love and strength, then this poor, tired world has more ahead than it can handle.

In the Gospel according to St. Mark, it is said, "And if a house be divided against itself, then that house cannot stand." America is a house divided. Not yet irreconcilably, but that remains possible. The divisions are many. Never forget that. It may be hard for black America to realize that our divisions are many—the young and the old, a real division.

Of course every generation has had a gap. But the gap today is greater than ever before and for clearly ascertainable reasons—because change is so vast; because in a few short years, there is such a difference that a generation today exceeds the millenium in times gone by. Half the buildings in the world have been built in the last 30 years; half the buildings in Harlem were built before 1900, and there's a moral there.

There is a division today between the educated and the uneducated. It's a very profound division. Education means more to the individual today than ever before. My father and his brothers could come to be lawyers without going to college, without going to law school. The demands of our terribly complex, technologically advanced society compel constant increase in education. Forty-five percent of the college-age people today are in college. When I started college after World War II, there were a million and a half students; today there are over seven. The difference between the policemen endeavoring to control college students—the policemen five to 10 years older, who dropped out before completing the eighth grade—is immense. We have to recognize that division. We have to seek to bridge it.

There is a division between the rich and the poor. It is not the same division that has existed in bygone days between rich and poor because, today, the poor know of the wealth that surrounds them. Today, in America, the poor are a minority. To be poor in urban America is to be desperate. And in that desperation, you see Marlboro country on T.V., and you know it doesn't look like 126th Street. You must bridge the gap between rich and poor.

There are these gaps within races too. You must know Negro youth in this country. You must work very closely with them. They need your strength and wisdom. You need theirs. And if you can't bridge that gap, the meaning is immense to all of our people. And you must, within races and between, bridge the gap between the educated and the uneducated and lift all to the greatest possible education we can bring to them, because their future and ours depends on it, and so, too, the rich and poor.

And finally, of course, there's the division between black and white, a division that cannot and must not continue.

And from one side of this house of ours, we hear the call for order. There must be order. And from the other side of the house comes the cry of justice. Give us justice. The long history of mankind tells us that you will have neither order nor justice until you have both.

'. . . Proud To Have Been a Part . . .'

(TELEGRAM FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES)

Four years ago, only a handful of black people held public office in the South. Negroes were, in effect, without a direct voice in the council of government in the Southland.

Soon after this administration began, I had the honor of signing into law the Voting Rights Act of 1965. Hundreds of thousands of Southern Negroes who had been denied the ballot were able, for the first time in their lives, to register and to vote. Indeed, Negro registration in the South has increased by one million in the last four years, to a total of more than three million today. Those black Southerners are today, for the first time, able to participate in the most basic step in our democracy—the casting of the ballot on election day.

Largely because of this historic development, there are now some 385 black elected officials—all holding public offices for which they had to go before the voters—in the South. These officials now are gathered in a conference sponsored by the Voter Education Project of the Southern Regional Council to discuss their mutual problems, to exchange ideas and to receive advice and counsel on the performance of their public duties.

As President of the United States, I salute these black men and women now meeting in Atlanta. I wish their conference much success. I am proud to have been a part of the developments that made it possible for them to serve.

A Resolution: '...Not Separate, But Unequal...'

The following resolution, drafted by a representative of each of the 11 Southern states, was adopted by the Southwide Conference of Black Elected Officials as the conference ended Dec. 14.

We have come to a point in the South and in the nation where the executive decisions of the next four years may well determine the course of race relations and civil rights progress for the future and will decide whether the succeeding generations of America will live in peace or will live at all.

We are appalled by inferences from the incoming administration that the South's racial problems will be effectively dealt with by the states.

The fate and future of the South and her people, black and white, cannot be left in the hands of these leaders whose past failures have demonstrated their inability and unwillingness to build a new South.

While business, acting unselfishly, can help, business alone will not bring enlightened, unselfish solutions to this region's problems.

Rather, we, as members of city, county and state governments, believe in and depend on democratic government, responsive to the needs of our constituents and the unrepresented millions of the South, as the proper problem-solving agency of the 20th Century.

We hope that the traditional Southern divisions between class and race can be healed. The kinds of oppressed whites who have had their own interests subverted by their racism must join with the oppressed blacks whom we represent to build a new South.

What is needed more than all else is full implementation of the Civil Rights Acts of 1964 and 1968, the Voting Rights Act of 1965, and the Economic Opportunity Act. This can be done only by full dedication of the Executive, Legislative and Judicial branches of federal and state government to the rights of man. The United States Supreme Court and our federal judiciary must be upheld and strengthened in devotion to equal justice.

We want to urge the President of the United States and our Congress to extend the much needed Voting Rights Act of 1965 from its present maturity date to another five years.

Since 1965, 805,233 Negroes have been added to voter registration rolls in the 11 Southern States. Most notable gains have come in those states where federal registrars have been assigned. To date, however, none have been assigned to either North Carolina or Virginia. Registrars are needed in these two states, and additional federal registrars are needed throughout the whole South.

In a nation dedicated to democratic principles, how can we explain that only about 60 per cent of the nation's potential voters went to the polls in the November election? Consideration should be given to making election day a national holiday so that the people can have adequate time to exercise the right to vote, so dearly earned by so many, over so long a period of time.

Violence and intimidation—as the tragic events at Orangeburg, S. C., earlier this year illustrated—have not abated in the South. White resistance to school desegregation continues—as we have seen in South Carolina and Mobile, Ala., and many other places, where white parents have organized to block effective progress toward eliminating the dual school system. In the 14 years since the Brown decision outlawing segregated public education, the rate of school integration in the South still hovers at a low level of tokenism. According to the Department of Health, Education and Welfare figures for the 1967-68 school year, only 14 per cent of the South's black children were enrolled in desegregated schools. For the Deep South the figures were: Alabama, 5.4 per cent; Mississippi, 3.9 per cent; South Carolina, 6.4 per cent; Louisiana, 6.7 per cent, and Georgia, 9.9 per cent.

The critical problem of poverty in the South must not be ignored by the new administration. In spite of much national publicity, children are still hungry in Mississippi and throughout the South. In spite of national concern over technological unemployment, men are still being driven from the land to huddle in the slums of our large cities. As critical as the problem of technological unemployment is the depressing reality of widespread under-employment. In many areas of the South the percentage of the labor force designated "unemployed" is about the national average, but the income in those areas is less than half the national average. Southerners, black and white, work long hours for low pay. Minimum wage laws must be broadened and enforced.

As part of a short-term solution to some of the more critical problems of the poor, uniform federal regulations are needed to govern the administration of public assistance programs in the states. Under present state welfare structures it is possible for states to impose restrictive regulations which bar the most needy from welfare rolls. However, the concept of public assistance itself needs to be re-evaluated with the understanding that welfare is not a privilege bestowed upon the needy in the way of charity, but a clear legal right. Hand in hand with such a re-evaluation, additional jobs and job training programs must be created.

We want to thank the Voter Education Project of the Southern Regional Council for bringing us together and giving us the tools and techniques we need to improve our performance as elected officials.

As more of us take office and as we become more deeply involved in the problems of our constituencies, gatherings like this one, on regional, state and local levels, must be continued to help us keep abreast of the complexities of modern government.

Events of the past four years in the nation's alienated black ghettos should have taught us that the just and human needs of the country's black minority cannot be ignored, or appeased with high-sounding words. We are not yet a nation separate, but we are most assuredly a nation unequal.

'...The Polling Place Is the New Phase...'

Mrs. Shirley Chisholm of New York, whose luncheon speech closed the Southwide Conference Dec. 14, was elected Nov. 5 as the first Negro Congresswoman in history. Elected from Brooklyn's Bedford-Stuyvesant district, she had previously served in the state Assembly.

Those of you who know me know that I am very forthright and very frank. And so I am not going to be giving you a lot of little pieces of dessert this afternoon. I'm going to tell it to you like it is, because we've got to realize that we are going through a very important social revolution in this country.

Someone made a reference a little bit earlier to the fact that we had women on the stage. Perhaps this might be ladies afternoon or ladies evening. I want to be very sincere when I say to you that there is a tremendous need for women to be in the political arena. I would hope, in the near future, that we would not pay so much attention as to whether a person is male or female, but that we would rather look at the assets and the attributes of those people who can help to liberate our race eventually. I think that must be the criteria.

Yes, from February through Nov. 5 of this year, I have been at it in the streets. And there were so many whisperings going on that "you can't make it because you are a woman." Well, ladies and gentlemen, here I am!

While nothing is easy for the black man in America, neither is anything impossible. Like all men, rather, we are moving along, and we will continue to move resolutely until our goal of complete and unequivocal equality is obtained. We must not be docile. We must not be resigned or inwardly bitter. We must see ourselves in an entirely new perspective, and we cannot sit in our homes waiting for someone to reach out and do things for us. Every tomorrow has two hands—the hand of fate or the hand of anxiety. And the first battle is won, my brothers and sisters, when we fight for belief in ourselves and find that it has come to us.

While we are still battling, we must not allow petty things to come to us and stimulate them into vast proportions of evil. To dwell on every slight and clutch it close to our breasts and nourish it will corrode our thinking. We are on the move now, and as Frederick Douglass said, "Power concedes nothing without a struggle. It never has and it never will." And the United States can no longer afford the luxury of costly, morally, religiously and ethically wrong racial discrimination. For America needs all of its citizens, with the ability to develop, to make a fuller contribution.

Many problems scream loudly—the thousands of black citizens, with franchise, living under degrading conditions; the millions of poor throughout this affluent nation, white and black, who lack the bare rudiments for fruitful living; the rapidly growing numbers of children caught in a web of disillusionment which destroys their will to learn, the increasing number of aged who do not look forward to rest or to retirement. And despite the historic legislation of our cities and our states, nearly 11 million black citizens today still live in basic ghetto communities of our cities.

From decades of non-participation, or only modest participation, the black man has, within only the last four years, shifted his goal to full political participation for full American citizenship. While on the picket line, at the lunch counter, and in the bus and store boycotts, the black man came face to face with the full breadth and weight of the power and influence exercised by local and state government, intertwining with and often stifling the protest. Indeed, a principle by-product of the American civil rights movement has been the election of the black citizen to his awesome political potential. And just as the picket line and the lunch counter demonstrations and the boycotts were dramatic and effective weapons of protest for the civil rights movement, the polling place, my friends, is the new phase and new thrust of the Negroes' bid for equality of opportunity.

Power concedes nothing. How else can any man rise to power and hold sway over millions and tens of thousands except by smothering dissenting voices? Freedom is an endless horizon and there are many roads that lead to it. We must walk arm in arm with other men, and we must struggle towards goals which are commonly desired and sound. We must give and lend to the youth a stronger voice and encourage their individuality. We must look to the schools and work for their improvement. The leaders of today in the black community must be able to place the goal of freedom ahead of personal ambition. The truly dedicated leader follows his conscience, tells what is best for his people.

Whatever else the black man is, he is American. Whatever he is to become—integrated, unintegrated, or disintegrated—he will become it in America. Only a minority of blacks has ever succumbed to the temptation to seek greener pastures in another country or another ideology. The black man's total commitment to America indicates that the prospects ahead seem bright. It is true that we are angry about our present plight, for we measure this country by her potential rather than by her achievements.

And Black Power is, indeed, a reality that is gaining in emotional intensity, if not always rational clarity. The harnessing and solidification of Afro-American power is constantly being dissipated with factionalism. Internal struggle for power by one group over another and forgetting the masses—this behavior is no different from that of the whites. But we as a people cannot afford the luxury of fighting among ourselves if we are to make real progress in this country.

Black people will gain only as much as they can win through their ability to organize independent bases of economic and political power through boycotts, electoral activities, rent strikes, etc. Black Power is concerned with organizing the rage of black people and is putting new, hard questions and demands to white America. We will build a new sense of community amongst our people. We will foster a bond between those who have made it and those on the bottom. And as Mr. Hamilton says, "Alienation will be overcome, and trust, the thing that our people are looking for, trust, will be restored."

Let us remember that a great people are not affected by each puff of wind that blows ill. We must fight for belief in ourselves. And, above all, we must hearken back to the days of darkness when Frederick Douglass, the great abolitionist, even in those times, echoed the famous phrase that has come, realistically, to haunt the black people in America as they fight to enter the mixed stream of political and economic life in these United States, the land of their birth. And that phrase is, "Power concedes nothing."

Let me say to you, my brothers and sisters, that until we can organize to create black unity with an economic base, until we can develop a plan for action to achieve the goals to make us totally independent and not have to look to The Man in order to live, we are not liberated. We must become doers and producers in this system in order to be able to control our destiny. We have the potential, but we must consolidate all of our strength for eventual liberation.

And let me say, off the cuff, a few things that are beating in my breast.

As I travel around the country now, speaking to groups, I must share these things. During my congressional campaign in Brooklyn I had the opportunity to talk with many of the black and white students on the various campuses; and to a large extent, many of these students came in and were a vital part of my campaign. And one of the things that these students, both black and white, indicated to me: Mrs. Chisholm, you have become a new symbol; a new kind of politician that is emerging. And I would ask them to elaborate on what the statement meant. Listen, this is what young people are saying in this country. They say you represent the type of politician that the people can trust implicitly; the type of politician that will not exploit their people for personal self-aggrandizement; the type of politician that is unbought and unbossed.

Those of you who have been following my career ever since I emerged five years ago know that the symbol under which I have operated is unbought and unbossed, and I think you can understand when I say to you that this does not endear me to the political structure. For I have the courage of my convictions. If you are truly going to give your people a sense of direction and a sense of leadership, you have to be able to relate to the people only and be prepared to take the consequences as a result of your actions, because this is what black people are looking for in America today.

They are disillusioned, they are apathetic, and there are many more reasons why many of our people don't go to the polls in spite of all of the barriers that have been held against them, particularly in the Southern part of this country. Many of them don't go to the polls because the public officials that they put in office forget them when they get in office. And we cannot afford that luxury. Yet, people have said to me ever since I emerged four years ago, you are committing political suicide, because I refused to do things for political expediency. When I should leave this scene, I want to be remembered, not as the first black woman to go to the United States Congress, although this is a historical fact. I want to be remembered as a politician that entered the arena where the people had real hope, not in terms of the words that I mouth day to day, but in terms of my actions and my attitudes in my community. That is what I want to be remembered for.

Yes, it was a very tough struggle, a very hard struggle this year. First in the primary of June I was up against the most popular state senator, another woman. The senator was The Man's "boy," because in the meeting they had indicated, "Yes, Mrs. Chisholm has ability; yes, Mrs. Chisholm is a fighter; but you can't cope with the woman." It isn't a question of coping with the woman, it's a question of trying to manipulate my conscience and dictate to my mind what I must do. And I said then—and I continue to say it—I know a person that's fiery and independent-minded in the political arena, I know that their days may be shortened. But I am not going to worry about that. Fortunately for me, I have a theory that many people don't accept. And maybe many of the people in this room will not accept it. But I believe this theory on the basis of my political activity for 20 years behind the scenes—only having emerged five years ago. The black people in America must have leadership that for the most part is educationally and/or financially secure. Because the temptations that are placed in the paths of many of us, many of us are not strong enough to resist.

I think that if we understand these basic things, then we can hope to restore some faith in our people. They will go to the polls, the registration drives will be increased because of the fact that their elected officials have indicated by their actions that they are fighting for them, that they are with them, that they are prepared to take the consequences of their actions. If we do this, I can assure you that the registration drives and the political activity during election time will become greater. But we have to prove this.

They told me that they could not back me for the United States Congress, even though the people in that community had last December come together and interviewed 11 others who were potential candidates. And the citizens had said we want Shirley Chisholm to go to Congress, because she has beaten the machine at the polls and the woman cannot be controlled, and we know that we can sleep at night when that woman's voice is in Washington. But the very assets that the people found in me I later learned were things that were against me politically, and hence the party boys did not give me the designation.

And of course, like many people, I suppose I should have stepped back, I should not have bothered, because I had four strikes against me. Number one, I was not a darling of the party. Number two, I was a woman. Number three, I was a black woman. And number four, I sure didn't have congressional money to run.

But you know what really made me decide to run? Not only the fact that I've always risen to challenges, but the fact that a woman came to my home on Sunday morning—I remember the state Legislature was still in session—that was way back in March. She came to my home one Sunday morning and rang the doorbell. I went downstairs and opened the door. I think I see her now. A very fat, middle-aged black woman, timidly entering my living room and pulling out of her pocketbook a crumpled, dirty white envelope. And I saw her taking this envelope out—it was kind of heavy—and as she extended it to me, she said, "Mrs. Chisholm you know, we welfare people hate you politicians because you're always fattening yourselves. We don't believe in helping you because so many of you forget about it. But Mrs. Chisholm, for the 10 years before you entered the political arena and for the four years that you have served in the state Legislature, when we learned in this community that you were going to run for the United States Congress, a group of us welfare mothers decided to get together and have our own little thing going each Friday night in order to raise some money to help you to buy stamps." And she gave me an envelope—I will never spend that money—the first contribution I got to my congressional campaign—$9.69 in coins.

If I had any doubts about running, that erased every doubt. I made my mind up that I had to run although many persons had cautioned me. They said, "Shirley, no one can run in your district against you for the state Assembly and win. That's your seat. You could stay there as long as you want to. Why are you giving up a sure thing to run for a congressional seat when you have so many odds against you. I said yes, I may have odds against me, but I have a little talk with the Man above each night, and I have a talk with the grassroots in the community, and they say, "Chisholm, run." And I ran. It was the toughest campaign that I've ever run in my life.

During the course of the campaign, right after I won the primary in June, I became ill. I had to go to the hospital to get an operation, and I was out of circulation for about seven weeks. My people became very concerned because my opponent was going up and down the district, and every day it would seem that he would be nearer and nearer to my door; and there was of course a certain amount of anxiety. But always deep down within me I knew that in spite of what was happening, I was going to win. Because I had indicated by my life, from the day I was born in that community, that I had served and worked with those people even before they ever thought of sending me to political office. And I knew that they would not forget. In spite of whomsoever the powers wanted to throw out there against me, I knew that the people would not forget me. Many workers came to my home as I lay on my bed trying to recuperate, and they were crying and upset. They said, "Chisholm you're so near to it, but yet so far, because the people in the district are saying they don't hear your voice on the soundtruck."

Ever since I have emerged I don't campaign indoors, I bring them out to the streets. Let the people dig you, let the people see you. And I believe in campaigning in the streets and in the housing projects and at the rallies. Because then this is where the truth and sincerity of everything comes out and you have to face that populace. You don't have to get away with gimmicks.

Finally, I said to my doctor—and he'd known me for a long time—I said, "Doc, I've got to go." He said "Shirley, I'm going to tell you, you have got to keep quiet for a while. I know that you're itching to go, but you've had an operation and you cannot use up your energy." And I remember so well that I said to him, "But Doc, the stitches aren't in my mouth, they're on my body." And he said, "Well, if you feel that you're strong enough to go out on your soundtrucks and tell the people your story, well, then you can go."

And believe it or not, the moment I got up to go into those streets until Nov. 5, I didn't even remember I had an operation. God is with me, and I went out in those streets and I did the kind of job that had to be done.

And now I know every eye is going to be focused on me. I went down to Washington last week for three days to look for a place to live, to hire a staff, to do a lot of odds and ends. And as I walked into the House of Representatives' restaurant, as I came down the steps, some of the members of the House of Representatives were eating; and I saw the elbows just hitting each other, as I came down the steps. Well, I guess you can imagine what was being said. And they came over, and one of them had the nerve to say to me, "You know, we heard all about you in New York, and we know you're a tough cookie, but we have been waiting for you. We're going to have some fun with you, Shirley Chisholm." And I said, "Sir, you must remember that fun doesn't necessarily work in one way. I'm going to have some fun with you, too."

And so, my dear brothers and sisters, I rise to the challenge of the awesome responsibility that has now been placed upon my shoulders, to be the first black woman to sit in the United States House of Representatives. And although I specifically represent the 12th Congressional District of New York State, I know that I am a voice for all of the blacks in America.

I don't know if many of you also realize that I was elected at the Democratic National Convention as the first black person to be a national committeewoman of New York State. I say this for one specific reason, because somebody said it to me a couple of weeks ago: "Shirley Chisholm, how can you rise within the ranks of the party so quickly, within a four-year period, from a poll leader all the way up to Congresswoman, and then go to the convention and emerge as a national committeewoman for the party—and yet you are not really a part of the machine?" And I said to the person, "Don't you recognize that the revolution is here, that the people are making their decisions now on the basis of what you can do to help liberate them?" And that's why I am rising. Because even though the bosses kept trying to stop me at the convention, when I ran in the district, the people kept telling them by their support, "Why don't you leave her alone?"

I think now that they recognize one thing about me, if nothing else. I love a good fight. And you don't tell me that you're going to try to destroy me without my attempting to show you what I can do with my 100-pound self.

God bless all of you. Pray for me, because I am going to need prayers. But one thing I do know, that the black people in this country will be very proud of their first black woman to go to Congress, because I'm going to live the life and fight the good fight. Because the time has come when we can no longer be the passive recipients of whatever the politics or the morals of a nation may decree, but that we shall rise up and fight for that which we believe.

Forget what the world will say, whether you're in your place or out of your place. Forget conventionalism. Speak your best words. Do your best deeds. Fight your best fight, looking only to God and to your conscience for approval.

BLACK ELECTED OFFICIALS IN THE SOUTHERN STATES

Voter Education Project
Of the Southern Regional Council
5 Forsyth Street, N. W.
Atlanta, Georgia 30303

1

ROSTER OF BLACK ELECTED OFFICIALS IN THE SOUTHERN STATES

Introduction

Prior to the inception of the Southern Regional Council's Voter Education Project there was no record maintained of Negro citizens in the South who had been elected to public office, the chief reason being that such a phenomenon was virtually unknown until recent years. As the sixties began, only a handful of black persons had managed to gain political office in the South, and this primarily in the region's more enlightened metropolitan areas. In 1965, as the Voting Rights Act went into effect, the Voter Education Project listed some 72 black elected officials in the eleven Southern states covered by the Southern Regional Council. Now, with substantial gains in the 1968 elections, the count stands at 388. Their names, addresses and offices are the content of this special report.

With the first publication of this directory it must be recognized that systems for gathering the information contained herein are still being perfected by the Voter Education Project, the only agency in the region maintaining such records. Inevitably there will be some margin of error in terms of persons who have gone out of office and others who have been elected whom we have not heard about.

First assembled in preparation for the Southwide Conference of Black Elected Officials convened in Atlanta in December of 1968 by the Voter Education Project of the Southern Regional Council, this directory is now made available in the hope that it will contribute to the ever-increasing political involvement of black persons in the South who, heretofore, have been denied full and free participation in the various levels of government in the region.

No effort has been made here to describe the various offices in the respective states to which black persons have been elected, most of which are self-evident in the ordinary terms of governmental nomenclature. However, it can be noted that the various states use widely differing titles for what we ordinarily call the county commission. In Louisiana it is called the police jury. In Virginia and Mississippi it is the board of supervisors, etc.

Note also might be taken of the fact that in Virginia all members of school boards are appointed. Thus, this directory shows no black persons serving as school board members in Virginia, which there, in fact, are. We include here only those persons who have run for and been elected to public office acknowledging at the same time that gains also have been made in the number of appointive offices held by blacks.

We will, of course, make every effort to keep this directory current. In the future, it might be updated and re-issued from time to time. Therefore, we will be most grateful to anyone who supplies us with corrections and additions.

This year's program report -- prepared for the Members of the Council, our contributors, and others, is presented in a somewhat different format than in previous years.

We wanted, in this report, to particularly identify our three main interests of the moment and to indicate the administrative changes we have made during the year and the increased productivity and efficiency which we believe has resulted from those changes.

Also, I wished to emphasize the talent and effectiveness of a number of persons on the staff. Quite candidly I am very proud of the variety and depth represented by the Council staff. This report reflects their work. I am deeply grateful to each of them.

Paul Anthony
Executive Director

Atlanta, January 1970

ADMINISTRATIVE AFFAIRS

During the year Mr. John H. Wheeler of Durham, who has served as President of the Council for five years, indicated that he would not like to serve another term. The Nominating Committee reluctantly accepted this resignation. Fortunately, for the Council, Dr. Raymond M. Wheeler of Charlotte, who had served as the Council's Chairman of the Executive Committee, accepted election as President and assumed that office in January.

Mr. Wheeler was presented a special citation at the November meeting, the first time an out-going President has been so cited. Mr. Wheeler will continue to serve on the Executive Committee of the Council.

At the January, 1970, meeting of the Executive Committee, Dr. Vivian Henderson, President of Clark College, was elected Chairman of the Executive Committee.

Thus, the Council continues a record of strong and outstanding leadership.

Regretfully, several persons moved from the region during the year and therefore became ineligible to serve further. These were: Dr. A. D. Beittel of Jackson, Dr. Samuel DuBois Cook of Durham, Dr. C. H. Thomas, Jr., of Orangeburg, and Dr. T. Franklin Williams of Chapel Hill.

In February, 1969, death claimed Mr. Ralph McGill, one of the founders and incorporators. With this tragedy, the region and the nation lost a strong voice for decency.

New members elected in November are: Mr. Hodding Carter, III, of Greenville, Mississippi; Mrs. Paul S. Derian of Jackson, Mississippi; Mr. Howard Lee of Chapel Hill, North Carolina; Dr. John Monro of Birmingham, Alabama; Dr. Ray Marshall of Austin, Texas; Mr. William Thomas Mason, Jr., of Norfolk, Virginia; Mrs. C. Bette Wimbuse of St. Petersburg, Florida; Mr. Earl Johnson of Jacksonville, Florida; Dr. Martin Brooks of Pembroke, North Carolina; Dr. James Lawson of Nashville, Tennessee; Mr. Fred Gray of Montgomery, Alabama; The Reverend C. K. Yarber of Texarkana, Arkansas; and Mr. E. H. Gadsden of Savannah, Georgia.

At the November Annual Meeting, the book Scottsboro by Dan T. Carter received the Lillian Smith Award. The George S. Mitchell Award was deservingly presented to the South Carolina Council on Human Relations.

INFORMATION AND RESEARCH

The department of Information and Research continues its functions of producing original publications and basic research and of responding to a wide variety of requests for information from students, scholars, media representatives, and others. Each year the number of these requests increases. This year, we have been interested and pleased at the substantial increase in telephone queries usually from persons in the media who need immediate or quick responses. We have attempted to refine our research operation to meet this situation and have been at least partially successful due to the talents of our permanent staff of research associates.

Pat Watters, Director of Information, was on leave for most of the year as a recipient of a creative writing fellowship from the Rockefeller Foundation. The year was remarkably productive for him.

His book, The South and the Nation, was published in January, 1970, and drew critical praise. The Washington Post described it as "a book only a white Southerner could write, the kind of book northern liberals most particularly should read." In addition, Pat is moving toward completion of yet another book, this one dealing with the civil rights movement. He published a major article on the Poor People's Campaign in the New American Review and is scheduled to publish shortly in the Atlantic Monthly an article about a 1969 trip to Fayette County, Tennessee.

At the year's end, Warren Pritchard, assistant to the Editor of Publications, resigned to attend graduate school. He was a valuable staffer and will be missed.

Regrettably, Mrs. Glenda Bartley, Director of Research, left the Council in the fall for another position. The position of Research Director remains unfilled though we are hopeful of announcing a replacement early in 1970. Robert E. Anderson, Jr., Editor of Publications, was the senior person in the department during much of the year and shared a substantial administrative burden in addition to his commendable editorial work and writing.

The department was directly involved in the production of ten separate publications plus four issues of the Council's quarterly magazine, New South. All continued to reflect high quality, timeliness, and in-depth analysis.

Particular attention should be called to the following New South articles:

"Black Awareness vs. Negro Traditions: The Atlanta University Center," by Robert Terrell, winter, 1969.--This was an analysis by a student journalist of the student unrest at Atlanta University in late 1968 and early 1969. It was a remarkably balanced piece that gave both sides of the controversy between students and administrators.

"Public Education and Community Organization," by Hayes Mizell, winter, 1969.--Numerous requests were received for reprints of this article which dealt with the poor quality of public education in the South and the possibilities of the issue as a focal point for community organization.

"A Visit with James McBride Dabbs," by John Egerton, winter, 1969.--The author, who has since contracted for a book on southern personalities with Doubleday, captured here the spirit and philosophy of one of the South's most prophetic authors.

"Southern Campuses in Crisis," spring, 1969.--This was the overall title for three separate articles dealing with student grievances on widely divergent southern campuses. Robert Terrell wrote of administrative intransigence at all-black Lane College which led to violence early in 1969; Sam Love, editor of the Mississippi State student newspaper, described students' successful courtroom efforts against a controversial ban on campus speakers; Elizabeth Tornquist, a free-lance writer from Durham, analyzed the confrontation of black and white students with Duke University administrators and the events leading up to the formation of the Malcolm X Liberation University.

"In Jamie Whitten's Backyard," by Robert Coles and Harry Huge, spring, 1969.--An eloquent expression of the frustrations and traumas experienced by the authors in trying to arouse public interest in the issue of hunger in the South.

"The Lord, He Works in Mysterious Ways," by Marvin Hoffman, summer, 1969.--This was a sensitive, deeply subjective analysis of the Child Development Group of Mississippi and its demoralizing battles with the federal bureaucracy. The author is the former associate director of CDGM. The portions published are to be part of a book on CDGM.

"A Little More Memphis," by Will Campbell, summer, 1969.--An off-beat, impressionistic view of the Memphis hospital workers strike by the director of the Committee of Southern Churchmen.

"Strike at Charleston," by Jack Bass, summer, 1969.--The strike by Charleston hospital workers in the spring of 1969 brought together organized labor and civil rights organization in a struggle with local and state officials. Jack Bass, Columbia correspondent for the Charlotte, North Carolina, Observer, describes the important events of the strike and the final settlement.

"Port Gibson, Mississippi: Profile of the Future?" by Jack Chatfield, summer, 1969.--An analysis of a selective buying campaign in a small Mississippi town by Negroes against white merchants in the aftermath of police violence against a Negro. The article raises but does not answer the question as to when such a boycott begins to have diminishing effects in liberating the spirit of man.

"New Strategies for Private Foundations," by James A. Joseph, summer, 1969.--A critique of the efforts by private foundations to influence social change.

"Interview With a Former Grand Dragon," summer, 1969.--The essence of a five-hour dialogue between Calvin Craig, former Grand Dragon of the United Klans of America, and Warren Pritchard, a member of SRC's Information and Research staff.

"The South and the Nation," by Pat Watters, fall, 1969.--Excerpts from a forthcoming book by SRC's Director of Information.

"The South's Inner Frontier," by James McBride Dabbs, fall, 1969.--An examination of southern culture and religion with emphasis on the humanity of the southern experience.

"Standing Up to America: Poor Whites in Durham," by Elizabeth Tornquist, fall, 1969.--A report on efforts to organize poor whites in Durham, North Carolina.

"One Poor White," by Ron Duncan, fall, 1969.--The thinking of a poor white man as revealed in conversations with the author, a professor of anthropology at Georgia State University.

"Majority Rule in the Black Belt," by Ray Jenkins, fall, 1969.--The story of the Green County, Alabama, election in which Negroes gained major county offices.

"The Present Dilemma," by Kenneth Clark, fall, 1969.--An evaluation of the impact of Negro voting strength and the election of black officials.

Special Reports:

Cooperatives and Poor People in the South, by Al Ulmer.--An extensive examination of the various poor peoples' cooperatives at work in the South. Mr. Ulmer is former Director of SRC's Community Organization Project. In 1966, he authored an SRC special report entitled Cooperatives, Credit Unions, and Poor People, the first comprehensive description of the co-op movement. This report continues the story, and assesses developments during the intervening years.

In Memphis: One Year Later, by Pat Watters with J. Edwin Stanfield.--This report, issued on the anniversary of Dr. Martin Luther King's assassination in Memphis, Tennessee, evaluates the city's response to racial tensions in the year since Dr. King's death. Issued jointly with the Tennessee Council on Human Relations.

Race Makes the Difference.--Based on data of SRC's Project on Crime and Corrections, this report analyzed sentence disparity among Negro and white offenders in southern prisons.

Fayette County, Tennessee: Tragedy and Confrontation, by Dwayne Walls.--A reporter's account of tensions in a small West Tennessee county resulting in a vicious beating of a black family and a subsequent black boycott against local white merchants.

The Federal Retreat in School Desegregation.--An extensive documentation of the erosion of federal enforcement in school desegregation during 1969. Researched by Horace Barker, a Columbia University graduate student.

Pamphlets:

The Will to Survive, by Anthony Dunbar.--This is a sensitive, eloquent study of a Mississippi plantation community based on the words of its citizens.

The Tax Structure of the Southern States, by Dr. Eva Galambos.--The first publication of SRC's Resources

Development Center was prepared under the editorial direction of Information and Research. The work, dealing with the regressive nature of taxation in the southern states, represents (insofar as I can discover) the first time the subject has been so comprehensively examined.

Books:

Civil Rights in Recent Southern Fiction, by James McBride Dabbs.--A paperback book on how southern writers have handled material concerning civil rights and black-white relations. The Charlotte Observer in reviewing the book, declared: "Dabbs' approach is a reader's approach, built around one topic and illuminating the whole area of race in southern fiction. Anyone interested in southern writing will find that Dabbs stimulates his thinking on writing, reality, and the relationship of the two."

Other Publications, Jointly Produced and Distributed by SRC:

In the Wake of Hurricane Camille: An Analysis of the Federal Response.--Issued with the American Friends Service Committee.

Atlanta Churches in Crisis, by Robert E. Anderson, Jr.--One of four nation-wide studies of the church and racial crisis which were presented before the Convocation on the Church and Violence in the Nation at the Interdenominational Center in Atlanta, March, 1969. Published in cooperation with the Interdenominational Theological Center.

The variety and scope of these publications illustrates the really dual role of the department. Such publications, for instance, as the Federal Retreat in School Desegregation and the Tax Structure of the Southern States are more immediately related to events of the times. On the other hand, Mr. Dabbs' Civil Rights in Recent Southern Fiction, The Will to Survive, and numerous New South articles deal not only with immediate problems, but by the nature of both their content and expression, attempt to reach a deeper level of southern truth. It is with this dual role in mind that we feel the Information and Research operations of the Council to be of major importance. This is true not as an "institutional" function or one of the normal research variety. It is to us in both a basic and immediate sense, a program function. Ideas are essential and the written word powerful. We would suffer by the loss of either.

VOTER EDUCATION PROJECT*

Through much of the year, in dramatic testimony to its effectiveness, VEP was engaged in a struggle for its life. At the end of the year, VEP's future remained clouded.

Service Centers for Elected Officials.--A new VEP program, service centers for black elected officials, went forward in earnest as 1969 began. Under the directorship of Mrs. Taunya Banks, the Mississippi center pioneered in the field of service to black elected officials during the latter part of 1968. In early 1969, similar centers were established in Louisiana, Georgia, and Alabama.

Each center is located on the campus of a predominantly Negro college. The participating schools are Tougaloo, Southern, Clark, Talladega, and Miles. There are two centers in Alabama, the Miles center having been established to serve officials in the immediate Birmingham area.

While there are a few state-sponsored programs to assist public officials in the performance of their duties, such efforts are generally lacking or minimal in the South. VEP service centers endeavor to make up for this lack, paying special attention to the needs of blacks who generally have not had previous opportunity for participation in government. At the same time, each service center for elected officials is prepared to render assistance to any officeholder irrespective of race and it very well may develop that certain of the centers will emerge as primary agencies in their locale for servicing any and all elected officials seeking to improve their performance.

Services provided by the centers have included consultations with newly elected officials on the nature of their duties, in some instances, entailing the employment of experts, as when a black person took office as a Chancery Clerk in Mississippi.

Directors of the service centers are: Antonio Thomas, Clark College; Sherrill Marcus, Miles College; Taunya Banks, Tougaloo College; Harold A. Franklin, Talladega College; and Jewel L. Prestage, Southern University.

Requests have come from several other states -- notably Virginia and Florida -- for similar service centers. However, VEP is holding these requests in abeyance until more experience is gained from the centers already in operation.

The Voter Education Project continued to keep records of all black elected officials in the South during 1969 as the number climbed rapidly past the 500 mark. A table showing black elected officials as of the end of November, 1969, is available. A directory of southern black officials was published by VEP in January, 1969, when the total stood at 388, with a foreword written by the Rev. John B. Morris, special programs director. During the latter part of 1969, VEP cooperated with the Metropolitan Applied Research Center in the compilation of a national directory of black elected officials which is scheduled for publication in early 1970.

Meetings of Black Elected Officials.--Following up on the highly successful Southwide Conference of Black Elected Officials held in December of 1968 under VEP sponsorship, VEP in 1969 sponsored a series of smaller, two-day statewide meetings of black elected officials. These were held in Virginia, Georgia, Florida, and North Carolina. The Virginia and Florida meetings were held with the cooperation of educational institutions -- namely Virginia State College, Florida A & M University, and Florida State University. The Georgia meeting was funded through the Georgia Center for Elected Officials, and the North Carolina meeting was arranged by the North Carolina Voter Education Project. Additionally, a workshop for school board members was held in Arkansas.

These statewide gatherings of black elected officials have offered in a conference context some of the same services provided by the centers. Each has included workshops for the specific public offices most generally held by black persons in that state. Other elected officials, both black and white, with greater experience, have appeared as speakers to treat some of the special problems they have faced and to inspire the assembly of black officeholders to still higher attainment.

The VEP staff, particularly Mr. Jordan and Mr. Morris, assisted in the planning of the first Institute for Black Elected Officials, which was held September 11-14 in Washington under sponsorship of the Metropolitan Applied Research Center. Mr. Jordan presided over the opening session.

State Voter Education Projects.--VEP during 1969 continued its support of statewide Voter Education Projects in four states -- South Carolina, North Carolina, Arkansas, and Louisiana. As in the past, these state VEPs encouraged and helped organize programs of voter registration, citizenship education, and leadership training in their respective states.

The South Carolina, North Carolina, and Arkansas VEPs again sponsored statewide leadership conferences, each with a prominent black guest speaker.

Voter Registration.--As in the past, funding of local-level voter registration campaigns continued to be a VEP activity. The number of projects funded in 1969 was 98.

Black registration in the 11 states of the Old South climbed to 3,248,000 during 1969 -- a gain of 136,000 over 1968. Nevertheless, only 64.8 per cent of the black voting-age population is registered to vote in the South, compared with 80.4 per cent of the white population. Negro voters now account for 16.7 per cent of the region's total registration.

Student Interns.--For the third consecutive summer, VEP employed and assigned a record number of student interns. After a two-day orientation period in Atlanta in June, 27 student interns were sent to assignments in Louisiana, North Carolina, South Carolina, Arkansas, and Georgia. Most assisted local leaders in conducting registration drives.

The number of interns was increased slightly over 1968. VEP regards the internship program as one of its more exciting and successful undertakings. It provides young black students with the opportunity to work with black people in a meaningful grassroots situation.

Under the editorship of Eugene McLemore, the University of Mississippi law student who served as director of the 1969 internship program, the interns produced a newsletter, the VEP Intern News, in which their reports and observations were published. Both the frustrations and accomplishments of doing voter registration work in the field were vividly described in these moving student reports.

Research and Publications.--During 1969, the Voter Education Project continued to be the main source of information regarding political participation on the part of southern blacks. Numerous articles based on VEP information appeared during 1969 and several authors were granted permission to use VEP statistics in books in the fields of race politics and political science. At the request of the House Judiciary Committee staff, registration statistics were updated, as cited in the Registration section above. In the House debate on extension of the Voting Rights Act, spokesmen both for and against extension cited VEP statistics.

Published during 1969 were the Directory of Black Elected Officials mentioned previously, proceedings of the Southwide Conference of Black Elected Officials.

Know Your South Carolina Government was the third in a series of citizenship education booklets. Research, writing, and editing for the fourth booklet -- Know Your Arkansas Government -- was completed during 1969 and the booklet was published shortly after the year ended. For the third year, VEP published a monthly newsletter, VEP News.

VEP moved more deeply into the field of election analysis during 1969, better preparing the organization to answer broadening questions about black political participation in the South. Dr. Charles Rooks, holder of M.A. and Ph.D. degrees in political science from Duke University, joined the VEP staff in late June.

Several research grants were made during 1969, notably to Jack Chatfield and Taylor Branch. After a stay of several weeks in Port Gibson, Mississippi, witnessing boycott, confrontation, and violence, Mr. Chatfield authored an account published in the summer issue of New South. Mr. Branch, a graduate student at Princeton, spent the summer surveying communities in Southwest Georgia. As a result of the visits and contacts he made, blacks in several counties learned about VEP's registration programs and applied for and received VEP grants. At least one county -- Talbot -- consequently was able to push its Negro registration ahead of white registration.

Staff.--In addition to the employment of Dr. Rooks, major staff changes during 1969 involved Weldon Rougeau, field director, and Thad Olive, administrative assistant. After nearly two years as field director, Mr. Rougeau resigned to enter law school at Harvard University. Mr. Olive resigned at the end of July to accept a position with a private Atlanta firm; however, he returned to VEP at the end of October. Upon his return, Mr. Olive assumed some of the field duties Mr. Rougeau had been performing.

The director, Mr. Jordan, was on leave during the first half of the year, selected by the Institute of Politics of the John F. Kennedy School of Government at Harvard University. Mr. Jordan conducted a seminar called "The Black Man in the Southern Political Process."

* * * * * * * * * *

During the year, for the first time in the Council's history, we engaged in substantial lobbying. We expressed concern to our members and contributors in a detailed document filed with the Senate Finance Committee and gave oral testimony before that Committee. Generally, persons who will receive this report have been briefed not only on our concerns but our activities.

We were remarkably, though by no means completely, successful with a number of issues in the Senate only to see most of those successes negated by the Joint Conference Committee.

This is mentioned in this section of the report since much of our concern centered on the punitive legislative considerations related to the activity of voter registration.

Mr. Jordan, project director, carried the major burden of interpreting our reasons for concern relating to voter registration. Not surprisingly, his work on this issue was superior.

In early 1970, Mr. Jordan resigned from the Council to become Executive Director of the United Negro College Fund. I trust it goes without saying that I -- and all connected with the Council -- deeply regretted this decision and saw it as a real loss to SRC and to the region. Our only consolation is that we are confident Vernon will do the same remarkably superior job in his new position as he has done here and we do feel the black colleges of the nation, most of them in the South, need continued and substantially increased support.

Vernon and his family leave Atlanta with all the gratitude and wishes for the future that those of us here can give.

In early 1970, the Executive Committee approved the appointment of Mr. John Lewis to become the new director of the Voter Education Project. Again we are fortunate in having this outstanding young man step into this position which, under the new tax law, may be even more demanding than the directorship of the project has been in the past.

(And thus, incidentally, we continue one of the Council's "silent programs." That is finding, training, and -- most importantly -- giving the freedom of initiative to outstanding talent and then exporting that talent to the rest of the nation. We have mixed feelings about this program. It is a contribution and we are grateful for that aspect of it. But, understandably, we wonder how much longer this region can export its best leadership and resolve its own problems at the same time.)

THE SRC RESOURCES DEVELOPMENT CENTER

In March, 1969, the Executive Committee approved the creation of the Center. There were several reasons why we felt it desirable to create the Center at this time. The most overwhelming reason, in our opinion, is that regional economic development and the development and utilization of human resources should now be among our highest priorities. Many individuals and groups are looking for information on which to make decisions relative to economic development. They may accept accurate and thorough information more readily than in the past and they may make the right decisions if that information is available. Also, mistakes are now being made which lead to the building of ghettos, the wooing of undesirable industry, the squandering of resources -- human and natural -- which, however difficult, can be corrected with less effort and costs than some years hence.

Further, we believe that to the degree possible, we must think and interpret in the broadest terms of economic development. Certainly, as in other areas, the Council would want to maintain a particular sensitivity to racial factors, but we believe this program, and the needs with which it is concerned, is particularly economic and that we can be more effective if we interpret it within this context.

We feel, too, that we need the Center as a structural means to achieve greater coordination in our present efforts in this area. As indicated earlier, we are doing a number of things toward the ends of development, but the fragmented approach which we have followed does not lend itself to efficiency or maximum results. Our experience with the Voter Education Project showed that a large program, identified by its major interests and directed by an individual who takes considerable program and administrative responsibility and some fund-raising responsibility, is workable and efficient. The results of the Center to date have again borne out that conclusion.

In January, 1970, Dr. Emory F. Via was appointed Center Director. Formerly he had been Director of our Labor Education Project. We are extremely fortunate to have a person of his ability to be the first director of this new Council effort.

THE HOUSING AND PLANNING DIVISION

During the first half of 1969, this project continued essentially as a one-man operation, directed by Moreland Griffith Smith, FAIA. On June 1, 1969, Arthur C. Campbell, Planner, started his services with the Southern Regional Council. This culminated a long process of working toward enlargement of the scope of the Housing and Planning Project as well as to reinforcing SRC's service with black professionals.

Mr. Campbell is a native of Waugh, Alabama. He is a product of Montgomery County's school system. From there,

Mr. Campbell went to Tuskegee Institute from which he has a Bachelor of Science in Architecture. He has completed his academic work for his Masters in Planning at Georgia Tech and he is now in the process of completing his thesis.

In spite of the enactment of the first federal Civil Rights Housing law, there has been noncompliance, as has been the case with all of the other civil rights laws. Attitudes have hardened, resistance techniques have been perfected, the mood of the country has moved ever to the right. Since the federal government is seen as a monster handing down decrees from afar, it becomes increasingly important to work to change the attitudes on the grass-roots level.

Local fair housing groups have sprung up all over the country. These can be used as vehicles for change. The SRC Housing and Planning Project will continue to work with these groups to soften community attitudes and to bring about the enactment of local housing laws. Some of these groups have obtained foundation funds to aid blacks in financing integrated housing. This aspect needs to be broadened.

In the past, throughout the South, there has been considerable dispersion of black residential areas. However, the southern pattern has changed rapidly in recent years to parallel more closely urban solutions in the North. Interstate highways and rapid transit as well as railroads are at present commonly designed to prevent easy access between white and black neighborhoods. Further, buffer zones force circuitous patterns of circulation. The Housing and Planning Project continues to work with local planning groups to stress the desirability of more free and equal circulation.

The open-occupancy legislation opens up opportunities for bolder solutions for total city planning -- land use, intra-city transportation, inter-neighborhood communication, proximity of jobs to housing -- which can contribute to a healthier economic base and thus appeal to the business interests within the city.

If we are to have an open society, urban planning is a necessity. As an illustration: The implementation of school desegregation would be greatly facilitated if neighborhoods were desegregated. The SRC project cannot make an impact solely through its own efforts alone. Resources and staff are inadequate. It will, however, continue to work in this area, and especially seek to influence others to take up this fight. It will seek to develop financing for research papers that will call attention to the need for action, and thus enlist others in this cause.

The division continues to encourage the private sector to participate in urban planning areas in order to broaden the base of interest within the city in order to reach all economic strata. It is felt this can be done by encouraging the awareness of the American Institute of Planners, the American Institute of Architects, the Chamber of Commerce, as well as the neighborhood organizations, in addition to organizations which SRC has advised and worked with, such as:

1. Southwest Atlantans for Progress;
2. The Housing Committee - Houston Council on Human Relations;
3. New Orleans Consortium;
4. The Arkansas Council on Human Relations;
5. The Georgia Council on Human Relations;
6. The North Carolina Council on Human Relations;
7. The South Carolina Council on Human Relations;
8. The Tennessee Council on Human Relations;
9. The Virginia Council on Human Relations;
10. The American Friends Service Committee;
11. Ansley Park Fair Housing;
12. Metropolitan Atlanta Housing Conference;
13. The Mayor's Committee on Housing Resources;
14. The Mayor's Code Committee;
15. HUD, nationally and regionally.

In recent months, it appears that past efforts to obtain cooperation from the national and state professional societies is bringing fruit and in the months to come, we will be able to report more substantial efforts by the AIP and the AIA in education and employment of minority groups.

Housing and Planning Since June, 1969, and Its Future.--Two summer interns working with this program did an evaluation of youth participation in Model Cities while actually conducting a program in which young people participated.

Housing and Planning, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Campbell, developed a filing system for project materials.

Arthur Campbell participated in a tour of European new towns sponsored by Urban America, Inc. This tour was to familiarize participants with the new town concept and industrialized building. He is presently working with a Tenant's Association in Harlem, Florida (Clewiston), engaged in evaluating the circumstances in Harlem to help determine what route the community should take to get new housing built. We will probably become involved in preparing preliminary site plans and preliminary design of structures.

We will begin surveying small towns (5,000 population and below) throughout the South to determine what kind of advocacy planning assistance our program might provide. Such surveys should provide some insight into the following areas:

1. What community groups exist and how effective have they been?

2. Who has the responsibility for housing planning and implementation?

3. Adequacy of the housing supply.

4. What housing programs are presently underway?

5. What are the obstacles to solving the town's problems?

6. How well have housing problems been defined and documented by existing data?

7. How much concern is there about town problems?

8. What policies exist relative to housing?

9. What are the town's or the community groups' objectives?

10. What planning activity is underway?

11. What kind of assistance does the town or community group need?

12. What problems are apparent that the city needs to be made aware of?

COMMUNITY ORGANIZATION DIVISION

The Community Organization Division, directed by Mr. John Lewis and assisted by Mr. Stanley Alexander, has functioned as a source for information and technical assistance for poor indigenous groups in the South. This project has provided small grants to groups and organizations developed by poor people in various communities in our region. The objectives of the Community Organization Project have been: (1) to provide technical assistance to existing and developing poor organizations; (2) to assist communal groups and organizations in the drafting and writing of proposals; (3) to assist groups and cooperatives in recruiting consultants or experts for certain special problem areas.

During the past decade, community organization has become one of the most important mechanisms for mobilizing poor people and getting things done. It has helped to develop meaningful programs for poor people by enabling them to develop their own human resources. This brings out undiscovered abilities and new leadership in poor communities. There is a great need for encouragement. There remains a great number of communities that lack support, socially and financially, in order to accomplish their goals. Some poor communities are untouched and uninformed about their rights to participate in the decision-making process in their region. It will take time, money, and energy to accomplish these ends. There are still existing in our society poor blacks and whites who are starving, working for low wages, and living in bad housing. There is a great deal to be done and poor people can do it for themselves if they are given the opportunity and resources.

The division has discovered through its endeavors that a large number of poor organizations are developing in the South with little or no financial support or technical assistance. They usually consist of poor persons who have become dissatisfied with their conditions and have decided to do something. In many cases, these groups are uninformed about governmental procedures and operations. Sometimes they become discouraged about the lack of support, accomplishments, and eventually dissolve their organization. If persons of experience were accessible to local organizations that couldn't afford technical assistance, this would be a step in correcting the organizational problems of poor people. However, we have tried in the past year to help such groups and organizations to become more realistic in dealing with their problems. In some instances, our limited resources have prevented us from responding to the needs and demands requested by these poor people.

Securing funds from large funding sources is becoming more and more difficult. The smaller and the least recognized poor groups and organizations do not know how to apply for funds from large foundations or agencies. There is a need for a regional program designed to help groups and organizations to develop programs that are within reason for larger support. Many groups need technical assistance in the drafting of proposals, securing trained persons, and developing a program that is applicable to local conditions. It will take money in the essential stage for groups to develop this kind of awareness. In some instances, many groups need funds immediately to sustain their organization.

We recognize that seed money and initial technical assistance is only the beginning for community development; yet it is a starting point for some communities, having the hope that something can be done to upgrade their conditions. The Community Organization Project can play a significant role in bringing about social change in the lives of southern poor people. It functions as an emergency source for some communities and a consultant for others. This project also functions to assist foundations and agencies in locating communities in need of help. In the past, we have accompanied foundation representatives who have expressed an interest in some communities in Alabama, Georgia, North Carolina, Mississippi, and others.

Recently, the Community Organization Project revised a Community Organization Handbook to be distributed to various organizations and agencies. This is a simple step-by-step guide for persons beginning work as community organizers. The Urban League, poverty programs, and other private organizations and agencies are using the handbook for training sessions and for information.

During the past year, the Community Organization Project has awarded 25 grants to various organizations, both black and white. We have made grants ranging from the support of a day care center in the Black Belt of Alabama, to the support of poor white organizations for business development in the Appalachian area. Recently, one organization received its license from the state for the operation of a day care center.

In the coming year, the Community Organization Project will function as an information agency for poor groups who requested our assistance. Hopefully, this project can provide technical assistance to such groups with developing programs and gaining local support needed for their programs. We will assist community groups in the writing and drafting of proposals and hopefully become involved with groups in the field which will allow us to gain further insight into the problems of various communities.

MANPOWER AND LABOR DIVISION

The year has seen the continued expansion of the areas of interest to the Labor Project. In essence, this expansion has been a move toward greater emphasis on manpower problems in general. The program's emphasis on labor education activities has continued as has its interest in employment discrimination as a part of the overall manpower problem. The program director participated in several week-long educational institutes ranging from the summer school of a national union, through a union-university program to train labor leaders for work with poverty programs, to a national training program for labor leaders with a special assignment to work with local manpower programs.

Other educational conferences of shorter duration were assisted both by direct participation and in securing others to participate. Union staff people, local union leaders, and state labor leaders were included in these sessions. Problems of prejudice, employment discrimination, union social responsibilities, changing regional economic and social conditions, and the school desegregation process were among the topics discussed. These meetings ranged from staff training programs for one of the textile workers unions, to a Texas AFL-CIO joint labor law and women's activities institute, to a special session with building trade unions.

Other educational programs included a special conference jointly sponsored with the U. S. Bureau of Labor Statistics on an employment study made of the Atlanta area. Other programs worked with union members assigned to serve as "buddies" to newly employed disadvantaged workers and with orienting community organizers to job discrimination problems and to unions as social institutions.

The labor project has continued to work with programs attempting to facilitate the entry of minority workers into the construction trades. Work has also continued in a joint project with other agencies in assisting the desegregation process in textile industry employment. In addition to those areas, we have consulted and provided evaluative assistance to a program training workers in a paper industry company to increase their ability to move into new job classifications. A small pilot project was initiated to provide both information and experience in breaking employment barriers in the printing trades.

During the year, two research projects have been sponsored by the Labor Project which have developed some new materials regarding the situation of poor whites in the region. One study was aimed at securing information on poor white organizations throughout the region. A second study took one neighborhood in a metropolitan area and investigated the social role of the religious organizations indigenous to the area. Substantial assistance was given to a study of state and local taxes which became the first publication of the Resources Development Center. Consultative assistance was offered to a wide variety of groups and individuals. These have included assistance to a university research effort looking at special factors in black-white confrontations, advice regarding some aspects of minority entrepreneurship, assisting with advice and contacts with experts a church denomination (statewide) effort to change employment training patterns and to encourage minority business efforts, to advising on programs aimed at increasing minority employment in state government.

The division has continued to give encouragement to unions and universities toward the end of establishing full-time labor education programs at southern universities. The director serves on the advisory committee of the program that has been established at V.P.I.

LEADERSHIP DIVISION

The Leadership Project was established in mid-February with Reese Cleghorn, former associate editor of the Atlanta Journal, as director and Katherine S. Griffith, former chief research librarian with C & S National Bank, as assistant to the director. Its objective is to reach a broad range of southern leadership. Because of its limited resources and the particular professional training of the director and his assistant, we have chosen to do this primarily with publications.

The project has defined its target groups as leaders at various levels: traditional corporate, civic, labor union and religious leadership, as well as emerging grass-roots leadership. An underlying assumption is that SRC needs to do more to make contact with those leaders who evidence some social concern, or are open to social change, but who have not been sufficiently reached by the kind of materials which SRC has produced in the past.

At the outset, the Leadership Project carefully constructed a 23-category list of leaders in the southern states. No effort was made to make this a comprehensive list of the South's most influential leaders; but great care was taken to make it a list of representative leaders in various fields. Some examples of the categories: (1) bankers (every fourth banker listed in the Bankers' Directory, six states); (2) chamber of commerce executives (chosen at random from directories, 11 states); (3) bar association leaders (officers and directors of state bar associations, 11 states); (4) religious leaders (for instance, as one part of this category, all members of district boards of social concerns of the Methodist Church). The new Leadership List now totals approximately 5,000 names.

Leadership Project publications are sent to this list of 5,000 names, as well as to 5,000 other names on SRC's regular mailing lists. The publication South Today also goes to others, as noted below.

Publications:

The Leadership Project has limited itself to two kinds of publications: booklets and a monthly newspaper.

Booklets:

The first of the Leadership Series of booklets, John Willie Reed, by Charles Longstreet Weltner, was issued in May. It tells of the plight of an unskilled, uneducated black migrant from rural Alabama who moved to Atlanta and encountered the problems that confront hundreds of thousands of others of similar backgrounds who have moved into American cities. A guide for discussion leaders, included in the booklet, raises questions of public and private policy. This booklet has received widespread attention through reviews in such diverse publications as the London Observer, Presbyterian Survey, the Chicago Daily Defender, and a number of southern newspapers. It has been used in the training program of the Atlanta Police Department and as discussion material for churches, unions, and civic organizations, as well as in college courses. An Atlanta television station shortly will tell the John Willie Reed story in documentary form. Alliance Theatre of Atlanta has scheduled a play based upon the booklet for April.

The second booklet in the Leadership Series, Donnie Gibson and the Chickenbone Special, by Dwayne Walls, was prepared during late 1969 for early 1970 distribution. It tells another story of migration from farm to city.

Newspaper:

South Today, a monthly digest of southern affairs, began publication in July and six issues appeared during 1969. An initial distribution of 10,000 (to the lists noted above) has been expanded to approximately 18,000 (partly as a result of test distributions to members of councils on human relations and testing of newsstand sales). South Today is primarily a digest of magazine and newspaper articles dealing with southern problems of race, poverty, and human relations. It also presents original material by writers from within and from outside the SRC staff. The publication has dealt with such subjects as the Orangeburg police-student conflict, migrant labor camps in Florida, a bank's program of promoting black business ownership, a black manufacturer's success in Alabama, the deprivations of Negroes in the Mississippi Delta, poor whites in Appalachia, and the controversy over Dr. Arthur Jensen's conclusions about race and I.Q. Of special value have been South Today's own reports; responses to them perhaps demonstrate the publication's usefulness in magnifying the impact of SRC in general. Examples:

(1) A report on the spread of "segregation academies" in the South, presenting the first estimates of enrollments in these schools and examining such matters as tax exemptions and accreditation, was quoted by the New York Times, the Washington Post, the Wall Street Journal, U. S. News and World Report, Time, the Associated Press and United Press International, as well as numerous southern newspapers and in specialized publications such as the National Education Association's Scholastic Teacher. We believe it has had a major impact in raising public policy questions about these segregated private schools and their implications for the public schools.

(2) A report on discrimination by the U. S. Department of Agriculture and on the continuing failure of Negroes to win representation on crop-quota committees was quoted by the Wall Street Journal, the Associated Press, the New Republic, the New York Times, and many other newspapers inside and out of the South.

South Today has had a surprisingly good reception from readers in general, and comments from those on the special Leadership Mailing List are enabling the project to assess the receptivity of various categories of southern leadership. Coupons published in the first two issues, asking for comments, brought almost 400 replies by mail, only about 20 of which were negative. Readers suggested, in most cases one name at a time, more than 500 names to be added to the mailing list.

The publication also has had good response in newsstand testing in the metropolitan Atlanta area, and the Leadership Project is making plans (contingent upon sufficient financing) to experiment further with newsstand sales and paid-circulation distribution.

The director of the Leadership Project and his assistant also have been active participants in the work of SRC's Resources Development Center, of which the Leadership Project is one component, and in other SRC staff responsibilities. They have participated in the work of conferences on southern economic development, educational problems in Mississippi, and public school integration regionally, as well as a national student press convention and a nationalconvention of Protestant and Catholic editors. They have provided some measure of assistance also to such programs as a leadership training project of the Atlanta Chamber of Commerce and work in black poverty areas of Atlanta.

The director has written articles about southern problems of race and poverty for the New York Times Magazine (on textile industry integration and on public school integration), the New Republic, the London Economist, and other publications. The assistant to the director has provided research assistance to writers and private agencies on matters with which SRC regularly deals.

A SPECIAL PROGRAM

From time to time, the Center will sponsor special programs or projects of short-term duration. The first of these was concerned with relief efforts for the victims of hurricane Camille and was co-sponsored with the American Friends Service Committee. Jim Wood of the SRC staff was responsible for our efforts.

Knowing of the inadequacy of the response of appropriate agencies to the tragedy of hurricane Betsy in Louisiana in 1965, we were anxious that this inadequate response not reoccur after Camille hit Mississippi.

SRC and AFSC decided to take on the task of alerting the appropriate federal agencies to the needs of the stricken area and to urge them to be alert that their local programs of relief reached all of the people on a non-discriminatory basis.

An observer arrived in the area on August 23 and gave his first report to us on the 29th. This report was sufficiently disturbing that we called a meeting in Washington of federal and private agencies and determined that we needed more first-hand information if adequate relief was to be forthcoming. We sent in a four-man team who worked for a three-week period. In addition, we secured Washington staff to relate to the appropriate agencies.

Our work created sufficient attention that Senators Muskie and Bayh requested information from us. They, together with Senator Randolph, Chairman of the Public Works Committee, announced hearings to study the federal response to Camille.

Prior to that hearing the two agencies issued the report, In the Wake of Hurricane Camille: An Analysis of the Federal Response. Senator Muskie entered the report in the Congressional Record and we were asked to appear at the hearing in Mississippi January 7-9.

Of the report, the Washington Evening Star* stated:

> Two national organizations, the American Friends Service Committee and the Southern Regional Council, have issued a lengthy report alleging that "our national response to the victims of Camille was and continues to be sadly inadequate."
>
> The AFSC-SRC report represents a broad and virtually unprecedented indictment of five federal agencies with responsibility for providing disaster aid -- the Office of Emergency Planning, the Department of Housing and Urban Development, the Economic Development Administration, the Small Business Administration, and the Office of Economic Opportunity.
>
> In addition, it is highly critical of a quasi-public organization which seldom has been the target of public attacks in the past -- the American National Red Cross.
> Acknowledging that "the magnitude of the federal effort in reaction to the devastation of Camille was probably unprecedented," the AFSC-SRC report says there nevertheless "were serious inequities in the immediate relief of suffering and there now are serious weaknesses in the planning for long-range reconstruction of the areas affected."

We believe this was an important function for the two agencies, that our role in this situation did make a difference in the amount and kinds of help victims received. Most importantly, we believe future efforts by the private and federal agencies will be more effective and less discriminatory in future disasters.

CONCLUSION

During the year, we prepared a document for the United States Senate Committee on Finance pointing out certain punative provisions of the so-called "tax reform" bill. We did this as respecters of the law in letter and in spirit. That statement concluded with the following:

In conclusion, we believe it most important to stress that this bill, as it relates to foundations and those whom foundations support, is widely regarded to be punitive against those agencies and those foundations dealing with social reform, poverty, and minority affairs.

There are those agencies, of which the Southern Regional Council is one, that have attempted not only to contribute to the general welfare but to bring into reality the potential and the promise of this nation for all of our people. In a sense, it could be said we occupy the middle ground; recognizing need, tragedy, and aspirations on the one hand, and holding on the other hand a deep faith in the ability of this society and this government to be the means by which wrongs can be corrected and the wholesome society created.

In this critical time of crisis, polarization and misunderstanding we urge you, do not cripple -- as this bill would -- those agencies which, with increasing difficulty, are attempting to occupy that middle ground where the faith remains that the capabilities and intent of our government and our society can be equal to our promises.

Only after considerable deliberation did we use the term "middle ground." But we did use it both as a realistic means to appeal to pragmatic reasoning, and as an honorable means of speaking truth.

The forces of this nation during 1969 saw to it that that precious -- already narrowing -- middle ground was eroded almost to nonexistence. This was harmful to the likes of the Southern Regional Council, but those parochial considerations are picayune compared to the implications for the nation.

This country cannot survive, it cannot be the democracy which ought to be its aim, and it cannot be the land of true wealth which is its potential, with those forces now manipulating this country and growing deliberately in power as they deliberately manipulate power.

It has been my custom in preparing these annual reports to indulge in an introduction of analysis and a conclusion of some commentary.

In early 1970, the following comments may suffice for our operation last year.

In 1969, the Council operated adequately and at times effectively. We had outstanding staff and sound policy leadership. We used our resources efficiently. Our existence was felt. We survived.

The forces of decency and reform lost badly during 1969. It would be foolish of us not to anticipate an even greater loss in 1970 -- and perhaps thereafter.

We at the Council experienced what the greater society experienced; at times we were uncertain, at times there was division and confusion. Thankfully, there were, too, times of certainty, unity, and force.

Nineteen-seventy will obviously be a year of adversity for the Council, but not the first. It is not new for us to operate in a hostile atmosphere. Nor will it be the first year when we prove this is not an agency of sunshine soldiers.

By a rare and cherished privilege, I can, for the moment, speak for this good and permanent operation. We believe in humanity. We are committed to democracy. Our operation in 1970 will reflect that belief and that commitment.

INTRODUCTION

Voting power gives you a say-so in your city, county and state government. There is nothing secret about voting power. It comes about when you and others who share your views organize to get people to:

1. register to vote.
2. go to the polls on election day.

But to get voting power you must do more than just register and vote. You must learn and teach others how to use their voting power wisely. In order to use your voting power wisely, one of the things you need to know is how the government is set up.

This booklet explains some things about how government in South Carolina is set up. In South Carolina, as in other states, we have three basic kinds of government: city, county and state.

Everybody comes under the state government. It has more power than the other two. Everybody comes under a county government, but only those people who live in a town or city come under city government.

CITY AND COUNTY GOVERNMENTS GET THEIR POWER FROM THE STATE GOVERNMENT

The General Assembly, the state law-making body which meets in Columbia, governs the state with the help of the city and county governments and other governing bodies. The General Assembly tells the city and county governments what kinds of jobs they can do. It gives the local government the power to do these jobs.

The General Assembly does not give all the 46 county governments exactly the same jobs and power. This is also true for city governments. Some cities in South Carolina have more power than others.

CITY GOVERNMENT

Town and city governments are called municipal governments. The main job of municipal governments is to provide services to the people who live in the towns and cities. Another job is to protect the people. Some of the jobs of the municipal governments are to:

- Provide police and fire protection.
- Build and keep up the streets.
- Provide street lighting and sidewalks.
- Pick up garbage.
- Inspect buildings and houses to make sure they are safe.
- Build and maintain a water and sewage system and other public works, such as playgrounds, community centers, libraries, and public housing.
- Plan for the growth of the city.

In order to do these jobs, municipal governments have certain powers. Some of these powers are to:

- Plan the spending of city money.
- Collect property taxes and other taxes.
- Appoint heads of departments, such as police chief, fire chief, head of the water department, and head of the sanitation department, who in turn hire and fire other city workers.
- Pass ordinances (laws for the town or city) about municipal affairs—local speed and parking laws, rules about garbage collection, rules about how and where buildings and houses can be built, and so on.

There are two major forms of municipal government in the state. One is the council-manager form, in which the voters elect the city council which in turn appoints a trained city manager as chief administrator for the city. The other is the mayor-council form, in which the voters elect the chief official, the mayor, and the councilmen or members of the city council.

The job of running the city government is divided into departments: fire, police, water, sewage, street, building inspection and garbage collection. An important officer is appointed to head and run each department.

MAYOR-COUNCIL FORM

In the council-manager form of city government one of the members of the City Council serves as mayor. This mayor can be elected by the voters. The City Council makes up the budget and passes city laws. The City Manager carries out these laws and runs the government from day to day. Often he appoints the heads of the different departments.

CITY ELECTIONS

Some city and municipal elections are non-partisan in South Carolina. All towns and cities in the state elect a mayor and city council.

Candidates for mayor and city councilmen may be nominated in one of the following ways:

1. Nomination by city-wide party primary.
2. Nomination by a city-wide party convention.
3. Nomination by petition, containing the required number of signatures. This varies depending on the population of the town or city.
4. In towns with 500 population or less, nomination by direct filing as a candidate for municipal office at the City Hall is possible in some cases.

Sometimes candidates for city council are elected at-large in city elections—that is by all the voters of a city. In other cities, councilmen are elected by voters of each ward.

There are many different ways of electing city officials in South Carolina. Voters in towns or cities should check with a city official or community leader who can be trusted about how city officials are elected in their particular town or city.

If the voter has a registration certificate and lives within the city limits, he can vote in city or town elections.

COUNTY GOVERNMENT

South Carolina has 46 counties. The main job of county government is to act for the state in providing services for the people—education, health, welfare and so on. Another important job of the county government is carrying out laws. County governments do not have much power to make laws.

Some of the jobs of the county government are to:

- Decide how much money is needed to give the people the services they need. The county government must then set the local tax rate and collect the taxes.
- Run the schools and the health and welfare departments with the help of the school, health and welfare boards.
- Build and keep up the courthouse, jail and other public buildings, such as libraries.
- Enforce state laws.
- Keep records of important papers, such as marriage licenses and deeds to property.
- Provide a place for some of the state courts.
- Help run the elections.

The job of running the county governments is divided between elected officials and persons who are appointed to offices and boards. Some of the elected officials are: County Commissioners, Sheriff, Coroner, Clerk of Court, Probate Judge, County Auditor, County Treasurer, County Superintendent of Education, and in some counties,

School Board members. Some of the appointed officials are: County Attorney, Board of Registration, Election Commissioners, Selective Service Board, County Board of Public Welfare and staff, County Health Board and staff, Veterans' Service Officer, and Library Board and staff.

County commissioners (or, in several counties, county councilmen), where they exist, have more say-so in running the county government than anyone else. They:

- Decide how much money is needed to run the county government and set the tax rate in some counties.
- Appoint other people to county jobs in tax assessment and tax collection, building inspection, etc.
- Serve on some boards themselves such as tax assessment boards, Economic Opportunity boards, county health and county welfare boards.
- Appoint people to boards that are under county control.
- Have some power to start projects to help people. They can do this by calling for a bond election to improve and build hospitals, schools, libraries, sewage and water systems.

OFFICIALS APPOINTED BY THE COUNTY COMMISSIONERS

Most counties have five members on the County Board of Commissioners, and in most counties the county commissioners serve four-year terms.

There is no one way to elect county commissioners in South Carolina. All the county commissioners are elected at one time in some counties, in others they are elected at different times. Some of the ways in which county commissioners are elected are:

a. In some counties the county commissioners are elected from districts within the county by the voters in that district.
b. In some counties the county commissioners are elected to represent districts, but they are elected by all the voters in the county.
c. In some counties the county commissioners are elected at-large by all the county voters.
d. In some counties some of the commissioners or one of the total number are elected at-large, and the others are elected by voters in the districts.

The best way to find out how the county commissioners are elected in a given county is to check with elected officials at the county courthouse or with some leader whom you trust in your community.

COUNTY BOARDS ON WHICH COMMISSIONS MAY SERVE AND MAY APPOINT MEMBERS, WHEN AUTHORIZED BY LAW.

Some of the other elected county officials and their duties are:

- Sheriff
  1. Chief law enforcement officer of the county.
  2. Appoints deputies as needed within the budget.
  3. Preserves the peace and arrests persons who have committed crimes.
  4. May call others to assist in arrest of persons as in a posse comitatus.
  5. Executive officer of the circuit court and must attend all its sessions.
  6. He or his deputies serve, deliver, and return every rule, order or notice addressed to him by the circuit court.
  7. Responsible for the county jail (in most cases).
- Coroner
  1. Holds inquests over all bodies which have met with mysterious or violent deaths within the county.
  2. Summons jurors and witnesses necessary for conducting the inquest.
  3. Acts as temporary sheriff if there is a vacancy or when sheriff is personally connected with a case.
  4. Coroner is the only county official who can arrest the sheriff.
- Clerk of Court
  1. Acts as secretary of the circuit court.
  2. Keeps records and is custodian of all county records, deeds, mortgages, etc.
- County School Board
  1. Work with County Superintendent of Education.
  2. Fill vacancies on the board until elections are held (where elected).
  3. Act as board of appeals from decisions made by district board of trustees.
- County Superintendent of Education
  1. Approves applications for state aid.
  2. Supervises schools for the county board.
  3. Keeps financial records.
- County Auditor
  1. Chief officer for assessing taxes in the county.
  2. May have a board of assessors to assist him.
- County Treasurer
  1. Handles all tax money paid to the county.
  2. Handles all payment of money by the county.
  3. Keeps records of all tax monies by school district.
- Probate Judge
  1. Deals with estates and wills.
  2. Issues and records marriage licenses.
  3. Handles the affairs of the mentally incompetent and minors.

All the county officials, except for some county school boards, are elected in partisan elections. This means that people run for office as a member of a political party. County officials are elected in primary and general elections.

SCHOOL DISTRICTS

The most numerous unit of government in our state is the school district. In some counties there is only one school district for the entire county. This is called the county unit system. In other counties there are several school districts within the county. In some counties that have the unit system the county is divided into school areas. Each of these school areas is under an area superintendent.

Every school in the state is under the control of a school board which is made up of several school board members or trustees. This school board makes the policies, picks the district or area superintendent of schools, who is responsible to the school board for the principals and teachers hired for the various schools within the district or area. Citizens usually take their school problems to the district or area superintendent of schools of the school district or area in which they live, and to the School Board of that district.

The county government in which a particular school is located collects local taxes for schools within that county and keeps records of these taxes by school districts. The county government sometimes controls how much tax can be collected within each school district.

In districts or counties where school boards are elected, voters can control the actions of the school board members more directly. This is not the case in districts or counties where schools board are appointed. Every citizen should try to find out how school board members are selected in his county or school district.

STATE GOVERNMENT

The state government is divided into three parts just like the United States government. The three parts are:

- Executive. This part is made up of the Governor, other elected officials and appointed officials and boards. The job of this branch is to run the government and enforce the laws.
- Legislative. This is the General Assembly which meets in Columbia. This branch makes the laws about how the government is to be run.
- Judicial. This part is made up of the different courts of law. The job of this branch is to decide questions of law and help punish those who are proved guilty of crimes.

THE EXECUTIVE BRANCH

The job of the executive branch is to run the government and see that the laws are carried out. The Governor is head of the executive branch. The Governor has persons who help him do the work of the executive branch. Some of these people are appointed by him and others are elected by the people.

The Governor has a lot of power. He serves on many important boards himself. He appoints others to offices and boards. The General Assembly (legislature) also selects many of the very important boards and commissions.

The Governor has other jobs like telling the legislature what laws he thinks are needed. He is the commander of the National Guard and may use the Highway Patrol during emergencies.

Boards and commissions are important groups of people given the orders and duty to do a certain job for the government of the state. The Governor and the General Assembly share the power to make appointments to these positions. This power gives the Governor and the legislators great influence in the state government and also in the political party to which they may belong. People are willing to be loyal to the Governor and work for the party if they have a chance of getting jobs that pay well. The people appointed to these jobs and boards have a lot of power. They have a lot of say about how people live—whether they get good schools, highways, health care, etc.

Some of the boards and commissions of the executive branch are:

- STATE BOARD OF EDUCATION. The members of this board are elected by legislative delegations from the 16 Judicial Circuits. This board oversees the running of the public schools in the counties and cities. It decides such things as teacher requirements and salary scales.
- DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WELFARE. The members of this board are elected by the General Assembly, one member from each Congressional District and a chairman from the state at large. The job of this board is to oversee the running of the welfare department at the state and county levels. This board hires a director to run the State Department of Public Welfare.
- STATE BOARD OF HEALTH. This body is made up of the South Carolina Medical Association, the South Carolina Attorney General, and the Comptroller General of the state. An Executive Committee of 11 members is appointed by the Governor. One of the jobs of this board is to enforce health laws.
- EMPLOYMENT SECURITY COMMISSION. Three members make up this commission and they are elected by the General Assembly. A job of this commission is to run the employment offices in the state and to pay unemployment compensation to people who are out of work and are eligible to receive these benefits.
- STATE HIGHWAY DEPARTMENT. The 16 members of the State Highway Commission which governs the Highway Department are elected by the legislative delegations from counties in each of the Judicial Circuits. The State Highway Patrol is part of the operation of the State Highway Department.

- STATE INDUSTRIAL COMMISSION. The six members of this commission are appointed by the Governor with the approval of the State Senate. The Governor designates one of the members as chairman. This commission runs the workmen's compensation system, which sees that workers injured on the job get paid for their injuries.
- STATE TAX COMMISSION. The three members of this commission are appointed by the Governor with the approval of the State Senate. This commission is responsible for seeing that the tax laws are carried out and all the state taxes are collected.
- STATE PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION. There are seven members on this commission. They are elected by the General Assembly. This commission sets the rates that people have to pay companies for electricity, telephone, natural gas, and bus and railroad fares.
- STATE ELECTION COMMISSION. This commission has five members, at least one of whom shall be a member of the majority political party and at least one of whom shall be a member of the largest minority political party. Commission members are appointed by the Governor. They supervise the registration of voters through the county boards of registration.

Another important power of the Governor is to help make the laws. The Governor tells the General Assembly what laws he thinks are needed. He also tells the General Assembly how much he thinks it should cost to run the state government and how the money should be spent. The State Budget and Control Board figures out the expenses and the tax income and helps the Governor do this. In South Carolina the Governor can veto all or part of a state law passed by the General Assembly. And because he has something to say about the budget and can make many appointments, he still has a lot of power with the General Assembly.

up.

Some executive officers of the state are elected:

- Lieutenant Governor. Sometimes the Governor is not able to serve all of his term of office. Then the Lieutenant Governor takes the place of the Governor. The Lieutenant Governor presides over the State Senate.
- Secretary of State. He keeps the records of the state. He has the state laws printed, and approves charters for corporations.
- Attorney General. He is the chief lawyer of the state. He advises the Governor and other state officials about state laws. He represents the state in the courts.
- Comptroller General. He is the state bookkeeper. He looks at the public bills owed by the state. If he feels the bills are right, he asks the Treasurer to pay them.
- State Treasurer. He takes care of all fees, taxes and income that comes to the state. He pays all the bills of the state.

- State Superintendent of Education. He works with the schools of the state. Some of his jobs are to help the schools have better education programs and to see that state school laws are obeyed.
- Commissioner of Agriculture. He is head of the Department of Agriculture. The job of this department is to see that laws having to do with farming are carried out.
- Adjutant General. He administers the affairs of the National Guard in the state and keeps all military records of the National Guard and State Guard.

The Governor and the other executive officers are elected in primary and general elections. The executive officers are elected every four years in even numbered years like 1970, 1974, and 1976. The Governor cannot run again for governor until at least four years have passed and another governor has served a term of office.

OFFICERS, BOARDS AND COMMISSIONS APPOINTED BY GOVERNOR AND GENERAL ASSEMBLY

ELECTED EXECUTIVE OFFICIALS

THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

The law-making body of the state government is the General Assembly. The General Assembly has the power to make many kinds of laws.

The General Assembly can make laws about money matters. It can make laws about how much and what kind taxes people and companies have to pay. It can decide how much of the tax money the different departments—education, health, welfare highways, prisons and so on—will get.

The General Assembly can make laws about companies that do business in the state. For example, it can require that the companies pay their workers a certain minimum wage. It can pass laws that make it easy or hard for workers to join unions. The General Assembly can pass laws to start new projects that will give people jobs and help people live better. It can pass laws so that the state and local governments can take part in the many federal programs that will help the people.

The General Assembly of South Carolina is made up of two parts: the State Senate and the State House of Representatives. The Senate has 46 members (senators) who are elected for four years. The House has 124 members that are elected every two years. The General Assembly meets in the State House in Columbia every year beginning in January and meeting every week, sometimes as late as July before adjourning.

Members of the General Assembly are elected in primary elections (in June) and general elections (in November) just like the executive officers are elected. Members of the House are elected on every even-numbered year like 1970, 1972, 1974. Senators are elected every four years.

The state is divided into senatorial districts. Members of the Senate are elected by the voters in each district (See map of senatorial districts). Every district is made up of one or more counties. Many districts have two or more counties. Some districts elect only one senator. Others elect two or more senators from their district depending on the population.

Members of the State House of Representatives are elected from each of the 46 counties, and the number of representatives from each county depends on the population. Some counties will have as many as ten state representatives; others will have only one.

Senatorial Districts

COURTS

The judicial branch of South Carolina government is made up of six types of courts.

The highest court in the state system is the South Carolina Supreme Court, consisting of five judges elected by the General Assembly for ten-year terms. One job of the Supreme Court is to hear appeals from the lower courts in the state. If a person does not believe he has been given a fair trial in the lower courts, he may appeal his case to the Supreme Court. Another job of the Supreme Court is to decide if laws are in agreement with the South Carolina Constitution.

The next level of the judicial system is found in the 16 circuit courts in the state. Sixteen judges, one from each judicial circuit (see map on next page), are elected for four-year terms by the General Assembly. The Circuit Court is divided into the Court of General Sessions, which hears criminal cases only, and the Court of Common Pleas, which hears civil (suits for money and non-criminal matters) cases only. There is a state lawyer in each judicial circuit called the Solicitor. He is elected by the voters in each judicial district for a four-year term. He represents the state in criminal cases and is also known as the prosecutor.

A third level of the judicial system in South Carolina is that of the special courts created by the General Assembly. These are Juvenile Courts, Domestic Relations Courts, and County Courts in the counties with large populations. County Courts deal with minor offenses at the local level.

The fourth type of court is the Probate Court, through which the Probate Judge deals with estates, wills, marriage licenses and minors, and handles the affairs of the mentally incompetent.

The fifth type, the Magistrate Courts, deal with minor civil and criminal offenses usually, but not always, of not more than $100 claims in civil cases, and fines of not over $100 or jail sentences of not more than thirty days in criminal cases. In some of the counties the limit is higher, sometimes $200 and sixty days.

The sixth type of court is the Municipal Court. This court tries cases which involve violations of city ordinances or laws.

CONCLUSION

This booklet doesn't tell you all you need to know about South Carolina government—that would take a booklet many times this size. But it does tell you some of the important things every citizen of the state should know. You should ask for details of how your county, city or town government works from some reliable leader in your community who knows your county or city.

There is other information available that can tell you more about government and citizenship. This information about voter registration, election rights, precinct meetings and other important matters is available for individuals and groups for workshops which can be held in your community by the South Carolina Voter Education Project. If you would like to have a workshop in your town or neighborhood or would like to have a copy of other materials on voting education, get in touch with:

THIS SURVEY: WHY?

Americans have a reputation for a warm and ready response to the victims of floods, hurricanes, tornadoes and earthquakes. When such disasters strike, clothes, food and funds pour out to the suffering people from communities across the land.

The immediate response last August to the victims of vicious Hurricane Camille reflected those generous and humane qualities. Camille was a storm of unprecedented force, with winds that travelled 200 miles an hour and waves that reached over 30 feet. As she hit the Gulf Coast areas of Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama, she killed at least 250 people and brought immeasurable suffering and loss to hundreds of thousands more. There was a nationwide outpouring of material aid and offers of assistance to Camille's victims. Observers present in the immediate wake of the storm witnessed countless acts of heroism and service on the part of private citizens and public officials. The magnitude of the federal effort in reaction to the devastation of Camille was probably unprecedented.

Despite all this human concern and these vast resources, our national response to the victims of Camille was, and continues to be sadly inadequate. There were serious inequities in the immediate relief of suffering and there are now serious weaknesses in the planning for long range reconstruction of the areas affected.

Why? Why, with the immediate concern, resources and open-handed response to need, should a coalition of Mississippi anti-poverty and civic action groups have to report one month after Camille struck that "many people on the Gulf Coast are still surviving in squalid conditions, doubling up in neighbor's houses which are damaged and which lack adequate sanitation facilities" and that for lack of adequate information about their rights many people were being victimized by unscrupulous land development speculators and contractors?

And why, one month later still, should the same group of local citizens have to telegraph the Red Cross about lack of adequate relief services for poor people?

Why should a team of private agency observers report that as of late September significant numbers of people in the nine or ten county area of Mississippi affected by the storm were still suffering from inadequate access to food or facilities where food could be prepared or stored; a lack of adequate transportation and communication; a serious lack of knowledge about where to go among the maze of private and public agencies purporting to help families and individuals; and an excess of rumors regarding food, housing loans, and other forms of help -- rumors which tended to deter people from finding solutions to their problems?

The American Friends Service Committee and the Southern Regional Council, with important assistance from staff of the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund and many individuals and organizations in Mississippi, searched for answers to these questions. The report which follows is a summary of our major findings and recommendations. It is our hope that a penetrating look at the response to Hurricane Camille may bring additional action now to meet continuing urgent needs and that it may also bring some further understanding of what lies behind the nation's inability to cope well with the consequences of such disasters.

Our release of this report is based on the expectation of enlightened responsiveness from those who control the resources needed to solve the real and painful problems found in the aftermath of a disaster such as Camille.

In the week following Hurricane Camille, we sent a lone observer, familiar with the area, on a trip across the Gulf Coast and into some of the inland towns. On the basis of his report, we queried federal officials as to the exact nature of their responsibilities and about the resources available for meeting some of the needs described. In mid-September, a team of four spent three weeks in the affected area -- primarily in Mississippi, but also in neighboring states hit by the hurricane. They travelled 2500 miles, interviewed over 275 different people, including private citizens -- rich and poor, black and white -- public officials, community leaders, and organization representatives. Their work was supplemented by a special effort in Washington, manned by two professionals, one loaned by the Washington Research Project. In October, one of the original Mississippi team members returned to the Gulf Coast so that our information and observations could be kept fresh.

Our focus has been on the response of government and those private agencies with which it shares responsibilities. The federal government is the major force in the nation's response to natural disasters. It has the capacity and responsibility to mobilize massive resources quickly. We studied the policies and organization behind the federal operations in relation to Hurricane Camille and we sought to isolate the factors responsible for continued and widespread dissatisfaction on the part of the victims of that hurricane.

The documentation of specific complaints in crises following such events as hurricanes is extremely difficult, but given the persistence and consistency of such complaints, and taking into account the unsolved problems of racial and economic exclusion in communities to which natural disasters often come, the probability of the basic validity of the complaints is high.

It is undeniable that the way society is organized to deal with critical community problems in normal situations will influence its style and capacity in dealing with a crisis, as a result of which the usual, unsolved and already critical problems are made worse. But for precisely this reason, disaster personnel might be expected to develop unusual sensitivity and new capacities to reach out to those who -- already "stricken" in their normal lives by the man-made disasters of poverty and denial of rights and opportunity -- suffer terribly when natural disaster strikes them also.

The on-going work of the AFSC and the SRC concerns the man-made disasters, those which result form man's inhumanity to man. Although the AFSC does have considerable experience in relief work abroad, the Committee and the SRC issue this report against a background of work designed to achieve social and economic justice in this country. We also carried on our explorations and wrote this report against a background of considerable experience over the past decade or more in the region hit by Hurricane Camille.

Most importantly, we conducted our investigations and have written this report out of concern for the people caught in the misery of the aftermath of disaster. Such a concern does not exclude anyone -- rich or poor, black or white. In Mississippi we found a tragic number of "new poor", families who formerly had marginal or middle incomes, and who were suddenly made poor when their possessions were wiped out. Many may never recover their security.

Our concern with people does not deny the importance of rebuilding roads and bridges and businesses, for we know that people must travel to jobs, to schools, to welfare offices and hospitals, and we know there must be jobs again. But in Mississippi, we found inordinate concern with the "suffering" of business and damage to roads and too little concern with the suffering of people, who needed and still need, sensitive help in putting the pieces of their lives together again.

And finally, our concern for people leads us vigorously to support those Mississippi leaders who are insisting that the voices of the black and the poor be heard in the planning for building anew where Camille has destroyed. Indeed, the opportunity to build freshly, abandoning the old patterns of exclusion which have so hampered the development of the area, could be the one bright side to the horror of the aftermath of Camille.

THE GOALS OF FEDERAL DISASTER PROGRAMS: PHYSICAL RECONSTRUCTION AND ECONOMIC RECOVERY

For all practical purposes, the thrust of federal disaster aid is in the direction of physical reconstruction and economic recovery -- necessary, but certainly insufficient aims of public policy. Though no one would minimize the importance of this kind of dealing "with things and not with people", it clearly leaves thousands of disaster victims exposed to misery from which they should be protected.

The Office of Emergency Preparedness. Marshalling the nation's resources in response to a major natural disaster is primarily the function of a single federal agency, the Office of Emergency Preparedness (OEP), which is in the Executive Office of the President. Public Law 81-875, the Disaster Relief Act of 1966, and various executive orders assign OEP exclusive power to "plan and coordinate all Federal programs providing assistance to persons, business concerns, and entities suffering loss as the result of a major disaster" and "to direct any Federal agency to utilize its available personnel, equipment, supplies and facilities." OEP is also the agency which administers the President's disaster relief fund and the agency through which state governors request emergency disaster aid. As a measure of OEP's responsibility in the Camille disaster, government officials estimated in early November 1969 that Mississippi alone would receive between $50 and $60 million from all federal sources, including $6 million from the President's relief fund.*

* - New authority was granted to federal agencies by the Disaster Relief Act of 1969, signed on October 1, after Camille struck.

Despite the magnitude of problems caused by natural disasters, and especially those with the destructive fury of Camille, natural disaster relief is only a minor part of OEP's responsibility. The agency is principally assigned responsibility to prepare the nation for the consequences of armed military attack upon the civilian population. It is concerned with strategic materials stockpiling, establishment of emergency governments ("the national defense executive reserve"), civil defense coordination, public facilities reconstruction, economic stabilization, wartime censorship, and other programs needed for the nonmilitary preparation of a nation attacked. Though its duties in natural disasters are described in the statutes cited above, its main responsibilities are detailed in the Defense Production Act of 1950, the Civil Defense Act of 1950, and implementing executive orders. It is now headed by a retired military official, Brigadier General George A. Lincoln.

OEP's responsibility for civilian defense, with its emphasis on physical and structural preparedness, significantly colors its approach to natural disasters. The agency views its prime responsibilities in natural calamities to be those providing for physical reconstruction of public facilities, debris clearance, and aid to state and local governments. This is made explicit in OEP's "Federal Disaster Handbook for Government Officials." Here, OEP indicates that individual needs will be met primarily by the American National Red Cross, while explaining that "Federal agencies deal primarily with States and local governments..." To a limited degree, this approach is understandable because these obligations are most explicitly defined in the law (P.L. 81-875). Nevertheless, the general leadership responsibilities of OEP are essential to a balanced federal approach to disaster relief and recovery which takes into account both human and physical dilemmas. To date, however, the agency has severely circumscribed its own activities under its general leadership mandate: it is geared to deal with objects and not people, governments and not individuals, systems and not persons. In an interview with our staff, Mr. George Hastings, specially assigned disaster chief for the Camille area on the Gulf Coast, summarized this view when he stated, "We deal with things and not with people."

The Governor's Emergency Council. The primary state body in Mississippi concerned with recovery from Camille is the Governor's Emergency Council. The Council was created by Governor John Bell Williams on September 6, 1969 "to make an immediate determination of all factors that relate to the long range development of the affected area," to explore all avenues of assistance, and "to recommend a comprehensive plan for the accomplishment of the maximum long range development of the area's recreational, cultural, and economic life." Its overriding emphasis is on economic recovery and redevelopment.

The Council is supported by a $495,000 grant from the Economic Development Administration in the U.S. Department of Commerce. Local matching requirements have been waived Its ten members were appointed by the Governor and are all white and all bankers, lawyers, or big businessmen. Only three members live on the Gulf Coast. One is a banker, one a boat and barge company owner, and one a real estate man. With one major exception, the Council has not been involved in immediate, human needs on the coast and other hard-hit areas. It has instead concentrated on such development items as the creation of a uniform building code for the coast communities. (The ultimate objective appears to be the creation of a single metropolitan government along the coast and the construction of a recreational and resort area similar to Miami Beach, Florida.) Nevertheless, disregarding the all-white, non-representative, single-interest character of the Council, the President on September 16 ordered all federal agencies giving disaster aid to Mississippi to "coordinate their activities and efforts through" this body.

NEGLECTED HUMAN ASPECTS OF RECOVERY IN FEDERAL DISASTER PROGRAMS

The failure of OEP to meet its leadership responsibilities in the area of individual human care and the preoccupation of the Emergency Council with economic recovery, has left a vacuum into which rumor, insensitivity, confusion and misdirection have rushed. There is no government-wide plan by which the dimensions of human need are measured after a natural catastrophe occurs. In addition, there are no apparent standards by which OEP can gauge the adequacy of services provided by other federal agencies.

Outreach and Communication. In the aftermath of Camille, there was systematic analysis of destruction of public facilities, but no comparable affirmative federal action to measure accurately the extent of human suffering and disruption. For example, OEP might have taken advantage of the grassroots outreach potential of the Office of Economic Opportunity (OEO) in assessing human needs. Furthermore, OEP apparently ignored OEO's recommendations concerning human need submitted less than three weeks after the hurricane. For example, outreach people to make contact with the elderly poor were not extensively employed nor was provision made for adequate transportation to and from places of employment.

For the most part, human beings who had been physically and mentally disoriented by the awesomeness of a violent storm were required to go to federal offices and describe the extent of their own plight. In some cases, for example SBA, the locations of these loan and aid dispensing offices were not prominently indicated nor sufficiently advertised. In addition HUD's emergency housing policy guidelines regarding available assistance were not laid down quickly nor made public in clear and understandable terms until, as we point out later, more than two months after the hurricane struck. And even then no affirmative effort was made to put the information in the hands of the people whom they might especially concern. Informational flyers were not distributed widely; sound trucks did not travel the back roads nor reach the trailer camps; outreach workers were not extensively employed to seek out those who might need assistance.

This is certainly an ineffective way for the government to comprehend the extent to which a natural disaster has caused hunger, homelessness, mental and physical illness, confusion, and unemployment in a large geographic area serviced by relatively few emergency aid offices. It is difficult to understand why an official agency is willing affirmatively to take steps to measure the extent of physical loss, yet is reluctant to do so for human loss. The remainder of this section describes specific areas in which there has been failure to concentrate on human needs.

HUD and Emergency Housing. Our experience during the Camille disaster has been that the Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) has been highly insensitive to human problems. We can only describe the involvement of this agency in disaster relief as "reluctant." When the hurricane struck, HUD was unprepared to meet its responsibility to provide emergency temporary husing for storm victims.* When the need for emergency housing became apparent, HUD acted quickly to arrange for distribution of mobile homes, but its management of the program has led to great confusion and often public unwillingness to apply for the benefits. Though figures vary, OEP reported in its latest official report (September 25) that in Mississippi alone there were about 4,000 homes destroyed and 12,000 which received major damage, yet applications have never exceeded one third of this total. A general policy outlining the terms of tenancy (whether you have to pay rent, how much you pay, who pays what for utilities and hook-up, how long you can stay, etc.) was not released until October 17, two months after the storm struck. For 60 days after Camille swept the area, those assigned trailers signed a lease which left blank the spaces dealing with amount, if any, of rent.

* - (Though a 1962 Executive Order on emergency preparedness required the Housing and Home Finance Agency, HUD's housing assistance predecessor, to "develop plans for the construction and management of emergency housing..." Though this was an order primarily concerned with armed attack, any plans made presumably would have been effective for natural disasters as well.)

Rumors spread rapidly in this information void. One couple needing housing, for example, told our field staff they would not apply because they heard they would have to pay $85 per month rent plus $150 for utility hook-up. Though many such rumors were not based on fact, the confusion of local HUD representatives in the absence of clear guidance from Washington only heightened speculation. Moreover, HUD originally intended to stop receiving applications for housing by October 10 -- before their explanatory policy came out -- and when we asked HUD officials to extend this deadline because of the local misunderstandings about the program, they responded that they were "unsympathetic" to anyone who had failed to apply. (The deadline was extended 30 days due to last-minute interventions by Senators Hugh Scott, Charles Percy, and Edward Brooke.)

In addition, the tenancy agreement finally announced by HUD allowed for only 90 days free rent instead of the one year permitted by law; no special attempts were made to secure trailers for off-shore counties hit hard by the storm (by late October, only 16 trailers had been delivered to these counties); and, in general, the delivery of trailers has been seriously behind schedule.

Consumer Protection. The general area of consumer protection is also one where the absence of government aid has led to aggravated suffering by victims. Perhaps the most widespread and dramatic example has been in the settling of insurance claims of destroyed homes and property. Private insurance companies dispatched approximately 600 extra insurance adjusters to the hurricane area to settle claims as quickly as possible. The insurance industry reported that by early November 87% of the claims had been settled. In many cases, these claims were settled for 10% - 30% of the face value of the insurance contracts; this situation takes advantage of the victim's desperate need for short cash. Moreover, many claims have been either denied or reduced on the contention of the insurance firms that damages have been caused by water (not covered by homeowner policies) and not by wind. For example, our team was told by one man that the roof of his house had been blown off and the interior of his house had then been flooded by rain; he got $1,000 for his roof.

The general insurance situation has caused great public complaint, yet there has been no evidence of government presence to protect consumers. It is especially important because the devastation of the storm has, in effect, created a class of "new poor", people in marginal or middle income circumstances before the storm who suffered so much economically that they are heavily dependent on whatever insurance coverage they had for recovery. The failure of state insurance regulatory officials to protect victims has caused a local scandal and has led to a county grand jury inquiry into the activities of the state insurance commissioner. (One local employee of the state agency reported to our staff that it was their job to "pacify the people.")

What is distressing in these circumstances is that information could be developed to help hurricane victims if there was interest to do so. The U.S. Weather Bureau, for example, hired one of the world's leading atmospheric meteorologists to analyse the nature of the storm immediately after it hit. Our staff interviewed him while he was preparing his report. He was impressed with what he called "the tornado-like" ferocity of the storm, and indicated that there was clearly widespread and heavy wind damage; in areas immediately adjacent to the shorelines there was also severe water damage. Information like this could be extremely beneficial to storm victims were someone in the federal (or state) government watching out for their interests.*

* - Some help is coming through an OEO legal aid grant, which is being used primarily on insurance cases. But, as we discuss below, this is really a distorted use of OEO money and is severely limited in scope.

CLASS AND CARE

An argument is made by some advocates of the present federal disaster policy that disasters usually hit middle-income people harder than the poor. This is unfounded. Undoubtedly, a family with considerable income and substantial real and personal property is more likely to suffer a greater dollar loss than a poor family in the same disaster area. But actual dollar loss tells very little about the hardship which a disaster brings to an individual family. Much more important is the human need which the losses formerly fulfilled. For example, the poor family who loses a $5,000 house is likely to suffer more than a family who loses a $30,000 house. Though neither family has a place to live, the poor family will in all likelihood be less able to recover. In most cases, the wealthier family will have supplemental assets, including insurance, to help it to full recovery. Humane systems of disaster aid would take into account actual need and not only dollar losses.

The demographic characteristics of the Mississippi coast counties, and especially those more inland, mark them unmistakenly as poor, significantly black, and undereducated. (See appendix.) Yet, the federal government and private agencies to which it has delegated disaster responsibilities have dispensed assistance as if they were dealing with wealthy suburbs.

Federal Aid to Individuals. OEP's Disaster Handbook indicates that individuals should get assistance from either private agencies or one of the following federal agencies which give loans: the Small Business Administration, Farmers Home Administration, Federal Housing Administration, and Veterans Administration. Federal disaster aid, therefore, with the exception of emergency housing, is basically limited to loans and rests substantially upon the ability of individuals to establish credit, or the ability to repay. For people who are poor -- who are unemployed or seasonal workers, who have very low incomes when they get a chance to work, who rarely have collateral to back a loan and who cannot promise regular repayments -- this system is cruel.

Though loans fairly provide aid on a repayment basis to those who can meet the economic standards required, they arbitrarily discriminate against those who are not in the right economic class. Moreover, loans are not generally given to any person if, as a result, his real property will be worth more than before the disaster.* Clearly, such a policy inevitably works against those whose possessions before a disaster were worth very little, e.g. a person living in a wood frame, two room home with minimum furniture could not qualify. SBA does grant loans to persons to build homes of increased value if they lived in homes which failed to meet minimum housing code levels. The loans can be used to construct homes to meet these minimums. Generally, however, unincorporated areas have no such codes.

In the provision of emergency housing, the law allows free rent for a year or less (HUD, as we noted earlier, chose a limit of 90 days) and, thereafter, a rent and utilities payment not to exceed 25% of a family's income. This admirable formula, however, can have unfair effects. In

* - The 1969 Disaster Relief Act, passed after Camille, provides for forgiveness of the first $1800 of SBA and Farmers Home Administration loans. Theoretically, a person needing a loan of, for example, $2300, would have to repay only $500. This could help poor people who could qualify.

Camille, for example, fees have been established for emergency trailers according to their size, up to a maximum of $50 per month for a three bedroom unit. Because there are no income restrictions, rightly, on trailer tenants, this fee may be as much as 25% for some families and considerably less percent for those with greater incomes. In fact, a family with an annual income below $2500 would quickly reach the 25% limit. In disaster situations, when necessities have been destroyed or washed away and there are unusual expenses, this government-regulated cost can become unfairly burdensome to the poor.

Finally, the principal non-monetary federal aid available to disaster victims is food, through participation in one of the Department of Agriculture's food stamp or commodities distribution programs. The limitations of these programs have been documented elsewhere and it is not our intention to do so here.*

During September, the Red Cross paid the entry fee for persons wishing to participate in the food stamp program in Harrison County. While there may have been other factors involved, local food officials reported that when this Red Cross program stopped at the end of the month participation rates dropped; 23,057 households received food stamps in September. This was reduced to 1,360 households in October; or 95,536 persons in September and only 4,983 in October.

* - In Mississippi, if you have an income of $70/month or below you pay 50 cents for stamps. However, if your income is higher the fee increases rapidly, e.g. a family of four with $90-$110/month income has to pay $40/month for food stamps - almost half their income. If the income is $170/month, the family pays $56 and gets $78 worth of stamps. Anyone earning more than $180/month in Mississippi is not eligible.

Our observation of the operation of federal aid programs in the aftermath of Camille leads us to conclude that it is difficult for poor people to obtain disaster relief from such sources.

The American National Red Cross. How, then, are individuals cared for in a natural disaster? Theoretically, state and local officials should handle a considerable portion of the assistance. Practically, however, the location of these offices within the devastated area makes them victims as well, and especially if local employees live in the disaster area. Moreover, in poor states such as Mississippi, there is little likelihood that these agencies can respond effectively to the huge demands of an emergency. Harrison County, for example, has a population of about 166,700 and has no full-time public health officer. In these situations, the federal responsibility -- and especially that of OEP -- necessarily increases.

OEP has in effect delegated the bulk of its responsibilities for individual care to the American National Red Cross. The Red Cross is chartered by Congress to "carry on a system of national and international relief ... in mitigating the sufferings caused by pestilence, famine, fire, flood, and other national calamities ..." It is a quasi-public agency, supported entirely by voluntary contributions, but having close ties to the federal government in both purpose and operations. The chairman and seven other members of the 50-member Board of Governors are appointed by the President of the United States. It is housed in a federally owned building, has its books audited by the Department of Defense, and is recognized in Public Law 81-875 as a conduit for federal agencies for releasing emergency supplies in disasters. The Red Cross also maintains a Statement of Understanding with the OEP to cover disaster functions, and it is through this formal agreement, last approved in May 1969, that OEP grants a preemptive role to the Red Cross for individual care in a disaster, covering such items as food and other consumable supplies, clothing, medicine, shelter, occupational rehabilitation, household furnishings, building and repair of homes. The Statement also provides that federal funds will not be used to pay state and local governments for expenses they incur carrying out functions which the Red Cross is able to perform. Coupled with statutory language (section 4 of the 1966 Disaster Relief Act) which provides for cooperation between federal agencies and the Red Cross, but which prohibits any action which will "limit or in any way affect" its operations, the Statement of Understanding essentially gives the Red Cross a free hand in providing individual disaster care without effective public oversight.

The Red Cross operates two related, but distinct, programs of disaster assistance. In the immediate aftermath of a disaster it concentrates on providing "mass care" which is dispensed through emergency offices manned predominantly by volunteers, and where victims are given medical care, some clothing, food, etc. As the immediate needs are met, however, this part of the program phases out. Caseworkers then arrive to develop individual recovery assistance for victims and their families. Disaster aid applicants complete detailed forms which describe their assets, liabilities, and losses. (The household furnishings loss list alone contains more than 90 items.) Caseworkers then determine how much each victim should get and the Red Cross issues a grant, or gift, to the victim.

By the beginning of November, 23,208 persons in Mississippi, Louisiana and Alabama had received grants. Though normally the average Red Cross grant is $720, local staff are empowered to give $7500 without headquarters approval, and large gifts are granted. The Red Cross Biloxi office stated that the average Camille grant for them has been about $1100.

The Red Cross grant program is unique because it does not require repayment. Because federal financial aid for disasters is primarily limited to loans it is especially valuable. At first glance, therefore, it would appear uniquely suited to help all disaster victims, regardless of income. But theory has proved quite different from practice. Caseworkers are given a considerable amount of discretion in dispensing these grants, but generally are required to help applicants "resume their normal family life in the home and in the community." Just as for federal financial aid in disasters, there is no minimum standard of need by which the adequacy of aid can be measured, and because the organization attempts to bring victims back to their previous level of living -- regardless of what it was -- aid is dispensed unequally. Those who had more before the disaster will get more for recovery; those who had less will get less. And many poor will be referred to public relief agencies in lieu of getting Red Cross assistance (Mississippi does not have a general relief program; you must be either blind, disabled, aged, or a dependent child to get state welfare aid).

Guidelines contained in the Red Cross Disaster Casework Procedure Manual indicate how this general approach to disaster aid is translated into operating terms.

*Clothing: The Manual says, "Used clothing should be given only when the family's standards indicate it is appropriate." The Gulfport casework supervisor confirmed that this means if you've never had new clothing, you don't get any from the Red Cross (unless that's all there is). But if you are accustomed to new clothing, that's what you'll get.

*Household furnishings: The Manual says: "Needs will vary according to the amount and quality of furnishings lost, and the economic level, size, and composition of the family. For example, ...the family that lost poor quality furnishings can be expected to resume its normal way of living with used or unpainted items."

*Renters v. homeowners: The Manual says: "Rent. A family that has lost its shelter may be referred to a Red Cross operated shelter, or assistance may be provided by paying a maximum of one month's rent for a room, apartment, or home if the family does not have resources to pay for this expense." Payments to homeowners who have lost their shelter have no limit, are made to cover rebuilding costs, and can be for thousands of dollars worth of such costs.

The inequities which can result from this system of aid can be understood from the following examples (the first two were obtained by our field representatives from the aid applicants described).

*A black man in Waveland followed a white applicant into a Red Cross center. Both men had the same size families, but the black man had a substantially lower income. The white man got $80 for food, the black $5 for the same period of time.

*A young white couple on Point Cadet had their home destroyed. The husband's weekly income varied from $40 to $100. They were told they would receive an allowance to replace their furniture; they received $30 for groceries, $80 for clothes. They could not get money to rebuild their home, worth $4500, because "they would end up with more than they had before the storm." A 70 year old lady from the same area with more than $3000 in savings received $10,000 to rebuild her $11,000 destroyed home.

*The chairman of a consolidated citizens organization along the coast complained (in a telegram to the Red Cross) that a family with a $39,000 income received "a full bedroom outfit" while another family with a $3000 income got a mattress.

According to the disaster chief of the national Red Cross, Mr. Robert Pierpont, the Red Cross is fully cognizant that it does not serve all income groups equally. He summarized the organization's relationship with its clientele by saying, "We're not dealing with the poor, we're dealing with Mr. and Mrs. Average America."

The result of this Red Cross policy is that an agency acting on behalf of the federal government has decided to interpret its Congressional charter in such a way that a disproportionate amount of its fixed disaster budget ($10 million is budgeted for disasters annually, without special contributions) goes to people who are not poor. Though it is not our purpose to suggest that any disaster program ought to be a substitute for a carefully defined, humane program providing economic security for all people, it is clear that the net effect of this policy is to arbitrarily exclude a portion of the population from disaster assistance solely because they are poor.

The Disaster Aid Rationale. Both federal and private agencies therefore operate disaster assistance without any minimum standard of adequacy; they also disburse aid frequently according to the income or assets of the aid applicant. One can only conclude, therefore, that the general theory which guides the federal government in its disbursement of disaster aid is that no one should have, even temporarily, better living standards than they had before, even if they were poverty-stricken. In its own words, the Red Cross "considers only those needs that have been created or made worse by the disaster." Though certainly a reasonable sounding approach, the net result -- coupled with no minimum standard and a graduated level of care -- is inequality and inadequacy for many.

Special Needs of the Poor. Not only are the poor discriminated against in the general approach to the disbursement of financial aid, but their needs also go unmet in a number of special areas where they have particular concerns.

Legal Aid - Three days after Hurricane Camille hit Mississippi, negotiations began between the Mississippi Bar Association and the Office of Economic Opportunity (OEO) for an emergency grant to establish a legal aid program to help "low income people" struck by the storm. A six-month, $50,000 grant was approved even though the Mississippi Bar has long opposed strong legal aid on behalf of the poor and civil rights, and even though (in violation of 42 USC 2809) no attempt was made to coordinate the program with existing community action agencies, or make it meet the peculiar problems of the poor. Two full-time attorneys have been hired and "volunteers" work at $10 per hour. No limits of income are set for people wishing to receive legal aid services. The president of the bar told our representatives that no advocacy actions would be taken, and that to a considerable extent the program was designed to keep out civil rights lawyers who might "start trouble." The NAACP Legal Defense Fund has collected six affidavits from black people who state they were refused aid.

The program concentrates primiarly on those issues which are of benefit to families with assets in the form of insurance or real property: settlement of claims cases for homes and cars, repairs or improvements on property, problems of getting into and out of contracts. While there is a clear need for such aid to people of all economic levels, OEO funds should not be used to provide such aid for the non-poor.

Planning and adequate representation: The future of the area hit by Camille depends mainly upon the Mississippi Emergency Council. As we indicated above, this Council is totally unrepresentative of both poor and black, indeed of any segment of Mississippi society but the business and banking community. In general, the Council has operated without public sessions or hearings to gather information from the populace about what the direction of the new development ought to be.

For more than two months after the storm the Council failed to meet with representatives of the black community. Then, when the body extended an invitation to various private agencies interested in its activities, including our organizations, local representatives of concerned civil rights and anti-poverty organizations asked that the Council membership be made more representative. That request was denied, though a return offer was made to allow three non-member black people to sit in regular Council meetings and participate when appropriate.

Even though the federal government granted $495,000 to the Council, a grant which even waived local contributions in cash or kind, the President's representative said, "The President has no control over the make-up of the Council." This is an excessively restricted view of federal responsibility, especially when the Council had to sign an assurance of compliance with title VI of the Civil Rights Act in order to receive the money.

In the future, the issue of adequate and fair community representation will become increasingly important as HUD approves money and proposals for community planning, low income housing, etc. The Workable Program for Community Improvements Handbook, for example, states:

> A guiding principle of departmental policy is to insure that citizens have the opportunity to participate in policies and programs which affect their welfare. Therefore, the workable program requires ... that the community provide opportunities for citizens, including those who are poor and members of minority groups, to participate in all HUD - assisted programs for which a workable program is a requirement and in the community's plan to expand the supply of low and moderate income housing.

In view of the difficulties and shortcomings of HUD's performance in relation to community representation in the recent past, its future actions in this regard should be carefully observed.

Transportation: A crucial problem for poor people, especially those in rural areas, is transportation Lack of transportation after the storm -- even where it was not present before the hurricane -- has seriously hampered the effectiveness of relief work simply because many poor people have been unable to reach assistance centers. The OEO staff in Mississippi, for example, requested and received approval for an emergency food proposal which was geared primarily to obtain temporary transportation for poor people to reach food distribution centers. The federal government, aside from OEO, has been oblivious to this problem. The Department of Transportation's mass transit office has never made a survey of transportation needs after the storm.

RACIAL DISCRIMINATION AND FEDERAL DISASTER PROGRAMS

There is a popular myth during disasters that the exigencies of natural calamities significantly reduce or entirely eliminate the normal hostilities and differences between races. Mississippi is, unfortunately, a perfect testing ground for this thesis, and from the beginning it has proved false. On one hand, there is little doubt that some federal officials and relief agencies have at least been aware that racial discrimination is possible during emergencies, e.g. OEP was prompt to investigate a complaint of discrimination after Camille, and the Red Cross has made some efforts to bring in black workers to the disaster area. Nevertheless, through both actions and inactions the Federal Government has indicated there is little national sensitivity to the problems of race, even during a calamity. Indeed, in some instances federal agencies and officials appear to be supporting discrimination.

One of the first, and most important examples, which we have discussed above, was the President's decision to recognize the all-white, unrepresentative Mississippi Governor's Emergency Council as the coordinator of federal aid. This act has become particularly repulsive to local black citizens because the White House acted after the membership of the Council was publicly named.

A number of other issues, however, specifically illustrate the failure of federal agencies to take steps to assure equal opportunity.

*The Small Business Administration appears to be approving loans in a discriminatory manner. In the month following the hurricane (September) SBA approved 617 disaster loans. All but 21 (3%) went to whites. In addition, the average white loan was $8,919 and the average black loan was $3,797. Finally, 99% of the total dollars in loans approved by SBA have been for whites.

*In general, federal agency responsibilities under title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, (which prohibits discriminatory use of Federal funds) are overseen by the Department of Justice. In this disaster situation, where at least $50 million is expected to flow to a state with a long history of racial problems, Justice has confined its actions to general conversations with OEP about title VI.

*The ability of the Federal Government to disburse school aid according to the Constitutionally-approved requirements of tital VI has been compromised. In late August an HEW official stated that school districts which were segregated in violation of title VI would not get aid (six districts in disaster counties are not in compliance). The Vice President publicly condemned this statement on more than one occasion, calling it at one point a "gratuitous determination by a minor official, repugnant as an example of overbearing bureaucracy ..." The Vice President's position has placed great pressure on HEW's civil rights staff to accept less than adequate compliance proposals in order to make districts which now violate the law eligible for aid.

*The bulk of physical clean-up work after Camille was done by private contractors working for the Corps of Engineers. No attempts were made by the Corps to assure nondiscrimination in hiring, even though they are required to do so by Executive Order 11246.

*The federal fair housing statute states that "all executive departments and agencies shall administer their programs and activities relating to housing and urban development in a manner affirmatively to further the purposes" of the law. HUD has principal responsibility for administering this act for its own activities and for other agencies. It has taken virtually no action under this language since its passage. This will directly affect the future development of the Gulf Coast.

Generally, therefore, the black citizens of Mississippi, who must suffer gross indignities every normal day, have had to withstand additional violations of law and spirit during this extreme situation. Contrary to the desires of those who felt that Camille might bring new hope through new building, there is every reason to fear that discrimination will exist as before, but be cloaked in a mantle of modernity.

FINDINGS

The response of the Federal Government and of agencies acting on its behalf to the disaster caused by hurricane Camille along the Gulf Coast of Mississippi was large. Private agencies also provided extensive immediate help. But to a great extent the federal influence was characterized by its size rather than by its sensitivity. The Federal Government appears to treat a natural disaster as it would a military disaster ... large numbers of troops are rapidly assigned to remove bodies and clean up debris, and are withdrawn as soon as possible. Though individuals have acted with great understanding in countless cases, our investigations show that in response to hurricane Camille:

1. The Federal Government devoted its primary attention to public facilities damaged or destroyed by a natural disaster and relegated the care of individuals to others. There are ample statistics on the destruction of bridges, highways, sewers and public buildings but far less detail about the destruction of homes and personal possessions. There is insufficient information about the degree to which people are hungry, sick, homeless or in need of special care.

2. The Federal Government has not recognized by its actions the need for imaginative outreach to people both numbed by disaster and cut off from normal channels of communication. Clear information regarding services available, location of sources of aid and the terms of such aid was not taken to people, and as a result rumors were rife and inhibited utilization of such services.

3. Aid was not dispensed equitably to all people. There is no minimum standard of need by which the adequacy of disaster care is measured.

Aid was frequently disbursed on a graduated scale of income; if you had more, you got more; if you had less, you got less. In the case of the American National Red Cross, this is official policy.

4. There has been no coordinated program to protect consumers from exploitation and fraud. Many "new poor" fortunate enough to have had insurance policies were forced to settle for a fraction of their claims. Two months after the hurricane, the Associated General Contractors of America had to warn Camille victims of the dangers of hiring fly-by-night repair contractors. Information about the nature of the hurricane which would have helped in these situations was not made available to victims.

5. The special needs of the poor have not been affirmatively identified and met. Often alienated from the community at large the poor are especially ill-prepared to cope with a disaster. Under normal circumstances the poor are least able to qualify for loans, and loans are the main category of recovery aid. Many of the poor live in isolated areas and aid was slow to reach them. The poor have not been involved in identifying needed emergency services nor in planning for the future, thus adding both to frustration and alienation.

6. The Federal Government has taken little or no action to combat racial exclusion and discrimination in this disaster situation, and in some instances is contributing to the problem. The Department of Justice has confined its actions to conversations with OEP about title VI of the 1964 Civil Rights Act. Other departments of the Federal Government have failed to take affirmative action to ensure non-discrimination.

Only a tiny percentage of SBA loans have gone to black people. Most importantly, the President has sanctioned the exclusion of the poor and the black from the long range planning process by designating the all-white Governor's Emergency Council as the official body through which all federal programs for reconstruction must be coordinated.

RECOMMENDATIONS

The above findings lead the American Friends Service Committee and the Southern Regional Council to make the following recommendations, some of which are designed to help meet immediate continuing needs in the wake of hurricane Camille and others of which are directed toward the nature of the Federal response to possible future disasters.

1. We Recommend that the Federal Government and its agencies work only through state or local bodies which affirmatively embody non-discriminat ry policies and are fully representative of all segments of the affected area. If such a state or local body cannot be found or speedily created, the Federal Government should bypass non-complying agencies and itself directly administer federally funded or assisted programs for recovery and reconstruction: and that inasmuch as the Governor's Emergency Council of Mississippi is highly unrepresentative of the people of that state, the President immediately revoke his recognition of that Council as the coordinating agency through which federal programs of recovery and reconstruction reach Mississippi.

2. We Recommend that the President allocate sufficient portions of his disaster relief fund to meet the emergency food, unemployment and housing needs still existant on the Gulf Coast until such time as, at his request, Congress appropriates necessary funds for the implementation of the goals of the Disaster Act of 1969 (PL 91-79).

3. We Recommend that the Department of Housing and Urban Development rescind its order establishing charges for emergency housing and trailers, provide for free occupancy of trailers for one year, and extend its cut-off date for applications for housing assistance for as long as the disaster period is officially recognized by the Office of Emergency Preparedness.

4. We Recommend that the Office of Economic Opportunity establish and fund a special legal aid and ombudsman program for the Gulf Coast area, this program to be administered by a board representative of the total Gulf community including those the program will serve, i.e., the poor, and to continue until the disaster period is officially terminated by the Office of Emergency Preparedness.

5. We Recommend that the Department of Agriculture make available commodities, free food stamps and free school lunches for needy disaster victims for at least as long as the disaster period is officially recognized by the Office of Emergency Preparedness.

6. We Recommend that appropriate agencies immediately initiate and fund adequate job training and employment programs to provide income and security for those dislocated by hurricane Camille.

7. We Recommend that Congress convene an oversight investigation into the administration and direction of the federal response to hurricane Camille, with particular emphasis upon the Federal Government's preparation for, and ability to handle, the individual human consequences of natural disasters.

8. We Recommend that there be developed "Disaster Guidelines" which shall be binding on the Executive Office of the President and all federally supported, assisted or chartered agencies, and which should include the following among its provisions.

*Uniform minimum levels for aid, equally applicable to all people regardless of this pre-disaster economic status, shall be established to provide such basic necessities as food, shelter and medical needs for as long as is needed;

*Special needs unmet by this minimum standard shall be considered on request of individuals and families;

*All federal disaster programs shall adhere to the intent and provisitions of federal civil rights laws, including sending civil rights staff to the scene immediately;

*The total community affected, including the poor, shall be involved as soon as possible after a disaster in the planning and implementation of short and long range recovery and reconstruction activities;

*No agency shall terminate disaster aid without the concurrence of the overall coordinating agency.

9. Finally, we recommend that the Congress take appropriate steps to ensure that the agency designated to coordinate the Federal response to natural disasters reflect in its policies, personnel and program an equal concern for the human and physical dimensions of disaster reconstruction; and that Congress consider whether, in the light of the primary defense responsibilities of the Office of Emergency Preparedness, OEP is the suitable agency to carry out such coordinating functions.

We want to note here that the Senate Committee on Public Works announced November 21 that it would hold public hearings into disaster policy administration, with particular emphasis on the response to hurricane Camille. The Committee has indicated it will look into many of the areas we have discussed in this report. We are indebted to Senators Edmund Muskie and Birch Bayh for their sensitivity to these issues and their concern that these hearings be held, and to the Chairman of the Committee, Senator Jennings Randolph, for approving the hearings.
